David Gollaher received Master's and Ph.D. degrees from Harvard University, further, he is President and Chief Executive Officer of the California Health Care Institute, a public policy group of leading biomedical research companies and universities. This book is just what the title suggests it to be, a history of the operation of Circumcision. It starts with the first known reference to the operation, that of a Egyptian tomb engraving dating from 2400 B.C., and continues through to the present day controversy over the practice. The book covers the Jewish ritual, the Moslem custom and makes mention of the practice in other parts of the world including the Australian Aboriginal and African tribal customs. Detailed accounts and statistics are given. The author writes in an easy, tactful and natural way, and giving many references; there is no obvious bias for or against the procedure. That, in reporting on more recent statements, statistics are given which are contradictory is drawn by the author to the attention of the reader. The book is well annotated.

In this book the author draws conclusions that, I am sure, will interest Acorn readers. In referring to the medical aspects of the procedure he reports that the variance between the two groups was negligible, but that the same could not be said of their sex lives, e.g. "We find that circumcised men engage in a more elaborate set of sexual practices" and "It makes no health difference whether you are or are not circumcised but you will 'get around' more if you are". A further quotation may bring a smile, "Ironically, in the light of the old theory that the foreskin encouraged masturbation, circumcised men were found to be more prone to masturbation". The study concluded that, on average, circumcised men engage in heterosexual oral and anal sex and homosexual acts more commonly than their uncircumcised peers.

This book, published in hard back format and running to 250 pages, retails in the United States at $20. The ISBN number is 0-465-04397-6. If you intend to purchase a copy it would be wise to establish the cost before you make a commitment, the notional $20 = £15 may not apply. ## Recollections

I just love the circumcised state and would like to see all men and boys circumcised. I first saw a circumcised cock when I was about 8 years old. On the way home from school we crossed some open fields where a group of us sat and talked. One day Dave, a boy who later became a very close friend, pulled his cock out to show that he was different from the other 3 or 4 boys with us. I remember being fascinated by the smooth head, of which he seemed so proud. Years later as 13 year olds we used to wank off together and by then he was really big and his circumcised cock looked fabulous. Although he seemed bigger than me he was often telling me how big I was and especially how thick my shaft was. The only thing he did not like was the fact that I was uncircumcised. He told me that every Saturday afternoon he wanked off with an older boy who was also circumcised and really huge. I have always regretted not getting together with the two of them and I think that the only thing stopping me was my uncircumcised condition. Though only 8 of the 30 boys in my school class were circumcised I somehow had 3 of those boys in my close circle of 4 friends. I can still remember exactly the boys who were circumcised and even what their cocks looked like although I cannot remember more than a few of the others. Even at home I seemed to be in the company of the few circumcised boys in the neighbourhood and can remember wanking off with 4 of them but only with 2 uncircumcised boys. Wanking with the circumcised boys was fantastic and I especially remember Trevor who was a year younger than me who liked to see which of the two of us could shoot our loads the quicker. Years later I heard from another boy that Trevor used to suck him off swallowing all his huge load of cum. I just regret that he never did that for me but of course at the time I was uncircumcised and the thought of sucking an uncircumcised penis must surely put anyone off.

How much more is relevant? Dave (not the same one as above) with whom I used to wank off instead of doing games at school had one of the biggest cocks I have seen even at age 14 and was in my view perfectly circumcised. Or Tony who I met at University who really did have the biggest cock I have seen and flaunted his circumcision which was superb and without even a visible trace of a scar which is how I like to see them, but I suppose that only happens if you are done at birth. I always had the feeling that like me he was bisexual but he used to go on so much about 'queers' that I did not dare to show any interest in his magnificent cock. Or should I describe the fun I had in the local disused quarry with Peter, a neighbour who had quite a small but well circumcised cock who liked to strip naked so that we could better enjoy mutual masturbation.

All these boys and many others convinced me that one day I too would be happily circumcised.

Jealous?

There is no doubt about it: the ideal holiday is a flotilla sailing trip in the Med. You can either hire a whole boat or just one bunk if you don't mind who your companions will be. Since the sailing fraternity is the cream of British society, I was very happy to take 'pot luck' and finished up in a six-berth boat with three younger chaps and a pretty divorcee in her thirties. I was by far the oldest and, being the only experienced sailor, was duly elected skipper, the girl volunteering to cook. As soon as we were out of sight of land one of the lads said that if I didn't mind, they were going to strip off. The girl had no objection but said she'd only go topless, being the only girl – and with that I found myself with a bollock-naked crew and a bare-breasted cook! Now, I'm no prude, heaven knows, but I do find nudity rather unsettling. The problem is that although I'm a fairly well-balanced individual (chip on both shoulders, according to my ex-wife). I've never been able to come to terms with the altered appearance and sense of deprivation of having a circumcised cock and am consequently desperately shy of showing it. I suspected the three lads would be uncircumcised since it's not the vogue these days, and so it turned out. They and the girl had probably never seen a circumcised cock in their lives and they weren't going to start with mine! So I declared, amidst boos and cries of 'Spoilsport' that I'd keep my trunks on 'so as not to show them up'. (Har har.)

Shortly afterwards there occurred what proved to be one of the most sexually provoking and yet disturbing episodes I can remember. We'd anchored well out after a fantastic lunchtime session on local wine. Two of the lads and I crashed out in our bunks whilst the girl said she would go on deck and get her norks brown. The other lad also went up to sunbathe.

After half an hour or so I had to get up to use the 'heads' and glanced idly out of the gap in the unlatched porthole whilst pointing Percy at the porcelain, to find myself admiring from close-up the lovely big breasts of the girl who was snoozing with her back against the mast. At that moment the lad came up and, leaning over her, started securing some flapping halyards further up the mast. I had a grandstand view as his sleek brown dick flopped about in front of her face and, seeing how his foreskin tapered to a narrow spout like an elephant's trunk, pondered sadly on my parents' inconsiderate act in depriving me of mine. At that moment the girl opened her eyes and said, 'if you don't stop waving that sausage at me I'll take a bite out of it.' He just laughed and went on with his task, whereupon she reached her hand out and started gently batting his prick from side to side. He stopped fiddling with his ropes and looked down with a lecherous grin on his face as his prick rose rapidly and jerkily to full stretch. It was noticeable that although his foreskin expanded sideways to accommodate his hugely swollen glans, throwing it into sharp relief through the skin, it retreated hardly at all down the shaft, so that the knob remained fully covered with the pendant rope of skin wagging about on the end. The girl appeared to find this interesting and, daintily seizing the loose tip of his foreskin between thumb and forefinger, started pulling it out so as to check its length. "Your foreskin's a bit long," she said, "We'll have to have you circumcised." "I've never seen a circumcised cock," said the lad, "would it be an improvement?" The girl said her ex-husband had been circumcised and she doubted if it would be an improvement, but if he wanted she'd show him what a circumcised cock looked like and proceeded to slide the narrow tube of skin right back over his knob and down his shaft, concertina-ing it against his balls and leaving the blood red knob and foreskin lining totally exposed. He shivered. "Wow!," said the lad, "you could do that all day, but what's the point of circumcision anyway" She told him that it was easier to keep clean but other than that, there wasn't much to say for it. He'd lose a lot of feeling and make it more difficult for a girl to 'do her duty'. "What's that?" he said whereupon she stretched his foreskin forward over his glans and, cupping his balls in her other hand, she commenced a slow lascivious wank, pulling the skin all the way from the base of his stomach over and beyond his knob. His eyes shut his face went red and his knees started to buckle as he gasped with pleasure. She stopped to let him recover, and then slowly recommenced, massaging his fat knob through the skin. After twenty minutes of keeping him on a knife-edge of delight, she leaned forward and gripped the tip of his foreskin between her lips. As he groaned and shuddered into climax, her hand movement increased to a blur and she took the whole of his penis head into her mouth, collecting his sperm as it spurted from him and then milking and sucking the last drops from his long foreskin like a baby sucking a teat. She quickly spat it overside and, patting his cock, said, "I wouldn't find that so easy if you were circumcised, and you wouldn't enjoy it so much either." I don't think he even heard her, he just sighed rapturously and stretched out next to her, ecstatically squeezing his wet, swollen prick.

Jealous? Believe me, I've had some sexual experience over the years, but it's scenes like that which bring home to me how much I'm missing. It's not just the loss in quality of response in not having the thrill of a mobile foreskin: I'm sure I'd have got a lot of enjoyment out of such treatment, even without a foreskin. It's simply that my damned shyness over revealing my denuded penis would never let me get into such a situation!

Cut Puppeteers

I wonder if any other members went to see Puppetry of the Penis at the Whitehall Theatre recently. I couldn't resist the prospect of seeing two Ozzies with their kit off!

JF comments in Issue 4 of 2000 about the versatility of their cocks; but I think their act was even more remarkable because I am sure that they were both CUT. One had a tight cut, no doubt about that. The other had a little more skin, but it did not intrude over the glans and it was he who managed to stretch what he had into many different shapes including the Eiffel Tower! Most bizarre, but a good laugh too. Just wish I could have got a closer look.

On another matter, I have been considering having a revision job in order to tighten things up considerably and would be glad to hear by email (in the first instance) any guys who can answer one or two sensitive questions about 'after the event'. Also any recommended surgeons (I have already had a word with the Dr in Golders Green, but would like to check out elsewhere first).

Reflections On A Theme

I guess that it is in the nature of things that in a self-recruiting organisation, and an organisation that embraces an emotive topic, there will be a polarity of opinion and that those at one or other end of the scale may promote their opinion with missionary zeal. I am told that passion dims reason, be that as it may, passion certainly appears to allow one member to accuse another of redefining medical terminology whilst overlooking that he is guilty of the same misdemeanour (Acorn 4/2000 'Response to Issue 3/2000'). I suggest that Phimosis is not 'a tight foreskin' nor is it 'a foreskin that is too tight' rather it is a foreskin that cannot be retracted due to a narrowed preputial ring. This, I read, is a rare condition and likely to involve not more than 1.5% of the male population at 17 years of age. <sup>(1) (2)</sup>

Whether or not it is deplorable for Drs Lane and South to determine no action on patients with Phimosis depends on the agreement between the doctor and the patient and on the degree of Phimosis. I think it unlikely that the patients will have been dismissed from any future action, more likely that there will have been an agreement for 'No further action at this time' and the patients asked to return if there are any adverse developments. Circumcision is a relatively simple procedure and it is not a case of 'now or never'; unlike the launching of a lunar probe it does not require a gap in the clouds and absence of wind in the stratosphere as pre-requisite to a successful procedure. If surgery is delayed by para-phimosis or infection the delay is unlikely to be either lengthy or life threatening.

We are advised by our correspondent that the phimotic patients of Drs Lane and South are condemned to a life of sub-standard sex. Really? Compared to what (or rather, to who's experience)? If the patient and his partner feel rewarded by their sexual activity it is not for me, nor I suggest, for anyone, to say that what they enjoy is sub-standard. There is no need to dilate further on this as our correspondent thoughtfully changes tack and reminds us 'some 80% or more of sex is in the mind and not in the penis'. No mention is made of when this was recorded, how, by whom and who's penis was the measuring stick. Is this, perhaps opinion unobstructed by research?

I do not believe that the foreskin is a design fault nor do I support the view that it is 'a vestigial organ now degenerate and now of little or no utility but ancestrally well developed'. <sup>(3)</sup> Clearly we can live with or without a foreskin, but I believe that the removal of the foreskin has more to do with tribalism, the mistaken pursuit of hygiene and the misguided idea of prettiness than with the promotion of health.

Too Clean

You may be interested in my visit to the doctor many years ago. I had a shower beforehand and liberally applied cologne and a heavy dusting of talcum powder. Stripping to my briefs the aged Asian medic performed the usual sounding of my chest, blood pressure and heart monitoring tests. He then proceeded to examine my genitals. After palpating my testicles he retracted my foreskin to check the glans and meatus. With much tutting he produced a cotton swab with which he very vigorously 'cleansed' my sulcus and penile ridge. Apparently he thought the sticky white powder (which by then had attached itself to my 'helmet') was the dreaded smegma! After roughly cleaning my sensitive bell-end, Dr Singh advised me of the wisdom of good penile hygiene. So it seems that you can be too clean after all...

Circumcision Festival

I saw in Lets Go, a travel book on Turkey, that there is a circumcision festival to be held on the North Coast (Black Sea) at a resort which is apparently accessible only by sea because of mountains or some such. This year it is in July – in the same publication last year it was the 3rd week in July. I do not know if anyone else is interested, I would much like to go but fear the heat, as it must be getting quite warm at this time of year.

Editorial

Finally here is the second issue of the year – yes I know its late! It took a long while to get enough material together and then holidays and other complications delayed things further.

Please see the following notice about the meeting in November. Let us know as soon as possible if you would like to come as we need to confirm the reservations. If you are unsure about what to expect or would like any other information please call us on the phone. I hope to see you there.

Finally, there is little point writing to me complaining about there being too few letters in the newsletter that are pro (or anti as the case might be) circumcision. Instead, write the kind of letter that you would like to read, send it in and there is a very good chance that you will read it in the newsletter shortly afterwards.

What Exactly Constitutes A Good Circumcision?

All to do with aesthetics one would at first imagine. For most persons viewing circumcision as a simple cut and snip procedure without serious thought as to why it is being done at all, will likely seek the aesthetic approach to what exactly constitutes a good circumcision.

The answer entirely lies in the motivation for performing it. To many religious people today who practice this procedure as a religious rite, for them circumcision is meant to be a sign for all to see, to show others that they have a relationship with their God because of it. The Jews in particular realised that it became essential to prevent circumcised males from endeavouring a method to effectively become uncircumcised again, because their God warned that such individuals would be 'cut off' from His promises to them. As such, there came a time in history when the rabbi's insisted on the entire removal of all the foreskin, inner and outer parts, with a totally bared glans essential for all to see, whether on a child or adult.

If anyone today in our society decided, without this Biblical backing, to remove a new born baby's clothes, strap him to a circum-straining board, and without anaesthesia, spend some 10 or 20 minutes cutting away at his penis with a scalpel, he would be called paedophilic, sent to jail for life and would likely end up being tortured to death in jail. No-one dare call the God who ordained circumcision, paedophilic, and in any case how could mankind bring God to bear for such actions?

If the motive for circumcision is sacrificial then a good circumcision undoubtedly will be one where the maximum cutting of flesh occurs. If the circumcision is but a sign or symbol that the person has undergone a 'token' influence on his sexuality, as opposed to a real one, then just a minimum snip, a super-incision perhaps is a good circumcision. For many Christians today, they see physical circumcision as un-necessary because their circumcision is completely spiritual where all licentious thoughts, sexual indulgences, etc: are 'cut away' from their deepest origins in their heart. This is supposedly achieved by their God. This is a pity in one sense because there is much sexual diversity that I am sure is healthy and acceptable to a God, including being utterly obsessed by the subject – know anyone like this? Eroticism is one reason why parents perform this surgery. Doesn't he (it) look nicer with the end of his little willy uncovered? Looking at the end poking out so, helps me not think about changing his nappies.

For all of us who were circumcised without our consent, I believe we should revel and live for exactly those reasons. I was circ'd in the 1940's because masturbation was thought to be so serious an activity that blindness resulted. Masturbation should become my oyster. Circ'd for social reasons to look like others? – then enjoy and revel in looking at one's contemporaries circ'd willies. Circ'd for religious reasons so that it will be a sign to others of other faiths? – then make sure you do just that – show the World your willy, in whatever way is acceptable, and if you land up in court over it, quote the judge the bit in the Bible which tells you that your circ is meant to be a visible sign for all to see.

To many people who have never experienced the emotional and psychological knife on their sex, they really can only see the 'tip of the iceberg' of circumcision. A good circumcision to them is no circumcision at all, because the knife can only mean one thing to them in all their life's experiences. Having said that the form of circumcision varies from superincision where the prepuce is cut on its top surface, nothing is removed and the skin hangs down with glans visibly permanently uncovered (a good start if you want to consider circumcision without losing anything). Some African tribes practice this form, particularly the Nuba.

The Australian aborigines in particular are the world's most subincised people, with a very visible groove cut away from often the entire undersurface of the penis from tip of glans all the way to the scrotum, until the urethra is opened. They do this to simulate the female vulva (which they consider something which must surely be true), sacred as life emanates from it, and also to simulate, in the effective bloodletting, menstruation. They necessarily urinate in the squatting position, and their feminine side is thus promoted. A good circumcision for them apparently, lies in the promotion of this otherwise forbidden sexual cross-over.

Browned Off Thoughts

I was reading your article, in the Issue No: 1/2000 Acorn, by Anthony, entitled 'Browned Off' wherein he offers an explanation for the wide brownish scar on certain American penii, that he concludes can only have been given a Gomco-clamp type of operation to achieve this effective circumcision appearance, many years after the circumcision had been done.

I understood that the Gomco clamp was used, even up to very recent times by more than 50% of medical personnel performing circumcisions in the USA – the Hollister Plastibell technique, slightly less. If this wide brown scar is a feature of this method of ablating the prepuce in entirety, then why do the majority of American surgically modified penii not have this feature, since it is not common? Obviously only a circumciser familiar with this routine for dispatching as many new born foreskins in as little time as possible, can effectively do justice to answering the reason 'why this wide vivid scar?'.

I would like to suggest an explanation: From video's I have seen of the Gomco clamp procedure for circumcision, the skin of the penis is pulled upwards away from the abdomen whilst the clamp tightens this same skin to the bell covering the glans. It appears to me that the clamp is at first slightly tightened so that sufficient tension keeps the outer penile skin against the bell whilst at the same time allowing more skin to be pulled through in case all skin circumferentially has not been pulled through by the same amount or similar tension. If the clamp is just that little bit too tight to allow the skin to go through, it will effectively be compressed as it pulls through a space of insufficient width. During this pulling action through a constricted space, a certain small width of penile skin (and not the inner prepuce skin which is at that time protected by its outer penile skin) will experience a crushing if only lightly, and this will undoubtedly lead to discolouration of the skin involved. The effective width of this scar will be represented by the extent that the skin has been pulled tightly through the clamp.

One must surely appreciate that the circumciser, or medical nurse, has to control the amount of skin being pulled through the clamp device, make sure the tension on the penile skin is approximately the same all around the penis circumference, ensure that too much skin has not been pulled through (or too little) whilst at the same time tightening the clamp to crush the desired amount of foreskin to be removed, and the amount desired exactly by whom? This is really an impossible task to do well.

I don't believe circumcision can ever be done really well, like a face lift, or mole removal. One cannot surely predict how the baby penis will either look or feel many years later after the operation. In circumcision there are far too many unknown or unpredictable factors to enable a perfect operation.

I believe many readers of Acorn would love to know exactly how they became dissociated from part of their sexuality and at such a tender age. This can be readily gleaned from the scar type and appearance. Many Acorn readers I know will join me in my opinion that there is something special about the American style Gomco procedure for circling with its associated very unique rounded and often tightish scar. In general however, the Gomco does not produce a wide brownish scar, but I have read in the past that the Gomco circumcision line has a more visible nature than the almost equivalent looking Plastibell procedure.

Anyone out there with more explanations of circ appearances and how they got that way?

Indecent?

An event took place last spring which was almost a throwback to the bad old days when London's Finest sought out 'filth' wherever they could find it and administered the law of censorship with ruthless vigour. Now although it is certainly not within our remit to campaign against censorship, nevertheless when occasions of heavy handed and totally disproportionate action are directed in a way which brings our subject into prominence, however marginally, I feel it is time to call attention to it.

What upset the guardians of decency, alerted by a few puritanical members of the public (at the instigation of a nasty Sunday red-top), was a photographic art display by Atlanta-born divorcée Tierney Gearon, who exhibited a number of photographs of her young son and daughter naked at the Saatchi Gallery in London. Tierney, in what to my biased mind seems a spirit of joyous and triumphant rejection of the still widespread American practice of infant circumcision, celebrated her son's intact state whilst expressing her feelings in the exuberant attitude of the boy who was peeing in the direction of Tierney's chosen audience (the American public) in an act of in-your-face defiance.

It is a sad fact that any depiction of children in the nude is now considered akin to child molestation, no matter how innocently portrayed and although Tierney's pictures, while clearly innocent, might be considered to be in poor taste (how will the two kids react to the furore in years to come?) the police's draconian action in trying to ban them provoked a furious public response causing them to withdraw their objection. They should contemplate the fact that their immoderate response brought these 'offensive' images on to the pages of national newspapers whereas only habitués of the Saatchi would have seen them otherwise.

I've no doubt that some will query my interpretation of Tierney's reason for publishing the pictures but as an opponent of RIC I like to think I may be right.

Alternative To Revision

I have read with some interest the letters on revisions. In almost all the letters the effect of having very tight skin on the penis shaft when flaccid is that the skin around the base of the penis and around the testicles is stretched up when the penis is erect. I note that one or two correspondents have advised that because of this 'borrowing of skin' they get an amount of discomfort or pain. Not the best advertisement for the procedure but if a guy wants this tight look then no doubt he is prepared to put up with the discomfort to obtain his desired appearance.

From my reading of the letters it is apparent to me that the reason for most revisions is that the guy wants his helmet to be very prominent and not in any way obscured by foreskin/shaftskin when flaccid.

In my own case during an erection my shaft skin is very tight as my foreskin was totally removed when I was circumcised. I need to pull up quite a lot of skin from around the base of the penis to get any skin to stretch up to the rim or just over the rim of the helmet during an erection. When completely flaccid the length of my penis is around three inches and the skin on the shaft is bunched and a small piece sometimes just covers the rim of the helmet. If I pull the skin forward when flaccid I can cover about half or maybe a little more of the helmet but once released however the skin springs back and leaves the helmet exposed.

The length of my penis in a semi-flaccid state (that is stretched out and still soft and not erect) is about four inches and the skin on the shaft is stretched out exposing the half-inch or so of remaining inner foreskin, the circumcision scar and the helmet is very prominent. Now if I could retain this length permanently, so that my penis will not shrink back further, I think I will have achieved, more or less, what others achieve with a revision. I think most guys would like to have a reasonable penis length when flaccid and one frequently reads in various magazines etc that many guys are disappointed at the extent of penis shrinkage experienced when the penis is flaccid.

I remember some years ago reading that it was possible to have the muscle at the base of the penis, which controls the retraction of the penis when not erect, partially severed and this would stop the penis shrinking back and maintain the length. The only drawback to this procedure, so I understand, is that the angle of an erection might not be as steep as before and the penis might become slightly less firm and little more wobbly, as the same muscle also has some influence/control of the erection function. This apart have any members any knowledge of this procedure and the cost? I suppose like any cosmetic surgery it will cost an arm and a leg for what I would assume would be a 30 minute or so procedure.

As an aside I am amazed at the prices some clinics charge for a circumcision under local anesthetic; when I was circumcised the cost was under £200 now some clinics charge over £1,000. I know everyone wants to make a profit but even when one takes out the surgeon's fee and the overhead of the clinic the profit margin must be very high.

Down Under

In Issue 1/2001 (excellent as always), KG refers to a conversation he had with a New Zealander who thought that 'general' circumcision ended there around 1980. As an enthusiast of circumcision, it seems KG's illusions were shattered – Aussies and New Zealanders were not necessarily cut!

I have bad news for him – his Kiwi confidante may well be right.

It is the case that, as a general rule, life in NZ emulates much more closely that in the UK than does that in Australia (which is more likely to follow the US). I have no experience of NZ men, but I have very close experience of a straight Australian man of 25 who works with me. We have the most amazingly detailed discussions (out of work!!) and I ascertained at an early stage that he was uncut. He went on to volunteer that his four older brothers (born between 1970 and 1975 – Catholic family!) were all cut. He (born in 1976) was not cut and nor is his younger brother. He has never understood why his parents decided that, as from him their sons would not be cut but is afraid to ask his mum.

The chronology is rather like that predicted by the Kiwi confidante. I have a hunch (which may well be wrong) that perhaps Dr Spock's baby care book was amended around that time and no longer recommended routine circumcision. Does anyone have copies and could check? That said, most American boys continue to be cut even today, and I believe one of the reasons even more are not cut is that some of the US medical insurers do not consider it medically necessary – insurers always have an eye to saving a quick buck!

My Australian man has quite a lot of foreskin, though not covering his peehole. He nevertheless pulls the skin right back to pee and (he tells me) he prefers it pulled back when he wanks. For all that, he said there was no way he would voluntarily be cut – though this may be because of the fear of pain rather than aesthetics etc.

The only other relevant experience I had was a very remote one by internet, with an Australian living in London and who was born about 1970. He said his father was cut, but he was not. Unlike my workmate (and even at a safe distance over the net) he would not elaborate.

Does any of this help?

More Of The Penis Puppeteers

The description of the Penis Puppeteers by J.F. in Issue 4/2000 of Acorn did not mention that the two Australians David 'Friendly' Friend and Simon Morley subsequently went on to appear at the Whitehall Theatre in London at the end of last year.

Not wishing to miss the opportunity to see two chaps performing so called dick tricks, I hastened down to the 'Smoke' between Christmas and New Year. I was not to be disappointed.

To put the audience, who seemed to be made up largely of women and homosexual American Tourists, in to the mood for the main event a highly amusing comedienne came to act as warm up. For an hour her mixture of gags and songs, including a spoof version of the 1970s pop song 'Nobody Does it Better' (theme tune of the James Bond film The Spy Who Loved Me) with references to lesbian masturbation entertained us.

Following an intermission the two Australians appeared on stage and I knew that what I was about to watch was definitely not suitable for my two young sons – at least not yet! Sitting in the fourth row from the stage and with a screen behind them which magnified everything in close up. I could not help feel awed by the sight of their well endowed appendages which they brazenly strutted for the next hour after removing their skimpy cloaks. Quite how they managed to contort their cocks and balls in to all manner of shapes without hurting themselves went unanswered. In addition I was intrigued that for two chaps who were clearly either circumcised or possessed very short foreskins pulling and stretching shaft skin into party pieces such as 'The Eiffel Tower' was no problem.

My personal highlights were David 'Friendly' Friend holding his dick stretched out and using it like a wind up tool, and Simon Morley's suitably politically incorrect display of his dick next to a picture of the Duke of Edinburgh followed by President Bush. I always wondered what dickheads looked like. There was even a brave young lady from the audience who volunteered to be a prop in one of Simon Morley's stunts. He asked her to stand between his splayed legs while he did a handstand. It is a pity I forgot the gag.

All in all it was a good night out. In retrospect I think that it would make an excellent Acorn event, except for those easily shocked or hoping to see erections. The mind boggles to think what our two Australians would do with their members standing to attention. By the way, did any other Acorn members see their show? If so, did you enjoy it? And did you buy their accompanying book (last seen on sale at Foyles in Charing Cross Road) with plenty of pictures of tricks to copy.

Further Advantages Of The Muslim Style

PT – Sussex waxes lyrical on his ‘Muslim cut’. Not deprived of the large area of inner foreskin and thousands of sensitive nerve endings lost by recipients of radical medical circumcision like me (where the membrane is tightly trimmed before suturing cut edges) much of the spectrum of potential pleasure is retained. Whilst my scar line is close to the glans, PT has his mid-way down the shaft, a half penis length of erogenous tissue, lucky man!

For the Muslim style of circumcision, offers a distinct advantage. Fast-breaking is determined by the degree of penile insertion. If the penis reaches the circumcision ring or scar, the fast is broken. Glans insertion and no ejaculation is no misdemeanour, provided the scar remains outside, incredibly enough! For sexual intercourse to take place, the circumcised parts, both male and female, have to make contact. Being able to insert almost half the erect penis is an interesting aspect of ‘Eastern Promise’.

Also Tony’s oriental observations, the Japanese male, should his prepuce slip forward, would quickly retract it in order not to offend against decency. At the bath or during a medical examination, he would never present himself other than decapped. Kawakamuri – Japanese for ‘skin covered’ is a mark of bad taste. The reverse of the natural state is obtained by retaining the retracted prepuce with a string, so eventually it cannot be extended over the glans. Incidentally Japanese art never represents the penis other than denuded.

Musing at the loss of erogenous tissue, I did a parody on the old music hall song Grandfather’s Clock, which ‘stopped dead, never to go again when the old man died’.

My Grandfather’s cock was hard as a rock
And my granny approved of the size
It was plump as a plum and mostly feeling numb
Well, because all his foreskin had gone;
It was shed on the morn of the day that he was born
Losing natural cover and pride –
“It was clipped back, never to grow again”
The old man cried.

Ninety years without covering,
Roundhead roundhead
No drawback discovering
Roundhead roundhead
It stayed clipped back, never to grow again
When the old man died.

Can't Say No

I usually find something of interest in every issue, but I found two articles of particular interest, issue 3 'A Well Cut Cock' by J.S. of Guernsey, and in issue 4, 'Reply to a Well Cut Cock' by P.T. of Sussex.

Both gentlemen had been fortunate enough to find a surgeon to perform a tight cosmetic circumcision. Stretching the shaft skin very tight when flaccid and pulling the scrotum skin around the base of the shaft forward when erect. The latter gentleman was estimated for a normal circumcision then an extra half inch was cut off to get things really tight.

Is this not dangerous? Is there not a risk of the stitches tearing and the wound bursting open even if he had a minor erection during the recovery period? I would imagine that they would have to be very heavily sedated for a spell. Even after the stitches were removed and the wound healed the scar line would be a weak point and tear open if they indulged in any violent rough action.

After a year or two they will realise that it has been all worthwhile. They will have the much coveted appearance of a well cut cock. Outrageously overexposed and oversexed examples of male perfection. Not my words but stolen from the following article taken from a nudist mag many years ago (possibly in the late twenties or early thirties) also relate to tight circumcisions and I feel it appropriate to publish it as a second follow up to the first. There should be no breach of copyright it is so old and the views expressed possibly outdated.

"If you are circumcised with the head of your penis permanently exposed, how can you make sure that your message reaches on the right people when you strip off on a nudist beach? Even without an erection the sight of a circumcised penis with the head permanently exposed, particularly if it is complimented by a heavy growth of pubic hair, can not fail to indicate maturity and a keen interest in sex.

"A larger percentage of male naturists than any other section of the community seek the help of a plastic surgeon to perform excessively tight cosmetic circumcision.

“Many mature and sexually active nudists have lived to regret it. No matter how much revulsion they may feel towards some undesirable bedmate, they no longer have any control over the signal their body language is radiating.

“Against their will, their body is saying loud and clear; I find you very attractive. My sexual desires are aroused. I am ready — more than willing and at the slightest drop of a pin, I am yours.

“In other words like the words in the Dorris Day song, ‘I can’t say no’. Without actually putting it in to words my penis has been cut and mutilated so that it will never again look flaccid and disinterested in sex.

“The male penis in its natural uncircumcised state is the most sexually expressive part of our bodies, an even better indicator than our face. We can control our facial expression to hide our real feelings but it is far more difficult when totally naked to control our penis.

“Before puberty – a young uncircumcised male will have no pubic hair, his scrotum will be small and tight and he will only expose the head of his penis when urinating. Even after puberty he can only expose the head when has an erection and the head swells enough to hold the foreskin back.

“The head should be visible only when he has an erection and almost reached the point of no return and is bursting for sexual relief. No facial expression or words could give the observer such a strong message.

“In the past male nudists almost without exception have been circumcised and the females have had their breasts enlarged and their nipples altered to stand permanently erect as though the sight of a sexy male penis is turning her on.

“Photographers love this: In body language, messages of sexual desire are being transmitted and received both ways.

“But fashions have changed. Some of the most outrageously oversexed examples of sheer male perfection have not had their male offspring circumcised. Fewer and fewer are having adult circumcisions, and the emphasis now is electrolysis to remove all trace of pubic hair.”

Ideas To Ponder Over

In the book, The Jewish Religion – A Companion by Louis Jacobs, Oxford University Press 1995, p82, is written,

“The operation (circumcision) is so difficult and so disagreeable, that no-one would undergo it unless he sincerely wished to belong to the people of faith.” Also p83,

“In the early days of the Reform Movement some of the Reformers advocated the abolition of circumcision, protesting that the rite was too particularistic, and too cruel to be retained.”

Circumcision is little else than cruelty to many persons who have undergone the operation of circumcision who have no faith whatever in a God who ordained this rite. It is a blessing to others who believe their entire existence and mapped out life-plan is a result of their circumcisions.

To persons carrying out circumcision, cruelty and disagreeableness are surely not part of their vocabulary. Not all circumcisers and medical personnel performing circumcision believe in God either.

Why therefore are not more persons, particularly atheists, not vocal in an endeavour to eradicate this ‘barbaric’ medical procedure? Why also do the far majority of men who have undergone medical (as opposed to religious) circumcision at or near birth not scream out intensely concerning it, particularly those who are atheists?

The answer lies in the deep feelings of exquisite pleasure that can and often enter the mind when one just contemplates circumcision, whether one is religious or not.

An atheist not believing in any god, does not by implication mean that there is no God obviously. Also a God is not just ‘at work’ so to speak only with those who believe in Him. In fact, He is likely just as interested, perhaps even more so, in His creation who do not believe in Him.

It is likely that inexplicable feeling of beauty or just feelings of acceptance concerning one’s circumcision status have been ‘programmed’ in the minds of those who have undergone this otherwise barbaric and unnecessary surgical manipulation and mutilation of our most intimate sexuality.

I strongly believe this to be true, because I have severe burns which somehow do not bother me (only others). I believe this is because I see within my own character something much much stronger and thus inexplicably appealing, because of them. As a male, appearance does not have the same implications as that for women, which also may explain partly why female circumcision is not as an acceptable medical procedure in the World as is that for the male.

Another important fact to the above lies very much in our sub-conscious state, which often can contradict our conscious feelings concerning the emotional pain of having one’s most intimate sexuality put under the surgeon’s knife for all to either see or publicly know about. The appeal of our sub-conscious state concerning circumcision may well be associated with what every human likes to strive for, which is to be different to the masses in some context or other.

Almost all of us yearn to be rich, and for what reason other than to show off to others that we do not need to be subjected to a society's social control any longer. Men and animals are none too different, primarily because of our animalistic sexual urges to impregnate every available female.

Circumcision changes all that in that a temperance of a circumcised male's sexuality almost certainly occurs with circumcision. Even if the physical senses are not significantly affected by circumcision in young males, the circumcised male knows, senses he is different, to both other men and particularly animals, and thus if only psychologically, he gains control of his sexual urges because circumcision means something extremely important to him, sub-consciously.

Circumcision cuts deep in the minds of those who have undergone this otherwise mutilative genital surgery. If one could analyze the mind, it would likely consist of forces opposed and forces content with the surgery. The forces 'opposed' can be tabulated readily – they exist in abundance in medical literature and especially on the internet. Mutilation is but one of them.

The forces 'content' are not easy to tabulate, but in my own experience, when my sexuality is 'awakened' (as opposed to having to awaken it myself), and it is the correct time for enjoying one's sexuality, sexual pleasure is often directly derived from just contemplating or thinking about circumcision. This must be evident to all readers of Acorn magazine. Why do we long to see the next issue, even if we despise circumcision? Maybe we just love to enjoy that which is unenjoyable?

A Contribution

Congratulations on doing a difficult job Steve, in trying to balance pro and anti circ members views and prejudices. We have now had five issues of the magazine produced by you as editor and I must say that they have been both stimulating and generally refreshing.

There have been a few blots such as I.O. – Herts who bemoans the fact that we have a 'Declining membership' while you, the editor, is saying that the membership is slightly up at just over 180.

Of course R.B.W. also trotting out his fantasy of 'A haemorrhaging membership' despite you telling it like it is of a slightly rising membership. His tired litany of 'comments' bemoaning a lifetime of anguish and distress at being circumcised was first aired in 8/98 and we have now read five times of his woes, the latest in 3/2000. I hope he soon gets over his neurotic obsession of being, in his mind, mutilated. Personally I find some of his remarks objectionable and even insulting to the pro circ members. Such polemic we can do well without. Perhaps he would do better to stick with his Nocirc fanatical friends or, having stated his opinions, leave it at that. Constant reiteration is not needed.

In contrast there is C.R. with his Childhood Wish Fulfilled (3/2000) and Peter (1/2001) telling of his Experience, and many others. Men who do not denigrate others but tell of their own feelings.

I find Cavalier Reasoning difficult to follow as his feelings appear to be ambivalent. He says that he suffers with balanitis and his doctor advised him to have it done and stop messing about. He also says that he prefers the look of a tight cut and that the appearance of his cock with the foreskin fully forward tapering to a point looks infantile and pathetic. One can only echo his doctor's comment to stop messing about and have it circumcised then it won't look infantile and pathetic.

K.G. says that his illusions have been shattered with regard to circumcision in New Zealand. I would suggest that the uncut N.Z. man he encountered in the sauna is expressing his own wish to be in the majority although strangely he says that most antipodean men remain in favour of a tightly cut penis. I would like to revive K.G.'s faith in antipodean circumcision. I cannot trot out figures but I can say that the majority of men and boys I know and have seen are circumcised. I am a member of a sports club and see men and boys in the showers and changing room and believe me circumcised cocks well outnumber uncuts. There appears to be a need by some men to extend their own circumcised state or lack of it onto as many others as possible. The imagination is a wonderful thing though often unreliable. For instance some uncut/cut men feel more secure if they consider most other men are like themselves. In that way figures become exaggerated, or even meaningless.

Thank you Steve for your efforts which are appreciated by most of us and I would urge members to put their thoughts on paper to help fill the columns of the magazine. It is great to know that others are interested in the same things and are prepared to share with the rest of the membership.

A Snip In Time Saves Lives

From The Pink Paper, 23/3/01

John Cairns' ignorant attack on circumcision (Letters, 16 March) does not deserve Letter of the Week status. There are now over 40 studies showing that the absence of a foreskin provides a partial (and I emphasise partial) protection against HIV in heterosexual men. As this protection seems to amount to at least a 50 per cent reduction in transmission it represents millions of lives saved.

The effect is not due to 'religious influences'. These, and other confounding factors, have all been investigated and eliminated. It is also simplistic to compare AIDS-ridden and circumcised America with healthy, uncut, and culturally very different Japan. The AIDS epidemic in America is years ahead of that in Japan but it is still mostly caught through passive anal sex or needle sharing. Nobody suggests that circumcision will make any difference then! When it is heterosexually transmitted it is disproportionately so in blacks and Hispanics – precisely the groups where circumcision is least common. Cairns' dismissal of an experiment on one foreskin ignores the work done on live monkeys (not reported on Horizon) that found that they easily contracted the related SIV through Langerhans cells in their foreskins. With so much evidence against him Mr Cairns' position seems like that of the die-hards who will not accept that HIV causes AIDS. Perhaps we can look forward to his next letter telling us that the earth is flat.

Snippets From Around The World

From the Encyclopedia of Unusual Sex Practises (page 62) there is a reference to circumbustion which the Nandi, an African tribe, carried out. The boys were apparently circumcised with a glowing iron that burned off their foreskins as another held it outstretched. Ouch!!

In the same book there is a reference to acuculophiles who are women only sexually aroused by circumcised men. Anybody know such a woman?

From the travel book Madagascar (Hilary Bradt, 1999) Page 21, boys are described as being cut at the age of two and a baby who dies before this may not be buried in the family tomb.

In some rural areas circumcision may still be performed with a piece of sharpened bamboo. The foreskin is not always discarded. In the region of Antambahoka it may be eaten by the grandparents and in the region of Antandroy it could be shot from the barrel of a gun!!

From the lonely planet guide Bali & Lombok page 359, circumcision is described as an elaborate celebration on the island of Lombok. The boys, aged six to eleven, are carried through the village streets on painted wooden horses or lions accompanied by drums and cymbals. The cut is performed without an anaesthetic as each boy must be prepared to suffer pain for Allah. As soon as it is over, they must enact a ritual known as the 'makka' – a kind of obeisance involving a drawn kris dagger which is held unsheathed.

Some men find circumcised cocks attractive. For John, or anyone else, to describe cut men as 'mutilated' could give them a complex!

A Few Books

I did not see anything on 'our subject' – circumcision – in The American Way Of Birth, by Jessica Mitford (New York: Dutton/London: Penguin, 1992). Some years ago, she published another expose, The American Way Of Death.

Poring over David Leddick's Naked Men: Pioneering Male Nudes, 1935-1955 (New York: Universe Publishing, 1997), I was struck by how many of the men who are frontally exposed are circumcised. Notwithstanding the subtitle, some photographs in this book go back to the 1920's: and the subjects were born in the first four decades of the 20th century. The incidence of cuttage revealed in the book is not only fascinating in itself, but it flies in the face of a piece of misinformation still making the rounds here, that 'Circumcision was not common in the U.S. until after World War II'. (Well, boys and girls, just what do you mean by 'common'?) And sometimes that shaky generalization is paraphrased or improved into, 'Circumcision was unusual (or even "very rare") in the States before World War II' — even more absurd.

David Reimer is the subject of John Colapinto's As Nature made Him: The Boy Who Was Raised as a Girl (New York: Harper Collins, 2000). David was twice a victim of medical malpractice: first, when he lost his penis (the masking technical term is ablatio penis) at eight months old, because of a badly bungled circumcision using an electrocautery device; and second, when Dr. John Money and Johns Hopkins Hospital, and other 'experts', tried for several years to raise him as a girl (under the name of 'Brenda'). After the high-profile attention given to David's tragedy, and other occurrences of what the medical industry euphemistically calls 'accidents' (some of them reported in this book), one would piously hope that the use of electrocautery in circumcision would cease: that it would become as obsolete in medicine as calomel. But I fear that will not happen. Some of the obstacles are attitudes: That circumcision is trifling surgery, needing no special skills, and that 'anyone' can do it; That 'we' (health care professionals) always know what's best for 'you' (poor dumb lay customers/patients); That if gadgets are around, let's use 'em, by golly; That 'doctors are entitled to make mistakes' (this last attitude, lamentably, is shared by some lawyers).

Point of View. Some recent contributors to Acorn have extolled 'tight pullovers' (foreskins which fit snugly and require a bit of work, or maybe a lot of work, to retract past the glans). As a contrarian, I will put in my two pence worth in favour of 'loose pullovers'. The boy or man with a 'loose pullover' is lucky: he has a loose foreskin that slips and slides back easily, doesn't need to be tugged at or worked with, or maybe his foreskin is a short one which doesn't fully cover the glans. The guy with such a loose skin will likely feel better, and have more pleasure and fewer problems, than the possessor of a 'tight job'. He'll have most of the advantages of both cut and uncut states (and so will the cut boy or man who has a 'low', loose, conservative circumcision – what I call a 'classic cut').

M.S. – Utah

The Legal Position

It is permissible, in the U.K. at least, for anyone, anywhere to perform male circumcision. It is only legal because it is not illegal. No law has ever been passed against it, primarily one surmises, because of its Biblical sanction, and the somewhat confusing and debatable so-called medical benefits.

Much has been written and said concerning the legal question of male circumcision. The General Medical Council of Britain whose Motto is 'Protecting patients and guiding Doctors' have written a 6 page 'Guidance for doctors who are asked to circumcise male children' very factual document covering all that is required for a doctor to know when undertaking circumcision for consenting parents.

On p4, section7, is stated the following:- "Article 24,3 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified by the UK Government in 1991) states that ratifying states should 'take all effective and appropriate measures with a view to abolishing traditional practices prejudicial to the health of children'. However, this must be balanced against 9.2 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which protects the rights of individuals to practice their religion."

Anyone can offer 'religious reasons' for performing this rite, even if this is not the actual parental reasons. This is because the child may subsequently wish to be circumcised at birth for these same religious reasons. No one can say for certain how the child will grow up and react to his circumcision. Also, he may turn religious because of his circumcision.

However, circumcision for religious reasons refers only to the foreskin being removed. It is extremely doubtful if excising the very sensitive fraenum of the penis can be justified on religious grounds, because religious circumcision as developed from the desert days of Abraham, could not have contemplated this aspect of the procedure which requires great medical skill and dexterity.

No layman, as in the original days of this Biblical command, would contemplate excising the fraenum for religious reasons, simply because he would not have had the necessary skills available at that time in history. Presumably also, God did not change the style of circumcision as medical skills developed. All medical books highly recommend leaving this very sensitive tissue alone also. Anyone with a circumcised fraenum, I feel certain, would win a law suit based upon the above recommended General Medical Council Guidelines.

It would appear from the above, that doctors might well adopt methods of circumcising that reduce the risk of damage to this very sensitive (in more ways than one) area, the fraenum. All clamp devices which fit over the glans, prior to excising the foreskin, and provided the fraenum is not cut first, will secure the very minimum damage to the fraenal area. Cut and suture methods or circumcision where often the fraenum is cut or at least stitched into (the 3 in 1 fraenal stitch) is likely best relegated to the history books, to avoid legal action.

You can obtain the above mentioned document by writing to the General Medical Council in London. I was sent it free of charge.

Reply To Downunder

In 'Downunder' R was absolutely correct in his supposition. In Dr Benjamin Spock's Baby and Child Care, the British version of 1970 still strongly advocated male circumcision in early infancy as without psychological harm, "a good idea, especially if most boys in the neighbourhood are circumcised – then a boy feels 'regular'." Writing from Redbrook in April 1989, Dr Spock stated:-

"There is no medical reason to recommend routine circumcision and I voiced the same opinion in the 1976 revision of Baby and Child Care... My own preference, if I had the good fortune to have another son, would be to leave his little penis alone." Despite his final acceptance of foreskin, the '20th century Kellogg' had given decades of advice, prompting millions of routine circumcisions spanning generations.

Though it is stated that Australia closely follows American trends, in terms of circumcision, it seems that OZ is being influenced by the 'Old Country'. The 1980 circumcision rate of 70% fell dramatically through 30-40% in 1990 to a current 10%. Ie only a tenth of the latest generation of OZ infant males is shorn! According to the Commonwealth Department of Health and Aged Care, there were 38,601 circumcisions throughout Australia in 1980 (all ages) and 18,880 in 1995.

In the USA there has been a downward trend in routine circumcision, but it is no surprise that the practice is still widespread. The 1985 high of 85% represented 1,800,000 neonatal circumcisions dropping to a current 57% (1,100,000 neonatal circumcisions). Unlike in Australia the majority of American baby boys are still routinely clipped – in a land of scars and stripes! Over 50 years from 1940 – 1990 the USA toll of infant foreskins amounted to 65,863,000. Had these foreskins been allowed to develop to maturity, their combined area would be equal to that of 8.7 miles of 15' wide highway. What a preputial pathway to perjury!

Quoting from the Australian Women's Weekly The Baby Book – “Parents who want their sons circumcised are now counselled about the operation and discuss the reasons for wanting the procedure. The vast majority are deciding against this. (Those choosing to have it done are a scant 4-10%) In recent years it has been considered best done at 12 months of age under a general anaesthetic. The discomfort and pain experienced by the child after the operation can also affect the mother and infant relationship.”

In July 1996 the leading paediatrician, Dr Christopher Green, stated in the Australian Women's Weekly - “My view is that circumcision is an unnecessary, unauthorized assault on a child.”

To counter the trend towards genital integrity, an advice group has been set up on the gold coast by Mr Wayne Jacques who believes all males should be circumcised. This is the Australian equivalent of the Gilgal Society, another feature shared with the Mother Country.

Scar Line

Something that has always interested me when the circumcision operation is done by the various operators in the field, is how they decide on the scar line position, how much of the inner/outer foreskin to remove and so on, some operations are so badly done you cannot wonder that the persons concerned are outraged when this has happened, by the child's parents or later in life when he has grown up. Nowadays a lot would depend on the reason for the operation, ritual or surgery by doctors who these days have so little experience in that field. From what one can see the ritual operator with his experience by the number of operations he performs should be a lot better at it than the qualified surgeon, the medical/surgery manuals I have browsed through give very little guidance in the graphic details shown and it's obvious the aesthetic appearance of the surgery has never been considered, the use of clamp devices would depend on the skill of the user as well.

For me, I like to see a neat scar line joining the inner and outer foreskin about 2cm down the shaft with little or no skin bunching behind the coronal ridge when the penis is semi-flaccid, no doubt this is quite difficult to achieve with freehand surgery.

An acquaintance of mine who needed to be circumcised recently told me there was very little pain from the operation, only soreness from the exposed glans, and the site of the local anaesthetic injections, which lasted for about a week, with the stitches dissolving away at the end of that time.

In conclusion I'm sure everyone is left in no doubt that I am a circumcised guy myself and have never regretted my status and am always pleased to contact Acorn readers on a more personal basis to discuss one of our favourite topics.

Long Awaited Second Circumcision

At last I have had my first circumcision put right after waiting many years to have this done. I booked into the Belvedere Private Clinic in London with an overnight stay on October 15th which cost me £950.00 – this included the stay at the clinic which was £150 per night. Everything was great, wonderful treatment and I never felt a thing not even after the local wore off. I had 2 or 3 injections into the base of my penis for the local and I didn't even feel them. The surgeon cut out the old scar and cut another three quarters of an inch off the remaining foreskin which now means that I have no loose skin rolled up behind the glans. I had about 16 self dissolve stitches which healed very quickly. The result is good just what I wanted, a nice tight skin with the glans fully exposed. Included in this price was a check up visit last week and another in three months time just to make sure all is well.

Anyone wanting more information on this Clinic and procedures, please contact me via Acorn and I will give any help you may require. I have had some photo's taken of the stitch line which if they come out o.k. I will be able to show anyone.

A Father's Thoughts

Having read a number of articles that suggest there is a responsibility on parents to decide whether they should or should not have their little boys circumcised, I feel many parents are not given any advice on the subject and many are ignorant of the procedure or too embarrassed to ask. The number of boys circumcised in Great Britain has reduced to an all time low and unless there is a serious dysfunction of the penis where the foreskin is identified as the culprit then circumcision would not be discussed. I doubt therefore that the circumcision question would even enter the heads of most new parents.

Since I was born in 1948, when circumcision was 'fashionable', there has been a rapid decline in the procedure. As circumcision is not generally available on demand on the NHS unless there is a medical justification, much the same as tonsils or appendix would not be removed unless medically necessary, I doubt the issue would be raised with the parents by the medical staff. Consequently as new parents will not be made aware of the possible preventative benefits circumcision could give they will not be in a position to weigh up the pros and cons and come to a considered decision. The decision and therefore the responsibility not to circumcise is therefore being taken by the NHS in much the same way as the NHS is taking the decision on the MMR question by insisting on only paying for the multiple jab and not paying for individual jabs. I appreciate that the final decision on whether to give or not give a child the jabs rests with the parents but at least they are given advice; normally heavily biased on the NHS thinking, but on the issue of circumcision I do not believe parents get any advice at all. No doubt in both cases, and probably in many other cases, cost will have a considerable impact on NHS reasoning. The NHS is struggling to keep up with the number of vital operations it is required to carry out therefore any operations that can be dismissed as unnecessary, therefore cutting costs, will be readily accepted by a cash limited NHS and woe betide any doctor who feels he/she can go against this decision.

If new parents are not advised of the circumcision issue then they can hardly be expected to consider it. For those few parents who may give the issue some thought the cost factor will be an important point. As many young parents are either about to lose an income as the mother/father stops work to look after the child or must consider the additional costs of crèche/nursery care for the child the idea of having to pay privately for the operation will deter many of them. Additionally, unless there is a religious reason for circumcision, many parents may find it difficult to find a doctor prepared to perform a circumcision on their little boy even if they can pay.

As the majority of young men becoming fathers will not be circumcised, and in most cases now their fathers will not have been circumcised either, the whole subject of non-religious circumcision will fade away even more until it becomes a distant echo. No doubt many men my age who were circumcised as babies will say all well and good because they embrace the views of the anti-circumcision lobby but I feel all new parents should make the decision after they have considered all the facts and they should not be denied the information. I realise many of the medical profession will advise that there are no benefits from circumcision and will state there is no medical evidence to support some of the claims made but how often have we seen medical opinion to be wrong and people suffer because a procedure is denied because, until absolute proof is provided, the medical profession stick to their own prejudices.

On a personal note I can say that knowledge of circumcision is not understood by many of the younger generation. My daughter's boyfriend's knowledge of circumcision was very confused when the subject was first brought up during a conversation about the Jews and Muslims. My daughter is doing a degree in Religious Studies and we touched on why circumcision was practised by these two groups. The boyfriend was aware that something was cut off but was not altogether clear which bit until we enlightened him and he was a bit sceptical even after our explanation. My wife and I are naturists (something else the boyfriend is not too sure about but for different reasons) so it was not too long before the boyfriend saw me naked and, of course, he immediately became totally aware of what a circumcised penis looked like. I have quite a visibly pronounced circumcision scar ringing my penis (at least it is when my penis is not totally flaccid) and there is a very evident colour change either side of the scar – what is left of the inner foreskin (between 1 and 2 centimetres) is pale whereas the shaft skin is quite dark in comparison. You will have gathered that the boyfriend is not circumcised and, as it happens, he has quite a long foreskin. I know that after seeing me my daughter and her boyfriend have talked about circumcision but I am not aware that it has gone beyond discussion. My daughter is well aware of the possible benefits of circumcision but I am not aware of her personal feelings about the procedure as she chooses to keep these to herself and I do not consider it is my place to raise the subject with her first; if she and/or her boyfriend asks I will give them my opinion, after that it is up to them.

Although I am circumcised, and my wife is very happy with the state of my penis, my son is uncircumcised; my wife did not consider the operation was necessary and she did not want to raise the issue with the medical staff. Additionally as my wife did not know of any other mother in her circle of friends who had their son(s) circumcised she felt we should follow suit and, somewhat reluctantly, I accepted her decision. I would also add that the issue of circumcision was, as far as my wife can remember, never raised let alone discussed by her friends.

In view of the high cost of adult circumcision I doubt whether either my son or my daughter's boyfriend will get circumcised but you never know I might be wrong. Currently neither has asked me to fund the operation and I expect the idea is waning in their minds.

The Final Look

Some six years ago I met through my work a young man of extraordinary appearance. Then just 22 years of age Paul had long discussions with me about his desire to change his body. He was in the process of having tattoos and piercings on many parts of his body but he drew the line at his cock and balls. He stated that he had something special lined up. I enquired as to what that was and with great embarrassment he said that he could not bring himself to tell me but he might be able to at a later stage. The weeks went by and he volunteered to me his deep desire to be circumcised. It was a subject that was foremost in his mind at all times and was a sexual turn on to him. Paul is straight and masculine. Naturally hairy he expressed his interest in body waxing and asked whether I might assist.

In the privacy of his home I shaved him and used depilatory cream. We discussed circumcision and compared cocks. His uncircumcised cock had something of the anteater look with a long tapering foreskin. It was easy to retract however and he mercifully kept very clean. His first homosexual experience ensued as I caressed him and showed him how he would look and how he might wank as a cut man. His cock was on the large side but not massive. The glans was large however and conically shaped with a round head, deep meatus and pronounced dark rim. The piss slit was very deep and almost divided the head in two. He was proud of his cock and told me that he liked to display himself to men and women but was miserable in his uncircumcised state. Upon closer inspection (euphemism for during a blow job) I noticed a series of pimples around his rim and slightly down on to the shaft of his cock. I made no remark as I had noticed them on other cocks.

Over the months we compared our cocks and I helped him devise a way of keeping his foreskin retracted with some shaped sticking plaster. We indulged in mutual masturbation. He liked me to wank him off by holding his foreskin back and using a lubricant on his knob. He liked to spend whole days as a roundhead and loved to feel his dry glans rubbing against his boxer shorts. He was close to making a decision to go ahead with his cut when he began to display symptoms of diabetes. The symptoms appeared suddenly and unexpectedly. His diabetic nurse advised him after a few weeks of treatment that a problem he had with thrush could be alleviated by circumcision. Apparently thrush thrives in the damp conditions in the genital area and the streamlining of the cock assists in clearing up this condition.

The young man was cut as a priority in a National Health facility under a general anaesthetic and with an overnight stay, full English Breakfast et al.

The diagnosis of diabetes was a considerable blow to the young man. The circumcision of which he was so desirous has compensated him to some extent. He is extremely proud of his new cock and rightly so. The surgeon has done him proud with a beautiful and neat job.

His cock is now proudly displayed at work and in the sports pavilion. He is a fervent advocate of circumcision.

I hope that he will attend an Acorn meeting in due course. He maintains that his tight shaft increases pleasure during penetration. He was to have had a Prince Albert piercing but is now so satisfied that no further modifications are planned.

The white pimples referred to earlier have all but disappeared. It is nearly a year since he was cut. Mercifully he has also given up the idea of more tattoos and some piercings have been removed. He has at last achieved the final look.

From The Other Side Of The Knife

On the recommendation of my son, I have read through several of the letters on this site to gain some sense of the current thinking on the subject, and I would like to share my personal views based on some historical realities that one becomes privy to from a later-life perspective.

My two older brothers and I were born in British hospitals where circumcision is most uncommon. My father was killed just after I was born, and my mother moved us back to Canada and re-married a Toronto widowed doctor with two sons of his own, identical in age to my middle brother and I. As youngsters our summers were spent in cottage country and for boys of our age, genitalia was a topic of great curiosity, conversation and amazement. The British and Canadian versions of the Willy were explored and the accuracy and distance advantages of the Canadian helmeted versions of my step-brothers was much celebrated.

The year I was starting grade three, we returned from the cottage a week early to arrange for school uniforms and books. My brothers and I were all booked into the Orillia hospital for tonsillectomies and were discharged the next day with sore throats and three very tightly skinned willies. We had all been Canadianised.

Both my middle brother and I were delighted with the modifications and could compete equally with our step-brothers in pissing contests.

I had never seen the head of my penis before and I was thrilled to discover that I had one too. The stitches itched and burned for few days, but my step-dad gave us topical cream that numbed the pain and by the time school was to start, the stitches were out, and all was well. My step-dad had arranged for his colleague, a paediatric plastic surgeon to do the procedures and the results were superb. My oldest brother was not so pleased. He would have been 15 at the time and had enjoyed several years of masturbation practice on the natural model prior to the un-consented intervention by our step-dad.

To the day we buried our step-dad, he never forgave him, and remains bitter to this day about the event.

My new exposed knob produced fiery sensations and frequent erections at the most inconvenient times. The sensations led to an early awakening of my sexuality and the premature discovery, with the help of my brothers, of the joys of girlie magazines and how to use them. Our paper route money was invested in an impressive library of skin books, stored in the sanctuary of the 'boys only' club in the loft above the garage, which also stored a wide array of household lubricants and Kleenex by the box. My older step-brother in particular proved to be an invaluable source of information and facts, real and imagined, about creative methods of masturbation and details of the female anatomy.

My early metamorphosis didn't really reveal itself to me as a surgical event until my first year as an intern during a general surgical rotation, when I witnessed first hand, an adult circumcision. The patient was about my age, twenty or so, and had history of severe and disfiguring infections that had rendered his penis useless. The surgeon, with great care, restored a functional and aesthetically pleasing sex organ from the disaster he was presented.

My (step) father and I had become great friends, and he took a daily interest in my education, shepherding me through a system that I would have not been able to get through on my own. I told him about my revelation and asked him why he had me and my brothers circumcised shortly after adopting us? He explained that he served the first half of his medical career as a Railroad physician travelling the north coast of rural Newfoundland. Each village was visited every six to eight weeks. He said you just can't understand how poor, poor can be, unless you travelled rural Newfoundland in the 1940's. The priest would usually greet my dad and review the home births and deaths so my dad could sign the certificates. The trend that disturbed him the most was how a village could actually lose all its children in a single month. With entire families, often spanning several generations, living in one or two rooms, sanitary facilities being nonexistent and baths being a spring event; disease, particularly infections, spread from child to child carried by lice, and the convenience pathogens exploit with children in close quarters, huddling to stay warm. Any humid, enclosed space proved a rampant breeding ground for infection. Pink eye, ear, nose and throat and genital infections, both male and female were common and severe or lethal. With poor nutrition, appalling sanitation, virtually no antibiotics and soap and water being a luxury, rural medicine became an exercise in epidemiological management. The rural health care plan implemented during my dad's time included routine vaccinations, tonsillectomies and circumcisions which collectively cut the juvenile morbidity rate by more than half. (It would be laughable to lump so many interventions into the same statistical body today.) My father and a single nurse would process as many as 100 children a day in a railcar hospital barely eight by forty feet. My father's interest was in saving children's lives and in weighing his options, he felt he was acting in the best interest of public health. Vaccinations and the minor childhood surgical procedures were seen by him and his colleagues as parts of a plan to improve public health and reduce the number of juvenile death certificates they signed each week; nothing more.

I served my surgical residency at the largest paediatric hospital in Toronto. As the worst medical student (with the best surgical skills) I was regularly assigned the circs. On any morning, there would be twenty to forty boys lined up for the procedure. (Circs were done the day before discharge, back when child birth was a four day process.) This was the early seventies and most (at least two thirds) of boys were circed then. The nurses would tag the boys not to be done, rather than the ones to be done. We came up with a simple method of marking a little 'C' with a line through it on their tummy with a felt tip surgical marker to avoid paperwork confusions. When I was trained, we used metal bell screw clamps that were horrid things. They required three hands to operate, were impossible to keep straight and left a crush line signature that remained with the lads for life. The plastic bells were a great improvement. With a delicate touch they left no scar line at all and were far less traumatic for the young lads. The hospital was reluctant to spend the money on the disposable device, so we systematically threw out the screws and bells from the metal ones to get them out of service. At the time, we didn't think of it as anything but normal. Some parents didn't want it; that was fine with us as it was less work. During that rotation, I likely did a thousand or more circs, and I never regarded any of them as routine. I had seen some really bad circs, especially from the metal clamp days, and I always took care to make a nice job that the boy would be proud of.

After that rotation, I didn't have much to do with circs as I moved onto a speciality. The topic came up again when the ultrasound image of a tiny penis appeared during my wife's first pregnancy – several such images were to follow. The tide had turned on circumcision, and for all the reasons it once seemed like a good idea, it now seems barbaric. Children no longer slept six to a bed, and indoor plumbing and soap and water had redefined the way that infectious organisms move amongst us. Tonsils were remaining in place, teeth had no cavities, and foreskins no longer posed a public health threat, real or perceived. Our paediatrician said that it was becoming so rare to circumcise that the procedure had been moved from the hospital to a clinic off campus. My four boys all made it through to their 'girlie magazine in the loft' stage with foreskins to explore. The boys were raised in the same house I was raised in and used the same loft as a 'Boys only club'.

My youngest lad was circumcised, at his request at age sixteen. He is diabetic and had a life long battle with balanitis. He is happy with the result, and glad to be rid of the infections. My oldest son was circumcised two years ago when he converted to Judaism prior to marrying his lovely wife. My two middle sons remain foreskined, unmarried and wild on the streets of Queens University in Kingston, where they are both following the family tradition of low academic standing in medicine.

I retired from orthopedics in 1998 and joined a rural general practice shared with other semi-retired doctors. We service several small northern communities in much the same way my father did. This has re-acquainted me with little boys, big boys and their willies. I was shocked and amazed to discover what a big issue circumcision had become, and how traumatized and passionate males had become about it. As I move from village to village, (we now fly rather than go by train) I am amazed to discover that there is either a pro or anti circumcision culture, and vocal about it. In some of the native communities, we have begun to do routine (I hate that word) infant circumcisions, simply because if we don't, the tribal elders will, and we are far better qualified. But twenty minutes by air, the next village will have every male intact.

The clinics are producing some really interesting walk in cases, from circumcised men reportedly traumatized since birth wanting their foreskins restored, to an alarming number of home circumcisions gone bad. (Please don't do that OK) It takes every ounce of civility I have to walk from a lower leg amputation, a life threatening ailment to find the next case is some guy that wants me to put his foreskin back and expect sympathetic treatment.

From this end of the knife, I believe, every male has a right to choose, I don't hurt babies, and don't do any procedures that are not completely necessary as it places the patient at unnecessary risk, and occupies time that could be devoted to critical cases or my family. It is no longer required or appropriate to routinely circumcise boys. In my circle, I don't know of a single doctor that would perform this procedure without just medical cause or the informed consent of the penis owner. There are still a few doctors in urban areas that circ babies for money (we successfully lobbied for the removal of infant circumcision from the public health fee schedule in every province in Canada) and we unaffectionately referred to them as 'Willy Butchers'. They are considered the bottom feeders of the medical community.

Circumcision Bonds Us Together

Circumcision promotes, indeed fosters male bonding with other circumcised males. We circumcised need to first bond, and then break that bond in becoming marriageable, and fostering family life. It does seem important therefore that circumcised males should be encouraged to bond with each other as early in age as possible, such that the bonding which our circumcision promotes, can then be broken, if indeed it needs to be!

It does appear that circumcised males, deprived for whatever reason of their deep rooted need to associate with other circumcised, or intact males, will find promotion of the other side of their sexuality, the procreative side, somewhat inhibited.

The following is a quote from the book, Tahitians, Mind and Experience in the Society Islands, by Robert Levy, Prof of Anthropology, University of Chicago Press, 1973, in a discussion of young Tahitian boys to become supercised, wherein the foreskin is cut open on its upper surface so that the glans becomes fully exposed, the two sides of the foreskin hang down below the glans, nothing being actually removed, quote page 472, 'In the supercision event, wherein the head of the penis is freed, the boys will enter a time of erotically tinged solidarity with other boys. In turn they will have to free themselves from one another and, with some hesitation and regret, establish families' unquote.

I believe that all of us who are circumcised should pursue our deepest cravings, desires and needs in this our circumcised experience in life. How might this best be accomplished? The Acorn Society is an excellent beginning! We need to fulfil desires we may not realize that we have, e.g. to possibly experience all aspects of our missing foreskin on other intact males (most girls experience this, so why not us? - this surely must be our intrinsic right, no?)

Most Males go through some form of homosexual phase at/near adolescence. It is there within all of us. However, I believe the circumcised need to spend much longer in this phase, possibly an entire lifetime, in order for 'completeness' as circumcised individuals to occur.

Questions

After some hesitation, I have decided to renew my membership of Acorn. I think I may not be alone in having been put off to some extent by a mixture of pro-circ gay erotica (or so it appears to me) and anti-circ whinge. Of those two, I prefer the former, as it is at least honest and upbeat, but even so I find (not being gay myself) that this kind of writing cloyes rather quickly.

I take the editor's point, however, that the quality of the magazine depends entirely on the quality of the contributions, and I think Acorn is at its best when it answers questions that people have always wanted to ask about this taboo subject but haven't so far dared.

So here are my questions on the subject

1. How young does one have to be circumcised in order to get the optimum appearance. A fully bare glans, flat shaft skin of uniform colour, and no visible cut line at all?

2. Given the difficulties caused by the very small size of the baby penis, is a better cosmetic result achieved (and more safely) if circumcision is postponed until the age of, say, 2 years?
3. Taking into account the answers to (1) and (2) above, what is the ideal age at which to circumcise?
4. Who does it better, a doctor or a mohel?

Male Circumcision Is Found To Reduce Cervical Cancer

From New York Times, April 11 2002.

Circumcising men may significantly reduce the rate of cervical cancer in women by decreasing the spread of sexually transmitted virus that causes nearly all cases of cervical cancer, researchers are reporting.

A study being published today in The New England Journal of Medicine provides important scientific evidence for a link that scientists have long suspected.

The new findings are based on 1,913 couples in five countries including 977 couples in which the woman had cervical cancer and 636 couples without cancer. Researchers found that circumcision made a difference if the man had had six or more sex partners, which made him more likely to have contracted the cancer causing human papilloma virus, or H.P.V. In those couples, the risk of cervical cancer was more than double if the man was not circumcised.

The findings may not apply to couples in which the man has had fewer than six sex partners, because he is less likely to be carrying H.P.V.

The researchers say uncircumcised men may be more likely than others to contract H.P.V. because the lining of the foreskin is especially vulnerable to the virus. Their study which used DNA testing to look for penile H.P.V. in the men, found that uncircumcised men were about three times more likely to be infected.

Of the 1,913 men in the study, 1,215 had had six or more partners, and 1,543 were not circumcised.

The researchers, led by Dr Xavier Castellsague of the Llobregat hospital in Barcelona, used data from several studies in Brazil, Spain, Thailand, Columbia and the Philippines.

H.P.V. is common, and 20 million Americans are thought to be infected. The virus has about 100 strains, including 30 that are sexually transmitted. Not all the strains can cause cervical cancer, and even when women contract a strain that does, most eliminate the virus from their bodies without developing cancer. Some doctors recommend condoms to prevent H.P.V., but others say they may not work as well for this virus as they do for other infections.

In the United States, there are about 13,000 cases of cervical cancer a year and 4,100 deaths. Doctors often say it is a disease that no women should die of. It is easily detected by a Pap test, and the death rate in North America has declined in the last decade.

Worldwide, there are about 466,000 cases of cervical cancer a year. Each year, 231,000 women die of the disease, mostly in developing countries, and in some of those countries the death rate is not declining.

An editorial in The New England Journal of Medicine noted that worldwide, 25% of all men are circumcised. It also said that in the United States in the 1970's about 80% of all newborn boys were circumcised, but that the rate had dropped since then because medical groups like the American Academy of Pediatrics said the procedure did not have enough benefits to recommend its routine use.

Dr Dimitrios Trichopoulos, a professor of cancer prevention and epidemiology at the Harvard School of Public Health and a coauthor of the editorial, said the new study provided medical argument for circumcision. Dr Trichopoulos said that on the strength of the study, if he had a newborn son he would have him circumcised. If the global circumcision rate could be increased to about 75%, he said, it could lead to a 23% to 43% drop in the incidence of cervical cancer.

But Dr Trichopoulos said that he doubted that such a rate would ever be reached, because of costs and other factors. "This is an area where you have political and religious sensitivities", he said.

Dr Carol L Brown, a gynaecologic oncologist and expert on cervical cancer at Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center in Manhattan, said that a study like the one being reported today should be done in this country before doctors considered making recommendations about circumcision in the United States.

"This data is good, but we have different populations," Dr Brown said, adding that H.P.V. strains may differ, that circumcision rates are relatively high and that it cannot be assumed that the findings would be the same in the United States.

First, let me say that I believe that Acorn has a real future. Some people have argued that, in the age of the internet, it is no longer needed. I don't buy that. Go into any newsagent, any airport, and see the racks of magazines covering everything from motoring to music, archaeology to angling. If there can be magazines for all these interests, why not circumcision? The internet is a wonderful source of information but that information is often poorly organised, difficult to find and inaccurate. Not everyone has the time, inclination, skills or technology to surf. We are the alternative – sit back, read, enjoy. ☺

I have a number of ideas for developing Acorn and I will talk about these in forthcoming issues. But I regard Acorn members as a community; for some of us who have been subscribing for many years, it was our first contact with guys who found the topic of circumcision as fascinating as we did, our first realisation that we were not in a minority of one. So what we have to say is of great interest to each other – whether it's our own reasons for being interested, our experiences – in the doctor's surgery, in the gym changing room, in bed (but not too much detail please!) – our thoughts, our opinions. This is not my magazine, it is our magazine. Everyone has to contribute for it to work. Think of it like a conversation – if there are a group of us round the table, and only I am talking, it is soon going to become very boring. So please, please, write to me at Acorn, or email me at the address below. It doesn't have to be a brilliantly polished article – short or long, whatever the angle you have on circumcision, please contact me. And if you want to be controversial, why not?

But just one thing on that latter point. I think controversy is good and stimulates debate. But overall, it is my intention to keep Acorn balanced. It is a magazine for both the cut and the uncut, for those pro the foreskin and those against, and those who just want to know more.

With your help, we can make the bi-monthly arrival of Acorn a real event.

Subincision Amongst The Australian Aborigines

Although not as common today, Australian native aboriginal men still practise the operation of subincision called 'ariltha', upon their youths, usually just weeks after they have been circumcised.

This is accomplished by pinioning the 'novice' onto a 'table' formed by two males already subincised years earlier, then the young lad's penis is grasped tightly by the recently circumcised glans, and then it is pulled tightly towards his stomach so that the underside of the penis is both in full view and entirely straight.

A piece of flint or stone knife is then inserted into the glans opening, and the entire under surface of his glans is cut permanently some  $\frac{1}{2}$ " deep, thus opening up his urethra or ejaculation tube for usually around one inch in length. This cut is extended at later operations, so that the entire penis, from the glans meatus (urinary opening) to the scrotum, is cut open on its underside, and then he must, of necessity, urinate in the squatting position. This allows him to both relate to, and to 'live', his feminine side. Indeed the operation is designed to make the penis resemble the female sexual organs, and to promote by further blood letting subincising operations, female menstruation (until of course his subincision finally reaches his scrotum).

There is a very good section on subincision in the book Coming Into Being Among the Australian Aborigines by Ashley Montagu, Routledge & Kegan Paul Publishers (London 1937, page 317) quote, 'Among the Fijians, the Tonga Islanders and the natives of the Amazon Basin of Brazil, subincision is carried out chiefly as a therapeutic measure, being considered by the Fijians to be a preventative of many diseases.'

For Acorn readers, there is an excellent, and very enjoyable (if you are into the subject) article of a young tightly circumcised American male, with all the associated photographs of the procedure, who went through a subincision operation in the mid 1990's, for more than an inch, showing what the subincision appearance is like after the healing (and prior to healing!). Its appearance is very erotic to some people, and rarely if at all offputting!

He does state in the article that peeing is 'splashier' but fellatio intensified by the titillation of the exposed urethral tube, and greater effective area of sensitivity. He is quoted in the article saying that he will extend his subincision further!

It is interesting that when entirely subincised, the penis is often worn permanently inverted with the glans 'tied' to the stomach, with peeing being accomplished in the feminine style, without any need to touch the penis at all. Radically circumcised males, with frenulum totally removed in circumcision, are best predisposed to subincision operations, since an intact frenulum poses problems.

Anyone out there care to get in touch with his feminine side? If so, possibly the best contact would be the editor of the magazine which published the young American male undergoing subincision (it is very bloody – be warned!) Write to:-

My Contribution

I have felt over the last few years that the contributions to the newsletter are becoming less pro-circumcision than in the past. When I joined the Society I got the impression that we were like minded people, generally in favour of circumcision but quite willing to consider and discuss other viewpoints, as well as other activities associated with the male organ. We now seem to be being taken over by the anti brigade.

One comment that appears time and time again is that relating to the feeling of being damaged as a child by having had one's foreskin removed. Whilst I can understand the reason for this, it goes without saying that parents have a responsibility for the psychological well being of their child as well as the physical – sadly most seem frightened, too embarrassed, or whatever, to discuss sexual matters of any sort with their children. A little reassurance can go a long way.

Whilst prepubescent and waiting to have my tonsils removed in hospital, a doctor carried out a prolonged masturbation 'examination' including repeatedly pulling my foreskin tightly back and as far forward as possible, fully exposing the glans. It did not hurt and resulted in me discovering, earlier than I otherwise might, pleasures to be had with the penis. It was some years later (and after considerable experience with other boys) that I put two and two together and realised that he was probably considering circumcision while I was having my tonsils removed. Sadly it wasn't done. The matter was never discussed with me by my parents or the doctor at the time.

Whilst at junior school I became interested in circumcision and at secondary school it became an obsession, seeking out only circumcised friends. It wasn't until my early thirties I decided to get the job done. Until then I had got considerable satisfaction from simply keeping my foreskin permanently retracted, but it wasn't enough! The only place I could find to do what I wanted, without a letter from my own doctor, was the Marie Stopes clinic in London. There, a doctor Houssain did the necessary. The end result is excellent, even though there is a noticeable scar line some distance down the shaft and rather uneven. I have seen considerably neater results.

Now, to the point of all this. I have had the pleasure of examining many circumcised cocks and discussing the circumstances of when, where etc., it was done with their owners. Also I have had written contact with over one hundred people who have had adult circumcisions. I have noted the following. Not one person, done as an adult, has regretted it, indeed most wish they had got it done sooner. The physical appearance of an adult circumcision is less natural looking than when it has been done pre-puberty. The conclusion doesn't need me to state.

Life Modelling

I have noted from a few of the letters from previous issues of the newsletter that a fair number of the members are naturists. Having been a naturist myself for many years being nude has never bothered me and to coin a phrase 'if I never had to wear clothes again it would be too soon'. Unfortunately the weather and other restrictions make this a pipe dream. I have only mentioned naturism, as these members will be reasonably happy being nude whilst others may not, therefore Life Modelling may not be for them.

I read in a naturist magazine recently that some Job Centres were now refusing to advertise positions for Life Models as they did not consider they should promote or appear to be promoting such employment. This decision was being condemned by Art Clubs and Colleges etc as unreasonable. Shortly after reading this article I noticed an advertisement in my local Job Centre for a Life Model to model at evening classes at a local College of Further Education (CFE); the advertisement disappeared within a couple of days; you can make your own minds up why. Thinking about the magazine article I took the bull by the horns and applied. Within a few days I received an application form which I duly completed and returned. I then gave some thought to whether other CFEs might require a Life Model so I approached two other local CFEs who also ran Life Drawing Courses to offer my services. Both responded very quickly; one asking me to complete a similar form to the first CFE I approached, the other, surprisingly, contacting me by telephone at 9.30 at night just after that night's class had finished.

The lecturer rang advising that the current Life Model for her class had just advised that they were unable to attend the next session. This had left the lecturer in need of someone at short notice (one week). It was apparent to me from this rather frantic telephone call that there was obviously no pool of Life Models from which to select a replacement and my offer, made about three weeks prior to the telephone call, was being urgently taken up.

I advised the lecturer that I had never been a Life Model before so to expect someone who was very willing to learn but who had absolutely no experience. I was immediately asked that I understood I would be required to model nude and in front of a number of art students of both sexes and of various ages. I advised I had no problem with this but would need instruction on poses etc and could only hope I could hold a pose for the time required. The lecturer was content and I agreed to attend 30 minutes prior to the class starting to get some initial instructions.

I duly turned up at the agreed time and place and met the lecturer who advised the students were going to do a number of ten minute or so sketches so I would be required to do a number of short poses; as it happened they were: three standing, four sitting on a stool, three sitting on a rug on the floor and one kneeling. The class consisted of twelve students: three males and nine females. I was required to pose in the middle of the room and the students were in a ring around me. As the pose changed I was required to half turn so the students could view me from different angles and could draw front, side and rear views. I had two short breaks and the two hours went by surprisingly quickly. During the breaks the students exchanged ideas and compared drawings etc. I was able to view the drawings and I was most impressed by the standard of the sketches and the fact that the students had been able to get such a lot of detail into the drawings in such short periods. I was amused by the varying degree of detail the students sketched when I was full frontal to them. The older students drew the body in detail and showed a couple of lines etc for the penis; the four young female students, although doing good body detail, all had drawn my circumcised penis in considerable detail. It may be that my circumcised state was something of a rarity and therefore, because many young 18ish year old girls may not have seen a cut penis before, it got more attention than usual, any way the lecturer did not make any comment. I dare say a younger uncircumcised male (I am over fifty) would be most welcome as a model. In my area so I understand female Life Models are more readily available and male models are few and far between.

I suppose stripping naked and being the only naked person in a room amongst a class of fully clothed students takes a certain frame/attitude of mind and I appreciate many people would be too self conscious/embarrassed to do it; consequently this may be why Life Models are at times, so I understand, difficult to find. It is not surprising therefore that when the existing model was unable to attend none of the students nor the lecturer was prepared to take on the role even for two hours.

It may be that some of our membership would like to try their hand at Life Modelling and I would suggest they pick some college prospectuses and write offering their services. I would point out that the hourly rate paid is quite good so if one can overcome one's inhibitions it could make a reasonable earning supplement. However the work is generally irregular and you need to get known about – once you get a break however it is surprising how quickly your name gets around the Art circles and people start contacting you. You may find that CFEs and Art Clubs in your area are keen to get a male Life Model so you could find yourself in demand.

My Cock

With regard to the points of view of M.S. of Utah, I have to say I think the idea of a 'loose pullover' is somewhat contradictory to the whole purpose of circumcision. A loose circ somewhat defeats the concept of cutting away the foreskin so that it doesn't cover the glans, thereby eliminating the atmosphere in which germs etc. can thrive. Surely anyone with the loose circumcision would not expect a situation where he could pull skin forward. The ideal circumcision should be tight, with no mobility and no chance of skin slipping forward on to the glans, which should stay dry and germ free. Another plus point for circumcision is the possibility that unfettered, the glans rim will expand thereby creating a much more prominent 'mushroom head' which will also give greater sexual stimulation and, being dry and possibly a bit de-sensitised, longer lasting and much improved sex – eliminating any potential premature ejaculation.

I love cocks, especially obviously tightly cut American guys. I am a regular subscriber to Playgirl, which I find a real turn on. My own cock is average to good – nearly seven inches on a good day! I have a deep sub-incision opening up the whole of the underside of my glans plus a bit beyond where I have cut away an old prince albert piercing. This allows me to wear, through the upper side, a one cm thick short barbell, one end ball of which sits neatly in my extended piss hole the other appearing to be poised on the upper side of my glans. Also, some years ago, therefore fading a bit now, I had my whole glans tattooed a deep maroon shade – to make it stand out! It hurt at the time, but I still think it was a great idea!

I realise that not all the above is strictly about circumcision, but I'm sure there are guys out there with an all round interest in cocks and who have carried out various additional enhancements. I would like to think that this letter might stimulate a few to put pen to paper. I hope so. I, for one, would really love to read about your cock dear reader.

Means To An End

Having read on a number of occasions in the Newsletter about members carrying out self-circumcisions or going to a clinic, paying a high fee and not necessarily getting the type of circumcision they want, it appears we are in need of advice on whether there are any surgeons prepared to carry out circumcisions, at a reasonable price (say £200 or less) and with a no questions asked why a guy wants the operation. I appreciate there may be some medical questions that need to be cleared such as high blood pressure, allergies etc but there should be no probing into personal reasons.

I have a copy of the List of Circumcisers issued by the Gilgal Society but it is somewhat out of date and seems to concentrate on high price clinics or religious (Jewish/Muslim) circumcisers. As I doubt whether many members would wish to convert to either faith it is probable (not certain) that such circumcisers would refuse to perform the operation or again charge high prices.

As I see it, the major factors (and there are many more) behind many guys who wish they were circumcised not opting for the operation are:

- 1) Embarrassment at approaching their GP.
- 2) The knowledge that unless they have a real medical need their GP will (probably) not be able or prepared to arrange a referral to a specialist. It is unlikely the GP would be prepared to carry out the circumcision him/herself.
- 3) The operation is not available on the NHS except for medical reasons.
- 4) The high and in many cases prohibitive cost of getting the operation carried out at a clinic.
- 5) The (probable) searching questions asked about why the operation is wanted.
- 6) The thought of refusal because there is no physical medical need (I am not going to explore the area of psychological need).

I do not consider that- post operative soreness etc is a reason for not having the operation; this is something a guy would be prepared to put up with.

Having gone through the trauma of getting a circumcision in the first place the likelihood of trying to justify a revision on cost and/or medical grounds is not something many guys would want to go through.

In Issue 3/1999 – Another Circumcision Clinic – a member highlighted the Emergency Plus Clinic at Byfleet who were offering adult circumcision (and I would add revisions) for £195. Sadly, I understand, this clinic no longer exists. Surely there must be other small clinics, centres, surgeons around who would/are prepared to offer circumcisions/revisions at a reasonable price and minimum questions asked. Do we have any members from the medical profession or any other profession who know of such people/places? A short note to the Editor for inclusion in the Newsletter would be helpful, then at least we would all have the benefit of that knowledge.

I have not touched on the self-circumcision proposals as I would be too squeamish to ever have contemplated such drastic action and as I am already cut I have no reason to do it. However far be it for me to say 'do not do it' but it seems rather painful to me and unless you are able to do it under reasonably sterile conditions you run the risk of infection.

Response to C. B.

Having had a chance to read the 'Means To An End' article before publication I felt I ought to respond to it on behalf of the Gilgal Society.

Any list of doctors, clinics, etc offering circumcision is only as good as the input it gets. The Gilgal Society's list is continually being updated and the latest version will always be sent to someone ordering it.

I agree that the list has very few ordinary doctors on it at present. This is because they do not/cannot advertise their special services. The Jewish and Muslim communities compile their own lists of doctors, mohelim, etc offering circumcision. We have reproduced the basic data from these lists to make ours more comprehensive.

The fact that a doctor is noted as being Jewish, or versed in Islamic requirements, doesn't stop them from offering non-religious circumcision, and indeed several do. Similarly there are some Mohelim who will willingly circumcise a Gentile baby. Where we know this for certain, we publish the fact.

We are always pleased to receive details of additional doctors, clinics, etc where one can obtain a circumcision for oneself or one's son. So if you know of a suitable doctor please let the Acorn editor know and also us. Our address is PO Box 21675, London, SW16 4WY, or by e-mail to info@gilgalsoc.org

The Wanking Cavalier

At boarding school in the late 50s and early 60s, the split (in my house) was roughly 2 to 1 in favour of roundheads. We cavaliers were not teased or looked down upon, but I always felt inferior and all the successful boys and sports stars seemed to be roundheads. I know now that this wasn't true but it appeared so at the time. As we all showered, changed and slept communally, there was no shyness and every boy knew the status, size etc of all the other boys. As I was an early developer and was fully grown with a thick pubic bush, other boys who were still small and hairless sometimes asked to see mine – in a purely non-sexual way.

I suppose that my knowledge of cocks was expanded at the age of 15 when a friend challenged me to show him my cock with a hard-on: this I did willingly and we each then wanked together, which we continued to do, eventually getting to wank each other. He was also a cavalier, larger than my 5 inches and with a foreskin which didn't quite cover his helmet. This was all done in a totally non-sexual way and was just the release for a huge explosion of testosterone at 15 or 16.

I then also started wanking with another friend, this time a roundhead. We'd been swimming and I just said to him "Let's wank" – so we did and continued to do so for some time – I recall that we used Vaseline for lubrication – not ideal! He had a fairly impressive cock – very cleanly circumcised with a scar quite far back (as I recall), no frenulum and low hanging balls. His cock was probably 6 or 7 inches. When hard I could pull the shaft skin just up to the rim of his helmet.

Then there was another boy with whom I wanked once – also a roundhead, but very thin and quite long – a strange looking cock!

All this while I had a foreskin which could not be retracted and it was only at 17 under heavy persuasion from another roundhead friend who made me pull the skin back totally – very painful with a raging hard-on, an extremely tender helmet (it continued to be so for some years) – and a pool of cum on the classroom floor as I simultaneously got the skin right back and shot my load! I am grateful to this friend for making me get the skin back, as I don't know what would otherwise have happened and I was afraid of embarking on any heterosexual adventure in this state for fear of splitting the skin or worse.

Strangely enough, we never had medical inspections at school, so the plight of my un-retractable foreskin was never discovered – had it been, I'm sure the circumciser's knife wouldn't have been far behind! We had a couple of boys who left on the holidays as cavaliers and returned as roundheads – nothing much was said, apart from perhaps a passing comment as to the altered status.

As I said earlier, all this playing around was done purely for relief and I don't think there was any trace of gayness etc. – it was purely a matter of getting one's rocks off in a very cloistered environment. But it certainly taught me a lot and I am sure that there were many other instances of the same thing happening with other boys.

Only once did I see a cavalier retract his foreskin in the showers! Whether I wasn't observant or if it just wasn't done, I don't know. Several of the roundheads had what we called a 'left-hand thread', where the shaft and helmet would bend around to one side or the other.

Strangely enough, after I left school, I became much more cock-shy for a while – strange when I had been parading it around for so many years!

Lastly, another related affliction I still have – an inability to pee in public. Have any other members been affected this way and what is the cure?

A Works Outing

At the last Acorn meeting David stated that we were there because we liked cocks. Implying, I thought, that we were a little eccentric being interested in such an arcane subject.

My experience is that we are not alone and do indeed share our interest with many other males, probably a majority.

The twice yearly works outings to Blackpool always follow a predictable and well trodden path. Up to fifteen lads crowd into a hired minibus for a day and a night on the town. Half way to Blackpool the first of the many cock displays takes place at the roadside. The peeing gives way to surreptitious glances followed by much pulling and shaking to increase length and girth. Back on the bus the talk turns from soccer to cock. The boasting commences and the first cock appears closely followed by a few others. Craig wins the day with the passable imitation of a vegetable marrow.

At the boarding house fifteen guys are spread between five rooms. Immediately clothes are removed baths and showers run, hair is gelled, Ben Sherman shirts are put on. Cocks are on open display in all rooms. Socks are put on before boxer shorts. Most cocks are semi erect, only a couple are limp and two are fully erect. All are uncut.

Next, to the first of many pubs. After two pints the first cock emerges on the dance floor followed by five others, one for each of the six Geordie girls that are dancing topless – surprise, surprise!

With the pub crawl in full swing, two of the party return to the boarding house. Henry and Raymond have ‘just come out’ to their mates. Stunned silence is followed by congratulations. “at least they’ve got the bollocks to admit it” remarks a friend.

Later on beds are moved around and rooms switched to accommodate the happy couple.

Back in the ‘straight’ rooms cocks are on open display, despite the boasting there have been no conquests of the opposite sex. Young Phil, the virgin, nearly pulled but not before she had lifted his wallet with £80 while declaring her undying love. A masturbation contest gets underway, whoever shoots most & furthest wins two cans of Carling. Kevin jumps on top of naked Gary. They simulate sex. It goes on for a suspiciously long time. Kevin’s boxer shorts are pulled down by Alan revealing a large hard shaft “two cans of Carling for the one who puts a cock in his mouth first” says Alan. Gary obliges to much barracking. Gary and Kevin lie back cocks in the air.

I broached the subject of circumcision, immediately some of the lads close their legs in mock horror. A couple seem interested in talking. They agree that a cut cock looks better and I give a demonstration of wanking techniques.

On the journey home there is some talk of the Geordie girls, but mainly the talk is about cocks. Henry and Raymond sit silently and apart at the back. Kevin and Gary arrange to stay the night together when they get back. In six months something like this will repeat itself.

Tall Oaks From Little Acorns Grow

Having enjoyed the articles on circumcision in Acorn over the last few years, I thought it might be of interest to add my own views and reminiscences as a sixty five year old male.

I was circumcised as an infant and became aware that I was different from the majority of other boys whilst at Junior school. My mother informed me I had been 'cut' because of phimosis soon after birth. In our county area in Berkshire, few of my contemporaries had been cut.

I was aware of an interest in other boys' genitalia from an early age. I was too shy then to take much action in examining other boys' cocks except surreptitiously. I passed my eleven plus early and went on to a grammar school; first to a school in Northants which had originated as a funk-hole for Oxford College fellows and later at a grammar school near London. In Northants, we had nude swimming in the summer and a strong emphasis on sport in the winter so I had plenty of opportunity to compare and contrast. Only four of us in my form of about twenty were cut. When we moved to Hertfordshire I found about one third of pupils at my new school had been cut, though opportunities for viewing were less good. It was reassuring to find that there were more of us around!

My background was essentially 'lower middle class' my father was a head gardener working for landed gentry and later working for Hertfordshire County Council.

I went to Cambridge university in 1955 to a college which was notoriously supposed to be a hotbed of the upper class. Maybe, but this was not my experience and I had three happy years there. Not being in the least sporty and at that stage very closeted I had few opportunities to see my contemporaries' cocks. A lot of my friends that were ex public school assured me that most men in this generation in this college would be cut and would be even in the 1980s.

A summer job in a factory offered more opportunities to examine other men's cocks.

After graduating, I worked as a librarian in two modern universities and finally in Oxford. Gradually I 'came out' after various attempts to have relations with women, which never got beyond the stage of idealistic friendship. There were various attempts at relationships with men and my own observations led me to assume that about one quarter to one third of my contemporaries were cut.

It was only after becoming 'legal' and working in Oxford that I did very much about things. I became friendly with an older man who had graduated at Oxford around 1940. He was a keen naturist and introduced me to gay naturism. He was circumcised and was inclined to be amused at my particular interest in other men who were circumcised. When I started to attend meetings he called it an obsession!

The first naturist meeting I went to in London had seven men present and five of us were circumcised. Subsequent meetings I attended at various naturist groups in London had a high proportion of men who had been circumcised. I observed that it seemed to be comparatively rare in men born after 1950. I have seen in New Society by Gavin Weightman a statement that circumcision became rare after the medical profession changed its mind over the value of the operation and the NHS ceased to provide it free.

I have been hosting naturist meetings myself over the years and occasionally have organised meetings for 'Acorns' which the participants seemed to enjoy it as it gives them common ground. I think that the proportion of gay men who have been circumcised at birth or later is higher than the national average. The score for cut and uncut at recent meetings I have organised and attended is about 50/50.

There certainly appears to be a regional variation in that few cut guys come from Ireland or Scotland and it is certainly more common in Londoners. A recent visit to the Highgate ponds in August on a weekday showed a huge proportion of roundheads present. In fact the naturist section has always had a high proportion of cut gays (NB not all naturists at Highgate ponds are gay).

Editor's note: Unfortunately D.D. passed away earlier this year.

Have Your Baby Boy Born In The U.S.

If you are contemplating circumcising your offspring, if it turns out to be a boy, then I can only contemplate advantages to having him born Stateside. The reason? He will be able to return at will to a land where the majority of males have their penises operated on at birth, and the method of excision of the foreskin is one which is appealing to most persons who show any interest in this peculiar form of erotic and explicit sexual surgery.

Your son will likely feel good at being circumcised, at least somewhere in the United States, but certainly less likely in his own country. Circumcision is adored in the U.S. Elsewhere, like religion, it is somewhat frowned upon, and often considered as infant sexual abuse.

In the U.S. you will have absolutely no trouble at all finding a circumciser for your son either. They practically queue up to do it, such is their love of it. In Britain, few doctors will offer their services, Jewish mohelim are the best bet. However, the type of circumcision will differ depending upon the country where it is sanctioned and performed.

Can you imagine an N.H.S. circumcision, end the long outpatient wait involved, and then the facial expressions, "Why exactly do you want to do THAT to your child?" "We tend not to do THAT kind of thing to babies and children anymore here".

U.S. circumcisions are known for their smoothness of appearance and tightness, typical results of utilising clamp devices. The parents will receive much less ridicule concerning what they have put their child through, if their friends, not American, realise that their son's circumcision was performed whilst they were living or residing (at the time of his circumcision) in a foreign country, where ideas concerning minor 'mutilation' of male babies is an accepted norm or social custom.

It is the same with female circumcision. African children who have been clitoridectomised abroad, their parents are somehow 'forgiven' for what they permitted or allowed their daughters to experience, because 'it was the custom' in Africa. The same sexual surgery performed in the U.K. would evoke an undoubted prison sentence for both the parents undertaking this surgery, and particularly the doctors performing this.

The biggest cost of giving birth to your son in the U.S.A. once your scan reveals that you are pregnant with a boy, is the high cost of the birth. The actual circumcision is likely only to cost a few hundred dollars. If you think you are able, ask to be present for your son's circumcision (more accepted in the U.S. than in Britain). You will be able to tell him when he is much older exactly what happened to him when his penis was operated on, and often American medical personnel will describe the complete procedure, with expected after 'op' appearance, to you so that, if you have any doubts, you can challenge the procedure involved.

You may also have the advantage of not needing to tell your son exactly 'why' he was 'done' or circ'd when he is much older when this operation on newborn males' sexual anatomy is so common and accepted as the norm in such a circumcising society as the U.S.

Be prepared for what is the most common scenario for American style circumcisions. Your baby will be tied to a circumstraint restraining board by both hands and feet, and unless you request it, will not receive any anaesthesia as this is often deemed inappropriate, more painful to the baby than the procedure, and potentially life threatening. Expect his foreskin once severed, to be just discarded in the bin.

Probably the greatest advantage to an American style circumcision. No one will ask you 'Why?'

M. W. – Scotland

More American Boys Are Being Circumcised

From Dr. Schoen's website, www.medicirc.com

Recent statistical evidence from the Center for Disease Control (CDC) (see figures below) indicates that in the United States (U.S.) newborn circumcisions among non-immigrant boys have increased over the past 2 decades. There are over 100 million circumcised U.S. boys and men, encompassing about 70% of the total male population in this country. Currently 65% of U.S. baby boys are being circumcised in the hospital as newborns, and at least another 5-10% of males will be circumcised later for foreskin problems and cultural reasons.

The CDC found that the total U.S. newborn circumcision rate rose very slightly (from 64% to 65%) over the two decade period, from 1979-1999, but the breakdown of these statistics is revealing. There have been increases in circumcision among blacks (from 56 to 64%) and in newborns from the Midwest (from 74 to 81%) and the South (from 56 to 61%), areas of the country with the fewest new immigrants. In specific communities very high circumcision rates are being reported: 84% in Atlanta, Georgia, 85% in Houston, Texas, and 92% in a Wisconsin community served by a pediatrician opposed to circumcision. In the Georgia survey the medical record face sheet reflected only 84% of the circumcisions actually done (O'Brien, Southern Med J 1995); prevalence would have appeared to be only 70% using the face sheet diagnosis alone, as the CDC does, suggesting that the CDC figures underestimate the true prevalence of newborn circumcision.

In view of these specific high and increasing circumcision rates why have the overall percentages not increased more? The answer lies on the West Coast, particularly in California, where the circumcision rate fell from 64% in 1979 to 37% in 1999. In 1979 the majority of births in California was among non-immigrant whites. By 1999 Hispanic infants constituted the largest group (46.5% of newborns); only 31.2% were non-immigrant whites and 6.2% were black; most of the rest were Asians. Hispanics and Asian immigrants rarely have their newborn boys circumcised. Since these two ethnic groups make up over 56% of California newborns, even if 100% of non-immigrant white and black infants were circumcised, the overall prevalence of circumcision in California would be under 40%, an explanation for the 37% Western circumcision rate reported by the CDC. In the East there is a similar though less marked effect, since there are proportionally fewer immigrants.

The rising non-immigrant circumcision rate in the U.S. probably represents growing public awareness of the compelling published medical evidence favouring circumcision. Since the 1980's more than 15 separate studies have shown that uncircumcised male infants are about 10 times more likely to get serious kidney infections in the first year of life. Uncircumcised men are 22 times more likely to get devastating, invasive penile cancer. Over the past 15 years evidence, mainly from Africa, has shown that uncircumcised men are 2-5 times as likely to get human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection on exposure. Public response in Africa has resulted in a call for adult male circumcision. In the face of this increasing proof of the health benefits of circumcision, it seems likely that the newborn circumcision rate in the U.S. will continue to increase.

Seven Shillings And Six Pence.

In an earlier edition of Acorn we read C.P.'s account of his circumcision and learn that the total cost fell little short of £1000, enough for a very good holiday or to castrate 16 tom cats according to the tariff of my local Vet.

Only the other day on a local nudist beach I met a chap who, like myself was well circumcised. Both of us being naked and therefore revealing all I commented on what a fine job had been done in circumcising him. He replied that he was well pleased with it and that it had been done in 1946 at his local hospital when he was only a few months old. I asked if it had been done as a medical necessity or as a matter of the fashion of the time. He told me that his parents made the decision to have him circumcised as so many other boys were being done. He went on to tell me that being prior to the commencement of the National Health Service the procedure had cost 7/6d and that they still had the receipt.

Looking closely at him I said that this must be one of the best examples on record of 'rampant' inflation.

Editorial

Happy New Year! In the Christian calendar, 1st January is the Feast of the Circumcision and therefore a particularly appropriate day for the publication of my first edition as editor.

New Year is, of course, a time for resolutions, and the time for a new editor to appeal for support. So please – one resolution for every member: that at some stage during the year, you will write to me with some ideas about or a contribution for the magazine. I know that not all of you feel fluent with words. Don't worry – if that's the case, jot down the ideas or points which you wish to get across and I will write them up for you. And your contribution does not have just to be about personal experiences. Your views and opinions are equally valuable, and I will try to stimulate these from time to time by asking questions or perhaps promoting controversy.

I have enjoyed putting together this first edition. I hope that you will find sufficient that is familiar to reassure you that the magazine is safe in my hands, and sufficient that is new to show some of the directions I might take you in the future. This edition contains a report on the Acorn Society meeting in Leicester in November, written by a first time attendee. I too was a first time attender and was delighted by the very open, welcoming atmosphere which meant that I was immediately at home. Preparations are already being made for the 2003 meeting and I do urge those of you who are a little nervous to take the plunge: you will find many like-minded spirits.

I am delighted also in this edition to welcome on board Dr Cornell. He is a practising urologist in Atlanta who is immensely sympathetic to men seeking circumcision and who is experienced in performing the operation. His first article is about those first important steps in seeking circumcision. I hope that I can persuade Dr Cornell to become a regular contributor and that he will prove to be a real resource for members.

One piece of business. With this edition is enclosed a subscription renewal leaflet. You will see that the price remains the same and that you are guaranteed six editions this year – a real bargain, so please do renew as quickly as possible and ease the administration.

Enough – now read on and, I hope, enjoy. Please write or email me with your comments about what you liked and what you disliked. Feed back is vital; the worst thing for an editor is not criticism, but silence.....

The fate of the foreskin – 50 years on

In December 1949, the British Medical Journal published a paper: 'The fate of the foreskin' by Douglas Gairdner. Enormously influential at the time, how does the paper stack up 50 years later?

We often imagine that up to World War II, Britain was the land of the circumcised. Gairdner claims this to be far from the case with wide variations between different districts and between different social classes. Circumcision tended to be more prevalent as one ascended the social scale or descended from north to south. In one sample, 84% of public schoolboys had been circumcised; but even in primary and secondary schools in rural Cambridgeshire, 50% of boys had been circumcised, an unbelievably high figure by today's standards. As Gairdner says, tens of thousands of infants were circumcised each year.

Until the formation of the NHS in 1948, medical care was private with poorer patients being catered for by a panel system. Thus circumcision was an economically profitable service which doctors could provide to the parents who could afford to pay. This system had the advantage of controlling and therefore making manageable the numbers of babies being presented for circumcision. With the coming of the NHS and free medical care for all, circumcision theoretically became available for all baby boys at no cost. Was Gairdner's article therefore just a cover for the NHS to hide behind in refusing universal circumcision or was there more substance to the case?

In 1933, Glenn Deibert published 'The separation of the prepuce in the human penis' in The Anatomical Record. Deibert looked at the separation of the foreskin from the glans as the embryo developed in the uterus. He concluded that separation is not completed at birth, but is accomplished sometime during infancy or early childhood. However, separation was sufficient at the 10-day stage to allow mechanical retraction without danger of a tear. Gairdner took this work further, investigating in greater detail when separation took place. He concluded that 4% of newborns had a fully retractable foreskin, rising to 20% at six months, 50% at one year, 80% at 2 years and 90% at 3 years. He considered that no action was required on a non-retractable foreskin up to 5 years, but that thereafter hygiene considerations took over.

So far, so good. This is a useful medical research paper which takes forward Deibert's work on the development of the foreskin. However, Gairdner now uses this research basis to launch a polemic against circumcision. Gairdner implies that the sole reason for routine infant circumcision is phimosis, caused by adhesions between the foreskin and the glans. Since these adhesions will resolve themselves in the first three years of life, ipso facto the case for routine circumcision collapses. Gairdner defines true phimosis as a constriction causing urinary obstruction and "must be exceedingly rare". For him, phimosis, the inability to retract the foreskin because of too small an opening, conveniently appears not to exist, or is at least undiagnosable since unretractability of the foreskin before the age of 5 is not a matter for concern.

Gairdner notes that an earlier correspondence in the BMJ had resulted in a "surprising variety of reasons why different doctors advise circumcision". His implied conclusion from this multiplicity of reasons is that the doctors must be in error. He fails to acknowledge that there can indeed be multiple reasons for circumcision, and that far from being contradictory, these reasons can be cumulative in advancing the case for routine circumcision.

At this point, Gairdner gives the number of deaths from circumcision in boys under 5 years – 16 in 1942 and 17 in 1943 (although the subtext reveals that anaesthesia rather than the actual operation is at fault in most cases). He then undertakes a short survey of possible reasons for circumcision – phimosis, balanitis and posthisis, paraphimosis, and the prevention of venereal disease and penile cancer. All are given short shrift. Balanitis, for instance, is apparently mainly the result of an ammonia dermatitis affecting the napkin area. Tell that to the many adult men who suffer this condition! Only penile cancer gives him pause for thought. But then he quotes Dean (1935), reviewing 120 cases of such cancers: "Men with penis cancers gave the impression of being less intelligent as a class than other cancer patients. Not only had the majority ignored for long periods the pre-cancerous state of physical annoyance, filth and odiferous discharges, but also it was not unusual for many to delay seeking advice until a large part of the penis had become affected with an ulcerating growth". One would have thought that the conclusion from this (backed up by other studies) would be that many men do not practise satisfactory general hygiene and that circumcision might therefore be an extremely useful prophylactic. Gairdner's conclusion is that if a man keeps his penis clean, all will be well i.e. he buries his head firmly in the sand about the actuality of standards of genital cleanliness.

Reading Gairdner 50 years on, it is indeed surprising that the article was and remains so influential. It is anecdotal, opinionated and based on little factual evidence. The whole approach of the author is encapsulated by the following: "In order to fulfil the intention of this paper an inquiry on these points should have been made amongst a group of uncircumcised men. This was not attempted, although with regard to the last two of the factors mentioned it should be stated that whenever the subject has been broached in male company, those still in possession of their foreskin..." Precisely; let's not bother with properly structured research – asking around in an unstructured, uncontrolled situation will suffice.

The decision about circumcision, as with any other medical procedure, has to be decided on the balance of advantage and disadvantage, with a true assessment of the risks involved on both sides of the equation. This requires proper research and unbiased evaluation of the evidence available. Gairdner makes no attempt to do this. In this sense therefore, it is a shoddy little article, unworthy of the profound influence it has had. It is surprising that it was accepted so uncritically and with such acclaim. One can only come to the conclusion that it was manna to an uncritical medical profession looking for reasons to discontinue routine infant circumcision. Even now, 50 years later, Gairdner's legacy lives on. The foreskin is alive and well and living in England.

Getting A Circumcision

Instalment I: Preparing for the Consultation

The first step in getting a circumcision is getting the determination to proceed. This is a big and fearsome step leading to a life altering change to which you have obviously given much thought. The medical scene tends to be quite intimidating, and dealing with surgical alteration of the genitals one of the most frightening issues to broach. You should proceed with the notion in mind that getting a circumcision for cosmetic preferences is perfectly acceptable. Be willing to express this to the urologist, and, if he is not accepting, go elsewhere.

Try to do a little background work too. Make your initial consultation as comfortable as possible with the highest chance for success. Seek out a practice that advertises circumcision. Two readily-accessible resources are Circumcision Agency in Britain and Circumcision Center in the U.S. (Contact details are given below.) Practices such as these specialize in providing efficient and dignified outpatient, adult circumcisions. Some urology practices are disinterested and actually consider circumcision to be a nuisance. However you should also use caution in dealing with a practice that proclaims specialization with circumcision and/or cosmetic genital surgery.

Also do some research into the different styles and techniques of circumcision. They are not all created equal. Different amounts of outer (shaft) skin and mucosal (inner) skin may be removed/left intact. Get a good idea where you want the scar line to be placed, how tight you want the skin, and whether or not you want the frenulum removed. An excellent resource is www.circlist.com. Once you have these details in mind, be committed to find a doctor who respects your wishes and will work according to your specifications.

Doing aesthetic circumcisions requires that the surgeon be attentive to the details of skin resection and tissue handling and that he has an artistic eye. This is, however, the technically easiest operation a urologist performs. I am wary of those who 'specialize' in circumcision, and charge extraordinarily high fees, as I expect they are marginally competent general urologists.

Once you identify a practice with which you are considering consulting, look for some basic credentials of the physician. He should be board certified in urology. This means that his residency training was accredited and that he successfully completed the certifying exams which are both written and oral. In addition to board certification he should also be a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons or the American College of Surgeons. Only board-certified urologists are eligible but not all are accepted for Fellowship. Fellowship reflects adherence to the highest ethical, professional, and academic standards. Finding a surgeon with these credentials will not assure you of a good outcome but they represent minimum expectations.

Next you should make a consultation appointment while maintaining a healthy level of scepticism. When making your appointment, ask if the doctor performs elective circumcisions. Unless the answer is "yes", without any hesitation – go elsewhere. I implore you to follow your instincts. Maintain high expectations in communication skills, candour, and professionalism. Ask yourself, "would I want to be friends with this bloke?" If the answer is "no" then go elsewhere.

You should also demand that the office respect your dignity and privacy. It is not acceptable for the entire waiting room to know why you are in the office. All of your conversations should be carried out to protect your privacy.

At the initial consultation, you should expect an exam of the genital tract which is appropriate for your age. The urologist should be evaluating you both for circumcision and as a general urology patient as well. To that end, men under 40 should expect an exam of the abdomen, flanks, groins, penis, and scrotal contents. Men over 40 should expect a digital rectal exam. Everyone should expect a urinalysis and men over 40 expect a blood test for PSA (prostate specific antigen) for prostate cancer early detection.

Once the general exam is completed you should have a specific discussion with the urologist about how you will be circumcised. Do not expect him to understand circ fetish terminology such as 'high and tight'. I simply urge that you show him on your penis where you want the scar line to be placed and how tight in the flaccid state you want the skin to be. If he talks about "the way I was trained" or doing some kind of standard circumcision you need to go elsewhere. The urologist needs to be understanding and concerned with pleasing you. Remember, you are having a cosmetic operation. If you want high and tight and he cuts off all the mucosa, it's too late. Once you are satisfied that you are dealing with a competent guy who respects your wishes, have a frank discussion about the total cost. Be sure this is an all-inclusive price, and not just his professional charge. Are there any anaesthesia, hospital, or clinic charges? You want to know what your bottom line exposure is going to be. You should expect to be pampered. After all, it's cosmetic surgery!

Leicester Acorn Meeting

The meeting of the Acorn Society took place in the Grand Hotel, Leicester on Saturday 9th November 2002 in the Cromwell function room (!)

The first part of the meeting was unstructured with members in groups of five or six at separate tables, where new members were welcomed and brought up to date on previous gatherings and the geographical spread of members at home and abroad. There were five members present for the first time who appeared to be put at their ease and whom we hope to see again at future gatherings.

The second part of the meeting was more formal and mainly consisted of an introduction to Ivan, the new editor, who takes over from Steve with immediate effect. His stated aim was to produce six issues in 2003. Although there was material to be handed over, he emphasised the need for contributions from the membership. This was the only way to maintain a newsletter of general interest based on personal experience and discussion, as had been the case when the first Acorn fell into the leaf litter and took root.

A major point of discussion concerned the attraction of new members. The internet and email were forms of the media which could be valuable in making our presence felt in the greater world of men who may not yet be aware that we exist so that they can enjoy our personal facilities. It was also agreed that a small advertisement in the pages of Forum magazine and in other organs could be useful, if only as a one off exercise in the first instance, since not everyone has access to the internet or an email address.

The third major topic concerned our next meeting – date and place. Douglas assured members that he saw no reason to increase subscriptions in order to cover a similar meeting in Leicester in November 2003. Political and sporting events notwithstanding, and school holidays and other major commitments being past for most members, the proposal was agreed. But perhaps the hotel should be asked to offer an alternative function room, since Cromwell and his Roundheads(!) seemed to some members(!) to be exclusive.

Of Foreskins And Smegma

When I was a teenager (13-15) and at Secondary School, some of my friends and other boys would gather together and they would all masturbate to see who would ejaculate first. I noticed on a number of occasions that the circumcised boys who hadn't masturbated for several days would ejaculate first before the boys who were uncircumcised. Their foreskins covered their glans penes so that they were always sensitive and moist. They always had a lot of smegma, and the smegma on some of the boys smelt very strong when they were masturbating. Personally I found the smell very erotic and sexually exciting. I myself never took part in these masturbating episodes, but was always an observer. A few of the boys were involved in mutual masturbation including myself and I always touched, picked and smelt the smegma which got me in a really excited sexual state thus making me ejaculate before the other boy who was uncircumcised. I am going back to the early sixties – I was born in 1947.

There was one boy who was the same age as myself who always pinched the end of his foreskin between his index finger and thumb every time he ejaculated. When his ejaculate was coming out, you could see the movement under the foreskin. He told us that he always got a lot more physical pleasure in and around his glans penis at the moment of ejaculation. After he had finished ejaculating he would wait a short time before releasing the end of his foreskin (very long,  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch overhang). When the cavity between his glans penis and the inside of his foreskin was empty of his sperm he would very gently and slowly pull his foreskin back, revealing his extremely sensitive moist glans which still had a residue of sperm and strong smelling smegma. He like many of the uncircumcised boys very rarely bothered about personal hygiene in that area.

All the boys including myself were very highly sexed and I am still the same at the age of 55. Sex isn't only for the young, it is for everyone. You are never too old for sexual pleasure and enjoyment. Sex doesn't recognise age. Some older men are a lot more virile than the young ones – just take a look at older men 50+ in Islamic countries who have young children under the age of puberty. Turkey and many of the Arab countries are good examples of that.

Military Cut

Much of our life is ruled by a desire to 'belong' – one of the gang – a feeling of associating with those who share our standards. I think that is why Acorn can help so much with its articles that so many of us can connect with.

In my case, it is the old familiar story. As a small boy I can remember playing with a friend and at one point we took a pee together. As we stood side by side relieving ourselves behind a bush, I looked at his dick and was surprised to see that his was different to mine. Why was the end of his knob bare whilst mine was covered up? I think that from that point on I was fascinated by circumcision, without even understanding why.

In my early teens my life took a completely unexpected turn that would affect me forever. My parents emigrated to Australia and my new school was an all-boys' grammar school in Melbourne. Here was a culture shock indeed. Instead of being in the majority in being uncut, I found that I was virtually the only boy in my class who was not circumcised. Showers after sport were an uncomfortable affair as the circumcised majority jeered at the very few who were not. I was asked on many occasions, "What's wrong with your dick?" and laughed at. The burning desire to get circumcised and join the rest of the guys was infused within me. I had no desire to be 'different'. I hated being uncircumcised and knew that eventually I must do something about it.

My opportunity came in a rather unexpected and, at first, very unwanted way. From the mid-1960s to 1972, Australia had conscription due to the government's regrettable involvement in the Vietnam War. The service wasn't universal but was done on a lottery basis. Guess whose number was one of those that came up? So a couple of years after leaving school I was conscripted into the Australian army. Along with my fellow grunts I was to have the 'pleasure' of two years' compulsory military service. Now of course there was absolutely no privacy anywhere and the status of my cock was only too evident to all the other soldiers around me. Just as at school almost everyone else in my unit was circumcised. Though I wasn't ridiculed like I had been at school, I was often asked why I hadn't been circumcised like the others. From officers to lowest ranks they were nearly all circumcised and perfectly happy with it. The fact that Australian doctors seemed to think that circumcision was a very good idea for all boys and British doctors didn't was something of a mystery to them.

Fortunately for me, Australia ended its practice of sending troops to Vietnam before I could be sent there. Conscription came to an end, so I was one of the last to go through it. I could have used being sent to a tropical country as a possible excuse to persuade the medical authorities that it would be a good idea if I were given a circumcision. With this chance out of the way, I started to get a little desperate and felt that, as I was unlikely ever to get circumcised in civilian life, I had to try and convince the medical officer that it would be a useful thing for me to have done. I kept dreaming up all sorts of 'problems' that I was afflicted with but I was pre-empted by what was known as a 'short arm inspection'. This was on account of our unit being sent to Northern Queensland for training in a sub-tropical environment. The medical officer singled out two of us who were not cut and informed us of the potential medical problems that could be encountered in that climate from not being circumcised. In the end we were virtually ordered to report for a circumcision. The other guy was not so keen but I was absolutely delighted. At last an ambition satisfied. Many years later I saw the film Virgin Soldiers and have to say that my circumcision was nothing like that. It was all done with typical military efficiency and a common-sense approach that is not always evident in the Army. Just before surgery I made sure I got a commitment from the surgeon that I would be fully circumcised. I didn't want any half measures. The feeling afterwards was euphoric. I knew it was going to be sore but at last I 'belonged'. I was just thrilled to have finally been circumcised. And what's more I had a couple of days off duty in sick bay.

I didn't know a lot about the types of cut but once my circumcision scar had healed I noticed that my cut was just below the rim of the helmet. It was much higher up than those of the others I had seen whose scars seemed to be further down the shaft. The frenulum had also been removed, so I later came to the conclusion I had a high and tight cut. There was a certain interest from some of the other men as to how it felt compared to being uncut. Could I wank off as I had before? In the army one thing you don't have is privacy and I had to wait until I volunteered to drive some supplies to another camp. Once off the main road and in a quiet bit of bush area I tried out my newly-circumcised cock, sitting in the front seat of my military vehicle. If I'd been caught I'd have been in serious trouble but that made it all the more thrilling. The gratification achieved that afternoon told me that I was definitely in the right camp. I volunteered many times for driving jobs over the next few days and weeks! Coupled with this pleasure, the improvement in hygiene was a huge advantage.

The rest of my service eventually passed and I couldn't wait to get out into the big civilian world as 'one of the boys'. I couldn't stop going to swimming pools and sports centres in order to let other men see I was one of them in the changing rooms where I was naked for as long as I could be without getting arrested! Fortunately this desire did fade away as I simply accepted that I was just like everyone else.

Eventually I returned to Britain with its decreasing incidence of circumcision but now I felt that although I was now different from the majority I was distinctly one up on those who were not circumcised. I have never had any doubts as to the benefits to my sex life that circumcision has brought. People said that going in the army would 'make a man of me'. As far as I'm concerned, it was being circumcised that achieved that.

Joke

Definition of a Dandy: A guy circumcised with pinky shears.

Smooth, Naked And Cut

As you may know I am extremely PRO circumcision, especially when it is done on newborn boys (such as me over 50 years ago!) and I thoroughly agree with every word on the www.medicirc.com site mentioned on page 15, Issue 2/2002. There are so many advantages of circumcising the newborn: e.g. the organ is smaller; no remembered trauma; high level of antigens at that age; operation at this age results in little or no scar line and a much larger (flared) glans through unrestricted growth; no problems with post operative erections; no embarrassing explanations needed to colleagues or, if at school or college, other students and teachers for time off work, etc. I cannot thank my parents enough for making this important decision for me – a decision resulting in an organ of which, especially as a naturist, I am particularly proud. Let us severely challenge the use of the emotive word 'mutilation', currently so popular with the anti-circ brigade! There is no place for this word in connection with circumcision any more than, for example, having a redundant tooth extracted.

You may also be aware that for the past five years I have run an organisation called Smooth and Cut Naturists. As well as being circumcised, members of SCN enjoy the many advantages of having no body hair (sometimes other naturists call us 'Smoothies'). Some of the advantages of both being smooth and 'cut' are shared – for example hygiene, which is of paramount importance to us.

Back in 1999 I started a web site for SCN. It has progressed over the past four years to become the leading site for smooth naturists world wide with over 450 pictures and other useful pages with topics such as Methods of Hair Removal and, on the second of our two Links pages, a number of relevant sites under the heading of 'Circumcision'. There is also a Message Forum which currently has a subject 'thread' on foreskins (for or against) which may be of interest to readers.

Why not pay us a visit at: <http://www.smooth-naturists.co.uk> ? You will be sure of an interesting and informative time there and add to more than one and a half million visitors we've had so far!

Picasso's Nude

In September I visited the Museu Picasso in Barcelona. Picasso spent part of his early career in the city and in the late 1890's painted a series of male nudes, one of them full frontal. I was surprised to see that the model had been well circumcised, glans fully exposed. I had always thought of mainland Europe as being a desert as far as circumcision is concerned. Was Spain different in the 1890's?

Jack's Story — Part 1

My love affair with the circumcised cock began almost 50 years ago in childhood when I found that my best friend Dave was different from me and the other boys in our school class. He first showed me his cock when we were eight years old, and told me with obvious pride that he had been circumcised. At the time I had no idea what this meant but I was struck by how much more attractive his cock looked with the head bare and quite free from the skin which covered the head of my own penis.

When we reached adolescence we began to masturbate together and it was then that I became intensely jealous of my friend. At the senior school there were many more circumcised boys and without exception they all seemed so proud of their cocks. I suppose it was then that I developed a bit of a complex about circumcision. How I wished that I was like these boys and how determined I became to be like them one day. At 13 Dave's cock had grown to full size and was now about 7 inches long with a well developed thick shaft. The head of his cock was a good bit wider than the shaft with a big mushroom-shaped glans. When his cock was fully erect it was hardly possible to move the skin on the shaft and the scar could be clearly seen about an inch behind the glans in a perfect circle around the cock shaft. In addition the skin above the scar was dark while the skin between the scar and the glans was much lighter in colour. Teenage hormones determined how we spent much of the day and such was our libido that we were jacking each other off even during school classes, sitting at the back where we were less likely to be spotted by the teacher.

One weekend Dave told me that he had become friendly with an older boy who lived opposite his house. Every Saturday when Ken's mother went shopping Dave had been spending the afternoon in Ken's house and inevitably they had been jacking off together. Dave had told Ken about me and suggested that the three of us might get together, which we did the following weekend. Ken was 18 years old, tall and well muscled, in fact in most respects a man. He had what can only be described as a massive cock, hanging down more than six inches even in the limp state. As I soon discovered, when erect it expanded to around nine inches, a truly awesome sight for a 13 year-old used only to the much smaller cocks of younger boys. To add to my excitement Ken was perfectly circumcised with absolutely no skin close to the cock head even when his cock was soft. He had what I later discovered was a 'Muslim style' cut with the scar of his circumcision way down the shaft almost halfway to his balls. Like Dave the contrast between the skin of his shaft and that of the inner foreskin now pulled tightly back on the shaft was marked. He had a very full mushroom-shaped head covered with tight, smooth pink skin and surmounted by a large piss-slit the edges of which were pouting so that the slit appeared to be open.

Once Dave and I were naked Ken became fully erect, a drop of juice appearing in the slit and running over the fleshy cock head. Ken demanded that I jack him off, and such was the thickness of his cock shaft that I was only just able to get my hand round. I concentrated on gently massaging the fleshy head, running my fingers around the underside of the flared glans with one hand and stroking around the wide piss-slit with the other. This new sexual activity excited me in a way which is difficult to describe. I was so hard that my cock was aching, dripping with juice, and as Ken came I shot the biggest load of cum I can remember.

That was the only time that I met Ken although my friend Dave continued to see him at weekends for more than a year after our threesome. Dave told me that Ken was disappointed to find that I was not circumcised and was therefore not keen to have me join them on Saturday afternoons. This only intensified the complex I already had over my foreskin. I was now associating only with boys who were circumcised. My jealousy of their beautiful cut cocks was intense, matched only by the disgust which I felt for my foreskin. My foreskin seemed even more gross than those I had seen on some of the other boys. Whereas they mostly had short foreskins which hardly covered the glans mine was horribly long and overlapped my cock head by almost an inch. To make things worse I had a wart on the inner surface which was always wet and often smelt. I hated the soft, tender glans and longed for the smooth tough skin which covered the cock heads of my many circumcised friends. Such was my desire to be circumcised that I plucked up courage and told my father about the wart on my foreskin, but he became angry accusing me of some kind of perversion so that I let the matter rest.

Throughout adolescence I became more and more determined to arrange my own circumcision once I was free from the narrow minded attitudes of my parents. At 18 I left for University in Liverpool and as I was studying Medicine I knew that sooner or later there would be an opportunity for me to circumcise myself. Once on the Clinical course I was able to get everything I needed and at the age of 21 I cut away my foreskin for ever.

Doing It Yourself

The article by C.B. 'Means to an end', Issue 2/2002 made me think about my own dilemma as a youngster with a hated foreskin. In those days I was unaware of private clinics and the possibility of ops outside the NHS: it was the GP or nothing. Our family GP was not the sort of man one could go to unless one was seriously ill, so in my case after years of thought it had to be a DIY job. This was eventually carried out very satisfactorily with the encouragement of my then girlfriend who much preferred men who, as she put it, "looked like men and not little boys". The actual operation was written up for Acorn several years ago.

Since my circumcision and the revision to produce a radical result, I have been more than delighted with the slightly (still) bare feeling of the organ and its appearance which I love whenever I see it. As far as the actual operation is concerned it is so trivial – the removal of a little bit of skin, that I am amazed the medical profession have the cheek to charge more than a few pounds at most. I.W. – Issue 2/2002 had it right when he said the charge fifty years ago was 7s 6d: so allowing for inflation, £50 would be a fair charge.

However, saying this, with the availability of the anaesthetic creams available to numb the foreskin, I cannot see why men don't opt for self removal: it was certainly dead easy and relatively painless in my case and I would have no hesitation in doing it again. I have in fact helped a friend some years ago to do his and he also had no problems. Both his and mine were freehand circs, using scissors, and neither were stitched so the end result is an almost invisible scar.

Anyone slightly squeamish could opt for the plastibell – ligature circ so favoured by the Americans. This again is pretty pain free and very successful. If any of our members are keen to be cut and would like help or just advice, I will be more than happy to assist them based on my experience. Do get in touch.

R.W. – Surrey

[Editor's note: members should be cautious in operating on themselves. It is not unknown for self-circumcisors to end up in the nearest A & E department.]

Style Over Substance

In a recent newsletter, and in many newsletters from the past, there have been articles making reference to the style of the circumcised cock. Everyone to their own preference, the 'ideal' varies between one person and the next. Some like to see the scar line high on the cock, others prefer to see it closer to the knob, others think the ideal being when there is hardly any visible scar at all. Reference is frequently made to the tension of the remaining skin, either when flaccid or erect. Some, like myself, prefer it drum tight when erect whilst others think it better if there is some slackness, perhaps sufficient to draw skin up to the corona or even far enough to partly cover the knob. Likewise the frenulum gets frequent mention, either to keep it intact because of its exquisite sensitivity, or to have it removed because it looks tidier. The list of variables is extensive.

In defining the perfect outcome from circumcision – the 'end result' – seldom is any reference made to the anatomy of the cock prior to the operation. Surely the same must apply to circumcision as to the baking of a cake. The final product is very much subject to the quality of the ingredients. The appearance of the Roundhead will depend very much on its earlier Cavalier state.

If the original foreskin was thick and slack, like an old sock, then the outcome will be different from what it would have been had the foreskin been wafer thin and knob hugging. If the covered knob was almost rimless and rather pointed it is never going to be the big, blunt, flared, bell end that many crave. If the outer foreskin is a much deeper colour than the inner membrane then the scar line will be much more apparent and the areas fore and aft will resemble something to be found on a painter's colour chart. The variety in size is of interest to almost all. Some, of 'domestic' appearance, after a little stimulation grow through King size to Party size, even to “Oh my G***”, whilst others are King size at first glance and are never anything larger only harder.

The skill of him wielding the knife will be reflected in the neatness of the outcome to some degree but the appearance of the Cavalier will always determine the appearance of the Roundhead.

Celebrity Circumcision

One of the many pleasures in reading the Newsletter was the lists of well-known personalities and their cut/uncut status. This seemed to have disappeared recently, so I decided to see what I could find on the Internet. I knew of Chuck Thompson's list but rather than send off for a list, I was confident there would be plenty of information to be had on the Web. I was not disappointed. But herein lies the warning; the information you find on the Web is only accurate as far as the compiler knows it to be. As you will see there are a number of contradictions to be found.

If you already know of these sites, forgive the repetition, but those who do not may well be interested – I know I was. The main site seems to be www.sleepy.net. This was a very extensive list giving both cuts and uncuts. Being an American site it is hardly surprising that the list of circumcised celebs is about four times the length of the uncuts. Also I found that a very large percentage of those listed were American actors and sports stars that are virtually unknown in Britain. I felt the listing of well-known Jewish entertainers in the cut section was rather pointless. You'll be amazed to know that Dustin Hoffman, William Shatner, Tony Curtis and Uri Geller have all been circumcised! Had any Jews been in the uncut list I'd have been more intrigued. There are pages and pages of circumcised stars. As a circumcised man myself, I was pleased (though hardly surprised) to see Warren Beatty, Kevin Costner, Robert de Niro, David Duchovny, Clint Eastwood, Patrick Duffy, Ed Harris, David Letterman, Al Pacino, Brad Pitt, Charlie Sheen, Robert Wagner, Bruce Willis all are without a foreskin. If you scan through the list I'm sure you'll find plenty of celebs that you know there. There was also a sizeable number of Australian actors and sportsmen included in this list though my knowledge of Australian soaps and sports did mean that I didn't know many of them, though Jason Donovan and Pat Cash were in the list. It has to be said that Brits are few and far between in this website. They included Roger Moore, Anthony Andrews, Michael Craig, Engelbert Humperdinck (really?), the late Jeremy Brett, and rather less convincingly Ringo Starr, Charlie Watts and Kevin Whately (not from the glimpse I once saw in a nude swimming scene in 'Auf Wiedersehn Pet'). And if Derek Jacobi is to be believed (and why not?), he should not be in the cut list according to a recent newspaper article in which he says, when asked by Noel Coward if he was circumcised, he said he was not. There was also listed a British actor named Phil Banyard (Who he?). I checked him out on the Web and all I could find was a listing in a 'naturist' film made in the 1970s. In that case there can't be much doubt as to his circumcision. But there certainly is over Brits in the field of rock and pop. Admittedly there is a question mark over the placing of Mick Jagger in the cut list. Something I would definitely question after seeing outtakes from the film 'Performance' where he was quite definitely intact. But I also have to doubt the veracity of the list when I checked out a further site www.textfiles.com/sex/circlist.txt. Whilst this is a smaller list, the discrepancies thrown up by it need further investigation. Ringo Starr is classed as uncut in this list whilst Tom Jones is listed as cut (never!) as also is Rod Stewart. These last two can also be found in www.circumstitions.com as quite definitely uncut along with Mick Jagger (told you!). This site is largely devoted to the anti-circumcision brigade and could be thought to be prejudiced in that direction. Still 'you pays your money and you takes your choice'.

Just out of interest I checked www.eurocirc.org which turned out to be the same list as sleepy.net (as far as I can see) but aimed at the German-speaking market. Would you believe the same list can also be found in Czech but I won't bother you with the site address.

One more that I looked at was www.club18-35.co.uk which has nothing to do with appalling holidays in Ibiza with braindead young British holidaymakers. Rather it is a UK young-orientated site and accordingly has a slightly higher percentage of Brits involved, though inevitably there are more in the uncut section than the cut section. It not only has a section for under 35s but also one for older celebs. So you'll find amongst a large number of bronzed, musclebound, gleaming-teethed (little-known) American actors of dubious talent a few circumcised Brits such as Rupert Everett, Simon Le Bon, Julian Sands, Steven McKintosh and Tim Henman (maybe that's the reason for Henmania!). Sadly the list of uncut Brits is longer with Sean Bean, Rupert Graves, Hugh Grant, Jude Law, Jeremy Irons (that was unexpected, I must admit) and Jason Connery (as intact as his father) being amongst the throng.

So there you have it. It is interesting to compare the sites available. In the main they coincide though the difference in Tom Selleck's status is a worry. With what I've heard about the prodigious size of his cock, I would like to be sure he is circumcised. At least there are no doubts about Errol Flynn!

Religious Circumcision

House of Commons Written Answer 3rd December 2001

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts make provision for religious circumcision. [15468]

Jacqui Smith: In 1999–2000 205 national health service hospitals in England recorded a total of 21,763 inpatient episodes where the main operation was circumcision. It is not possible to determine whether the procedure was carried out for religious reasons.

Editorial

Welcome back!

I received several compliments on my first issue as editor and, in general, it seems to have been well received. But I did receive one complaint which I have taken seriously. The allegation is that "Acorn is too biased", to quote the title of an article later in this edition. It is suggested that Acorn has been captured by the pro-circ lobby; and I must admit that the last edition may have made it look that way. But that is not my wish – I would like Acorn to be balanced, promoting both the roundhead and the cavalier points of view. I hope that this edition goes a little way to address the bias.

However, I am in your hands. To a large extent, the magazine consists of what you send in. I know that quite a proportion of members are uncut and presumably many have no intention of submitting to the knife. So what about sharing with everyone else what you like about the foreskinned state and why you intend to remain a cavalier. Please note – no anti-circ rants (we are not a branch of NOCIRC!) but articles which celebrate the foreskin and the uncircumcised state.

The Editor's Column

Best of Both Worlds?

Cavaliers and Roundheads may debate the relative merits of their statuses, but in their midst are the retractors, the transvestites of the penile world, Cavaliers in fact but dressed like Roundheads.

The Roundhead lives his life with his desensitised glans fully exposed, bare to the world. The Cavalier hides his glans away, his foreskin carefully protecting his over sensitive acorn beneath. But some Cavaliers wear their foreskins back, flaunting their glans, as if to deceive the world about their uncut state. These are the retractors.

Some retractors are in the experimental stage. "What would it be like to be circumcised?" they ask; and to find out, they wear their foreskin back, to see whether they like that permanently exposed feel of the truly cut. Those that enjoy the experience may then proceed to full circumcision; those that don't may retreat behind their foreskin, their glans never to see the light of day again. But left in the middle, twilight world are the permanent retractors.

The ability to be a successful retractor depends upon a number of factors – type of foreskin, shape of glans, and not least, persistence. Some men have relatively short foreskins so that the tip (or more) of their glans peeks through the foreskin even when the penis is at its most flaccid. For such guys, permanent retraction is relatively easy – indeed, in some men the foreskin is so short that it retracts of its own volition so that they have no option but to be pseudo Roundheads. But those guys with long or thick foreskins have much more difficulty in keeping the skin back – the force of gravity is constantly drawing it forward. Similarly, a loose foreskin may just not grip behind the glans.

Which brings us to the second factor – the shape of the glans, or more importantly, the depth of the ridge under the corona. Those where there is a pronounced rim have much less difficulty in keeping the skin back than those where the glans is almost a continuation of the shaft with hardly any rim behind which to hook the prepuce. But this is where perseverance comes in. Many retractors have been successful only after a lengthy period of training the foreskin to stay back. But they claim that in due course, whether because the coronal ridge gradually deepens or just because the foreskin realises what is required of it, permanent retraction is possible. But persistence is also required on another front. Most Cavaliers, when they first retract, find their glans unbelievably sensitive. After just a few minutes, the almost overwhelming temptation is to pull the skin forward again and re-protect that all too sensitive acorn. Of course, the guy who is newly circumcised has the same sensitivity problems. But he has no foreskin left to cover his glans; he has to do cold turkey. In the end, the would-be retractor has to do cold turkey too. And those who persist find, like newly cut men, that after a few days, the over sensitivity subsides and they can start to enjoy that constantly exposed feel.

So, does retraction give the best of both worlds? Certainly it gives a permanently exposed glans, but with the option to cover up whenever the guy wants to. But there are some downsides. First, if the foreskin does slip forwards (and this can happen quite frequently in the initial stages), there is a tendency for pubic hairs to get caught, which can be extremely uncomfortable if not painful. Second, the foreskin inevitably dislodges itself during intercourse so sexually the guy is definitely operating with an uncircumcised rather than a circumcised penis. Third, the effect is not that aesthetically pleasing; there is quite a roll of skin bunched behind the corona, so the penis doesn't have the same sleek look as a well cut penis. Fourth, the foreskin is still there so it can pose the same health and cleanliness problems as a naturally worn prepuce.

Having said that, there are guys who have retracted for many years and are very happy with their status. They obviously believe that they have the best of both worlds, and who are we to say them nay. Are there any retractors among the members who would like to tell us of their own experiences?

Ivan Acorn

[Postscript: After I had completed my column, I received the next article, "Observations", in which T.S. suggests that retraction is on the increase. Do you agree?]

Observations

I have noted the ratio of cut to uncut over many years in different situations and would like to know if they concur with the observations of others. When I was at school (minor public, early 60s) the cut were about 30%. This was across the age range 11 to 17. We would all shower together after games, both normal Wednesday activities or specific matches, so I was able to observe both my peers and older and younger boys. This ratio held good in general across the school. The masters who took games, either as specialist teachers or in an assistant capacity, showered with us (no doubt this would be unacceptable in today's paranoid climate) and I noted that they were cut to a man.

In adult life I have taken part in various sports and note that in general the ratio is more like 25% cut, based on changing room sightings. I go to naturist beaches and here the ratio is closer to 50%. I make this 'survey' by either walking along the beach and noting the status of those that I can see clearly, or by staying in one spot and observing those who pass, again taking note only of those of whom one can be sure. I have for some years taken part in Fitness Training at our local Sports Centre. This course attracts a core of regular attendees and casual participants who join or drop out. The age range is between 35 and 55. About 50% take showers at the gym. For years the cut averaged 33%.

But here, as well as on the beach, I have noted a step change. On such days as the weather allowed sunbathing last summer, I noted that the apparently cut (I use the word carefully) now outnumber the uncut, being about 60% of observations. At the Sports Centre the ratio has changed similarly. I am convinced that this change is due in no small part to males retracting their foreskins. I base this deduction on the following. The age profile of the beach users has not changed and I can only suppose that the social class range is also unaltered, so a rush to elective surgery is not likely. The Fitness Training group is also interesting. I have noted that at least two individuals are now bare glans having been intact in the past. There has not been time for them to be circumcised and for the wound to heal. Both in the gym showers and on the beach there seems to be much bunched skin in evidence, though accurate observation is difficult.

My questions are:

- * Do my observations accord with those of other readers?
- * Have those readers noticed any changes in recent years?
- * If such a change has been noted, is it likely to be as a result of retraction or circumcision?
- * What does this mean? Is it a result of exposure to erotica wherein the cut organ is common, or is it flattery by imitation?

I know that I am quoting statistics of small numbers and maybe my observations will not be replicated. But I would be interested to know what, if anything, is happening and whether any readers could confirm my observations.

Getting A Circumcision

Instalment II: The Operation

I find that knowledge is power and that the worst fear is the fear of the unknown. Definitely, getting a circumcision may be an intimidating experience. I want to acquaint you with the practices of my office so that you may have an idea of what you may expect on the day of your procedure.

There are no rigid preoperative instructions for circumcision performed under a local anaesthetic. I would suggest a light diet, perhaps just liquids, on the day of the procedure. To prevent the newly operated penis from flopping around in the underwear, I recommend supportive underwear for the first few weeks after circumcision; so be sure to bring some with you to the operation. It is unnecessary to shave, but trimming the pubic hair will prevent it from getting stuck in the dressing.

Immediately prior to performing a circumcision, it is my practice to sit down with the patient and mark the incision line with a skin marker. This is the best way to be certain we have the same concept in mind and to minimize disappointment. I encourage you not to rely on the terminology you may have read on the Internet for incision location. Most of these are not medical terms and urologists do not understand them. Also you should be clear about how you wish the frenulum to be handled, i.e., left intact or removed.

After the incision location is agreed upon, I go over the formal surgery consent for the patient's approval and signature. This is a time to discuss potential risks, benefits, and reasonable alternatives. Most likely, you have already considered these issues before deciding on circumcision.

Prior to commencing the procedure, I review postoperative care as well. You need to be clear about how long to leave the dressing, bathing after circumcision, and any medications or ointments to be used. I generally leave a compressive dressing for one week. During this time, the patient may shower, but should cover the dressing with a condom. I provide pain medication, antibiotics, and amyl nitrite inhalants (to relieve an unwanted erection). Once the dressing is removed, I have patients do twice daily tub soaks and apply antibiotic or vitamin E ointment to the suture line. The best results will occur if the sutures dissolve and fall out by about the tenth postoperative day. Keeping absorbable sutures moist is the best way to ensure that they fall out in a timely fashion.

Now for the operation. You will be undressed and positioned supine on the surgical table. There will be towels used to isolate your penis into a sterile field. Iodine solution will be applied to kill skin bacteria. You will receive several injections around the shaft of the penis to anaesthetize it. The doctor will check the sensation level to be sure you are properly anaesthetized before proceeding. I mark the skin again to make certain I cut symmetrically and where the patient requested. I then retract the foreskin and, if it is to be removed, I excise the tissue of the frenulum and do any suturing necessary. I do this first because the resection of tissue and/or suturing alter the ventral foreskin length. Next I make a 360 degree incision around the glans in the mucosal (inner) surface of the foreskin. I find that most men getting a circumcision are particular about the length of the mucosal portion of foreskin that is preserved. For that reason, I choose to make the mucosal incision first. I then measure from the corona of the glans to the mucosal incision, replace the prepuce over the glans and measure the same distance from the corona on the outer layer of the foreskin and mark the point of the second incision. After making the incision in the outer layer of the foreskin, the prepuce is attached by a very thin layer of tissue which I cut through with a surgical scissor, excising the redundant foreskin as a ring of tissue. Next I stop all bleeding with an electrocautery device which is of the same quality as one would find in a hospital operating room.

The lengthiest part of the operation is the suturing. I use rather a fine suture and place stitches close together. Once suturing is complete, a compressive dressing is applied. This consists of two layers: an inner layer of gauze and an outer layer of tape which has an elastic quality. The dressing is critical because it minimizes swelling and protects the freshly sutured wound from the stress of erection. As I mentioned, it stays for a week.

Many men are concerned that they will feel excruciating pain when the local anaesthetic has worn off – don't worry, it will be only mild pain. Oral analgesics like codeine, hydrocodone, or oxycodone are more than adequate. After about one week, you will be essentially free of pain.

For about one week after a circumcision, you should have a sedentary lifestyle. I would avoid exercising, lifting, and long periods of times on your feet. On the other hand, you should not need bed rest. After your dressing is off, you will find the sutures are uncomfortable. Soaking in the tub and lubricating the stitches with antibiotic or vitamin E ointment will encourage them to drop out.

After about two weeks, most men are ready to resume sexual activity. However, this is only a rough guideline. Assess your own healing and use your best judgment. Once the wound has healed, scarring may be minimized by application of the product Mederma. It helps fade scar tissue and suture marks. Remember that complete healing and resolution of swelling may take several months.

Celebrity Circumcisions

Re the article by Peter – Manchester in Issue 1/2003, I would like to add my comments.

There seems to be doubt about Tom Selleck; many said he was uncut and then he apparently came out on a TV programme saying he was Jewish so that would almost guarantee circumcision. However I know a Jewish guy who is uncut!!!! I just cannot imagine him as uncut, it just doesn't fit his image! He may have a prodigiously sized cock but never shows anything when he is wearing shorts etc. He must have it tucked well in! One scene however in An Innocent Man shows him coming in from jogging and there is definitely something large visible in his shorts! There were also rumours that when he was making Magnum in Hawaii and flying to/from the mainland, if he fancied any of the male stewards he would invite them into the toilet and display his large uncut cock to have sex with them. I don't suppose we will ever know for certain unless somebody has had sex with him or seen it?

I have seen the photo of Errol Flynn standing under a waterfall sporting a not particularly long but thick cut cock. There were always rumours that Flynn was very well endowed. I wonder if this photo is for real or is perhaps a fake like many are?

I would love to know the cut/uncut status of Tom Hanks (probably cut?); Russell Crowe (maybe cut but who knows?); Viggo Mortensen, born in Brooklyn of a Danish father (definitely uncut) and an American mother – probably if Mom had anything to do with it he would be cut! Patrick Bergin (born in Ireland so probably uncut, although I have met many Irish both from the north and the south who were circumcised shortly after birth); the singers David Daniels and Thomas Hampson. (Most likely cut.)

I quote a couple of interesting items:

Ben Affleck: apparently, whilst filming Daredevil, his dick somehow got wedged into a split open aluminium can and he was rushed to the local hospital for an emergency circumcision! It apparently delayed the filming for two weeks! (I would have thought that Affleck would have had a RIC in any case?)

Bruce Willis: Reveals all in the film Color of Night which is available on video. You definitely see his cock, briefly, and it is circumcised. But I would say it is only average sized, certainly not the big thick slong suggested by rumour. And there's more hair down there than on his head!

Jack's Story – Part 2

In the first part of his story, Issue 1/2003, Jack told how he came to the decision to perform a self-circumcision. His story continues.

From the age of about 12 I had an overwhelming desire to be circumcised. This had resulted from my close contact with circumcised boys both at school and in the neighbourhood. I became completely obsessed, surrounding myself with friends who were circumcised while shunning all contact with others whom I knew to possess the hated foreskin.

When 18 years old I left home for University Medical School determined to change forever my uncircumcised condition. I shared lodgings with a boy who had attended the same school. As he had been in a different class I had not really known him previously but I soon found that he too was circumcised. We shared a bedroom and as he slept naked I saw his cock at least twice a day for the two years that we were together. He had a particularly large, flared cock-head, which he seemed happy to display at every opportunity. This just added fuel to the fire of my obsession.

I decided to circumcise myself. At the time I knew little of circumcision styles so I opted to aim for a cut similar to that of my schoolboy friends. Without exception they all had low cuts with the scar line fairly close to the glans. Mostly they were tightly cut and this I also wanted to copy.

Firstly I read several surgical texts on operational technique. These described freehand circumcision and nowhere did I see mention of the various clamps in use. Some years later as a House Surgeon I attended several circumcisions which were also done freehand.

Initially I was so alarmed by the potential complications listed in these descriptions that I almost decided against proceeding. Particularly worrying was the description of oedema [swelling] which the books said was almost bound to occur leading to poor wound healing and even gangrene. Wow! I certainly didn't want that. Rather gingerly I decided to do the operation in three stages. Firstly I would just do a dorsal slit, then later remove the skin from one side and later still cut the remaining skin from the other side of my cock. This way I reckoned that poor wound healing would be less likely as collateral blood vessels would still be available to assist the blood supply from the intact side. In retrospect I think poor wound healing is unlikely in an adult circumcision and I think my somewhat complicated procedure was unnecessary.

Obtaining local anaesthetic, syringes, needles, swabs, suture material and a scalpel wasn't difficult and as these were the only items I needed I went ahead. The dorsal slit was the easiest part; I just infiltrated a small quantity of local anaesthetic along the line of the cut and when I could no longer feel the needle I sliced through my foreskin to a point half an inch below the glans. There was remarkably little bleeding as I didn't cut through any sizeable blood vessels. I then simply added a few stitches on either side of the cut and that stage of the surgery was finished. The cut healed in a few days, but I left the next stage for several weeks.

The thought of cutting away half of my foreskin was exciting and I had to be careful to avoid an erection as that would just add to the inevitable bleeding which was bound to occur. Once again I used local anaesthetic which I infiltrated in small quantities around the left side of the shaft just behind the glans. With my foreskin held in forceps and pulled well back I made an incision around the skin of the shaft about half an inch below the corona of the glans. I then pulled my foreskin forward as far as I could and made a second incision through it and around the whole of the left side of my cock, completely severing the skin. At this point there was an awful lot of bleeding but I had prepared for this by sitting on the side of the bath so that later I could just wash it away. I knew that this would occur as my foreskin was well supplied with prominent veins which were bound to bleed. In an operating theatre this bleeding would be stopped by the use of electrical diathermy which would coagulate any small vessels. Eventually, with pressure from swabs the bleeding almost ceased and I was then able to see two cleanly cut skin surfaces which I needed to suture. I did this using a needle held in Spencer-Wells forceps. These are the small forceps, used in many surgical operations, that can be clamped firmly together. I used silk sutures rather than absorbable catgut as silk has to be removed and therefore doesn't have the risk of suture retention. On completion I bandaged the shaft with a couple of gauze swabs.

When the local anaesthetic wore off I was surprised to find that I had no pain and only a slight soreness. I had a look at my handiwork after 48 hours. There was hardly any swelling but a lot of bruising which had resulted from not fully stopping the bleeding from small blood vessels. On day seven I took the bandage off and removed the sutures, cutting carefully through each before pulling them away with forceps. The scar was already healed and looked fine.

Several weeks later I repeated the cut on the right side using the same technique. In retrospect I should have done the operation in one go, as initially I was very tentative and didn't take quite enough skin from the left side. When I did the right side I had no such inhibitions having seen how easy the cut on the left side had been. The result is that the shaft skin on the left is slightly looser than I would like. This is not noticeable to others but nevertheless I am conscious of the difference. Still my relief to see my newly circumcised cock cannot easily be put into words. My cock head was now proudly displayed with the scar clearly visible.

In retrospect I wish that I had studied circumcision styles before my operation. I am pleased with my circumcision which also seems quite acceptable to others but at the time I was familiar mainly with the British style which I knew from observing my friends and from masturbating my friend Dave on thousands of occasions. The cut I really would have liked was the high very tight circumcision that I saw on Dave's adult friend Ken on that one occasion. This is so similar to the cut cocks of so many Americans that I have seen since. However, although my scar is only about a half to three quarters of an inch behind the glans it is clearly visible and, although the skin bunches slightly behind the glans when my cock is soft, the skin is tight on my erect cock which looks very circumcised. Also, since I was circumcised my cock head has grown in size and now has the very pleasing flared appearance achieved in a tight cut. Like most well circumcised men I can only jack off with lubrication, usually spit when I start and lots of natural cock juice very soon afterwards.

My Muslim Son

As a Christian parent, the decision to go ahead with the circumcision of my soon-to-be nine year old Muslim son has been difficult to make. I have had to weigh up the feelings of all the people close to me. First, there has been my son, Adrian, who has heard his Indonesian mother and me discuss this operation openly. Understandably he is reluctant to have his foreskin removed at this age. He wishes that he had been done at birth, just like one of his Indonesian cousins, so that he did not have this to look forward to. I have told him that I tried to engineer this in the Indonesian maternity hospital where he was born but his mother, Ira, opposed it out of fear and protection.

My feelings up until recently have been a mixture of “yes” and “no” to circumcision of my son. My heart has said “yes” because circumcision at the age of 26 has been a positive experience for me and something I would want him therefore to share. My head has said the opposite because to circumcise a boy takes away the right for him to choose later in life. However, I have got off the fence because I think it is better to be involved in preparing him for the operation than seeing someone else in the future with no first hand experience possibly taking him off to a doctor I don't know.

Then there is his mother. She and her family have a strong desire for Adrian (and his younger brother Sean) to be brought up as practising Muslims. It is the custom, though it is not clearly prescribed in the Koran as it is for Jews in the Old Testament, that Javanese Muslims in Indonesia are circumcised between six and eleven while for girls the clitoral hood is snipped at birth.

As regards my parents and siblings, I have detected some conflict. My mother, a Swede, has expressed her aversion in no uncertain terms. I would guess that one sister, a nurse, is also against, seeing that her son, who is one year older than Adrian, is intact and her husband is an Irish Catholic. My father is circumcised and appears indifferent about the subject while my other sister, who is married to an Egyptian doctor, is not interested.

To add to all of this has been the place where he and his brother have grown up. For the last few years they have been in a rural white Anglo-Saxon Protestant middle class village where I would wager the incidence of circumcision must be low judging from my casual observations in the local swimming pool changing room. Being circumcised will mean being different and I am not sure Adrian and Sean will escape teasing. Of course, in the future they may find themselves back in Indonesia where being not cut would be different.

Preparations for the operation in July/August have included showing Adrian the video of our 11 year old Indonesian cousin being cut; ensuring that he can retract his foreskin without adhesions to wash the glans; and letting him see me nude so that he knows what I look like.

Finally I have begun to make tentative investigations about how and where it might be done in Jakarta and by whom plus cost. The cousin's brother is going to be cut at the same time as Adrian so that the party afterwards can be shared. There has been talk of laser surgery to which I invite advice from Dr Cornell and others. Please write in about this.

Acorn Is Too Biased

I decided it was time to leave the Acorn Society some time ago when it became clear that the management no longer felt inclined to stick to the original terms of reference (i.e. to give equal weight to those who defended the foreskin). With the last edition of Acorn it is now clear that it has become the mouthpiece of those favouring circumcision, oblivious to the fact that the vast majority of those who witness such enthusiasms find them incomprehensible, or if victims like me, distressing.

Over the years I have contributed very many articles to Acorn and enjoyed taking a pop at the cock-cutters, but there was a deadly serious agenda behind it all. I and a lot like me are very conscious of the damage caused us by circumcision which in my case has led to the complete failure of my sex-life due to a total loss of sensitivity as I got older. I consequently find it deeply depressing that a group of people are hell-bent on causing the same damage to other little boys and have therefore devoted myself over the years to ensuring that they are unsuccessful. I am happy to report that my efforts, allied to those of a host of other men and perhaps more importantly, women, furious at the thought that they have been sentenced to second class sex lives by their parents, have succeeded in bringing down the circumcision rate in USA from over 90% to about 60%, in Australia from over 90% to just over 10% and in Canada similarly. Meanwhile the rest of Europe looks in incredulity at those who are prepared to jeopardise their children's future sexual happiness for the sake of a fad whose only basis is neurosis. I know it goes against the grain but your members (or their wives, for the non-gay minority) really should read Kristen O'Hara's book, Sex as Nature Intended It. If you don't like its tone (admittedly cringe-making in places, especially for non-Americans) you should nevertheless read the reviews of it written by a very large number of enthusiastic readers in www.amazon.com to realise that it has really hit a nerve in the USA. With luck, and the American woman's appetite for enlightened self-interest, this should help drive another nail into the coffin of institutionalised child genital mutilation in the States.

Sadly therefore I shall not be renewing my membership. However I live in the forlorn hope that common sense will eventually prevail and should you once again decide to honour your terms of reference, I shall be very happy to return and resume where I left off. I shall not be holding my breath.

Foreskin Benefits

It was good to receive the first issue of Acorn for 2003 bang on the New Year. A welcome to our new editor, Ivan, and his powerful exhortation to members to contribute to the magazine. In response is the following, which I know will not be to everyone's taste, but I look forward to some, hopefully reasoned, reaction. As I understand it, the magazine is for members to voice personal experiences and views relevant to their state of being circumcised or not. Any such forum, to be successful, must be balanced. I must therefore add my personal exhortation to what seems to be the silent uncircumcised majority (though perhaps not in Acorn membership). State your case! Are you satisfied with your state and why? And if not, why not?

Surprise, surprise, I am uncircumcised, despite being advised that circumcision was the only cure for my 'Tight Pullover' (the title of a previous piece published in Issue 3/2000. It details my story, with a happy ending, of correcting phimosis without surgery.)

I proved medical advice wrong and, albeit much later in life than I would have liked, trained my foreskin to perform all its functions correctly, from which I enjoy considerable benefits. What are they?

1. Protection of the glans so it's kept sensitive and moist, and therefore much more receptive to the subtleties of foreplay, intercourse or masturbation.
2. It has 'frenar bands' around the inner walls of its tip. These numerous nerve endings are supremely sensitive to heighten the sensations from almost every type of sexual activity.
3. It gives its owner flexibility. With full coverage, a man can retract partially, or totally to simulate a short foreskin or a circumcised state. Not possible, unfortunately, from the circumcised corner.
4. Circumcision is surgery and therefore causes pain and discomfort; also some risk of complications.
5. The arguments used against the foreskin have to be addressed:
  - (a) Lack of hygiene. Retracted and washed daily, like most other parts of the body, hygiene is simply not a problem. You don't cut away your fingernails because some dirt gets under them – you wash them.
  - (b) Inability to pee straight or in a stream – simply retract to the point where the urethra is uncovered, aim straight and shoot.
  - (c) Aesthetics. This, I concede, has to be debatable as I would expect even most circumcised members to agree with. 'Beauty is in the eye of the beholder' is perhaps a bit over the top as an analogy, but my experience of stated reactions has been that, with its movement on retraction or erection, the emergence of an uncircumcised glans from its 'sheath' is every match for a circumcised penis, whether to a man or a woman.

(d) Length or girth. Well, we're all different and more or less (despite product claims) stuck with what we've got in this department. But it is true that an uncircumcised penis is every bit as long (longer in the case of an overhang!) as its circumcised equivalent.

Given all this, I cannot understand how a man uncircumcised into adulthood could contemplate circumcision other than from a strong personal view (not mine, of course) that the circumcised penis looks aesthetically better. I do find it amazing to read of 'unwanted' and 'hated' foreskins unless for strong aesthetic reasons.

Returning finally to circumcision for medical reasons. I offer one condition only as a medical reason for circumcision – BXO, which is extremely rare. Would that information on corrective treatments, other than circumcision, for phimosis and other foreskin problems had been readily available in my youth as it is becoming today. Views are changing and developing, and for the better, but there is much further to go. Over the last couple of decades, a wider and more accessible knowledge base is resulting in a better press for the foreskin and reducing the number of circumcisions for unjustifiable medical conditions, the most common being phimosis.

Similar trends are occurring elsewhere, e.g. masturbation is no longer outlawed but is rightly positioned as an integral and healthy part of sexual activity.

All this gives us more solid facts and information on which to make better choices in areas which, not so long ago, were virtually taboo for open discussion. Last, but by no means least, the Acorn magazine can and should be a vehicle for such discussion. Let's all do our bit to make it so!

An Unexpected Friendship

At the beginning of September last year I had an appointment at the day surgical unit of our local hospital; I needed treatment for some troublesome piles. I was allocated a bed and before long a young man in his mid-twenties appeared, to occupy the adjacent bed. He was clearly nervous and upset.

We began chatting and it soon transpired that he had come to be circumcised. He was planning to take a job in a primitive part of Kenya connected with woodland conservation, but before being offered the job it had been necessary for him to have a medical examination. The doctor had passed him generally fit but had told him by letter that he had a tight foreskin and that it would be foolish for him to travel before being circumcised. This had perplexed him as, although he had never been able to retract his foreskin, his penis had never given him any trouble and he had always been happy and satisfied with the 'status quo'. He had a girl friend and she had never made any comment about his penis.

When I told him that I had been circumcised as an adult, his feeling of relief was clear to see that here was someone who had been in a similar situation. I went on to explain that I had been troubled by periodic inflammation of the foreskin and knob which had been aggravated by a long foreskin and the doctor had recommended that I should be circumcised.

I explained to him that I thought his doctor's advice was one of precaution; if he developed inflammation or an infection under his foreskin which was quite likely in a hot climate and if he was unable to retract his foreskin then he would quickly be in trouble particularly if medical help was not readily available; he began to see the reasoning behind his doctor's advice. I concluded by saying that for the first few weeks his exposed knob would be tender and very sensitive and to expect involuntary erections; he would almost certainly need stitches to help heal the wound. We wished each other all the very best.

Six weeks later we happened to meet up again in out-patients and we quickly renewed our friendship. He said that things had worked out very much as I had said and that overall he was pleased with the result; in particular it had not been as painful as he had feared and his knob was now larger than previously. He and his girl friend had recently had oral sex together which had been highly satisfying for both of them but alas she was not planning to come to Kenya. If his arrangements worked out as he hoped, he would fly out to Nairobi early in the New Year. Finally he said that if we had not met up and chatted, he doubted very much if he would have had the courage to give his final consent for the operation.

Looking back, it is amazing how, in the hospital situation we found ourselves, such a deep and personal friendship was established so quickly.

Ouch!

How many guys have problems with their frenulum? About 5% according to an article in The Guardian on 28 February last year. And Jonathan Cope, the author, was one of them.

Most men probably aren't even aware that they have a frenulum – the ridge of skin under the glans which joins the glans to the foreskin. It is there as part of the mechanism which allows the foreskin to retract and the glans to become exposed, especially when the penis is erect.

But the frenulum varies from male to male, and in some men it is too short. Then, when the foreskin retracts, the frenulum becomes extremely taut and tugs considerably on the glans, pulling it in a downward fashion and in so doing causing pain or extreme discomfort. This is frenulum breve.

Guys may first become aware of this when they start masturbating. However, they quickly learn how to adapt their technique to prevent pain and the problem may seem to go away – only to occur again when they first have intercourse. The pushing motion which drags the foreskin back along the shaft tightens the short, taut frenulum to its limit causing a very sharp, severe pain. Sometimes the frenulum stretches beyond its limit and tears. Generally if the tear is not large it will heal spontaneously over a period of a few days. And that may be the end of the problem. Such ruptures are 'successful' in the sense that no corrective measure is necessary. But others leave a persisting shortness of the frenulum and at the same time a fragile scar which may rip in a repeated manner. In these cases it is necessary to operate.

So much for the theory. What happens in practice? Jonathan Cope's frenulum snapped twice, the first time during sex. But it healed within a week and there were no further problems for seven years. The second time it went he was washing his penis. Just a barely visible cut on the frenulum but this time it did not heal and so began several painful months. Despite abstinence the healing process did not take place. NHS Direct unhelpfully suggested that too much sex was to blame. Salty baths, creams, antiseptics, nothing helped. As ever, the internet provided conflicting information, and worryingly for him, a couple of sites mentioned full circumcision under general anaesthetic and an overnight hospital stay. This was backed up by a nurse he spoke to at Guy's hospital in London; he didn't like the sound of it at all. He rather liked his foreskin!

Two months later he went to a genito-urinary clinic. The consultant diagnosed frenulum breve and advised surgery – but not circumcision. In only a small number of cases, he was told, was circumcision required. Mostly, frenuloplasty was sufficient. In this operation, the frenulum is cut vertically and the two tiny flaps of skin that this creates are sewn into the foreskin with a couple of stitches. These dissolve in a fortnight, and after a couple of weeks most men have fully recovered and are able to resume sexual activity. But the waiting list was fifteen months long. So he went private. Again frenulum breve was diagnosed and he was warned that even if his cut healed naturally, he would be left with scar tissue – thicker and more brittle skin which would be prone to splitting. So an operation was again advised. But the operation, he was told, was far quicker and less traumatic than full circumcision. It would be done with a local anaesthetic as an outpatient procedure with return to work as soon as it was done.

But still Jonathan hesitated, waiting for some natural improvement. Finally after six months of suffering, he bit the bullet. The operation was over in ten minutes – painless apart from the local anaesthetic injection just below the head of the penis. He had a cup of tea and went straight back to work. Over the next month painful erections were a bit of a nuisance but after that daily applications of E45 kept the operation scar supple. After six months of painful sex followed by a month of none at all, the relief was immeasurable!

[Editor's note: There are quite frequently stories related to circumcision in the media. When members notice such stories, I would be very grateful if they would send details to me, if possible with the press cutting concerned. Please don't assume that I shall automatically be aware of it!]

Live From Golgotha

Not one, but two simulated circumcisions on stage in the first 15 minutes. This was the scenario at the Drill Hall London in November/December 2002. Live from Golgotha is set in the first century AD amongst the new Christian community. At that time, Paul was proselytising amongst the gentiles and realised that circumcision was likely to be a turn off for potential converts. So he conveniently changed the requirement for circumcision of the foreskin into circumcision of the heart (whatever that might mean). This policy was not well received by the community back in Jerusalem who saw Christianity as an off-shoot of Judaism. Circumcision was still de rigueur. Timothy had been chosen by Paul as his companion on his missionary journeys. Timothy's father was Greek but his mother was Jewish. Technically, therefore, Timothy was Jewish but he had never been circumcised. So, as a sop to the Jerusalem community and to demonstrate that he still believed in circumcision for Jews, Paul had Timothy circumcised.

All this is fact, and the play dramatises the moment. Timothy is carried on to the stage on a stretcher. Two Jews, one waving a knife, approach, they simulate an attack on Timothy's penis, and he sits up, his face contorted by agony, and for the next ten minutes he continues to hold his groin, wincing and complaining, although towards the end of this period, he does say the pain is easing. Unfortunately, Timothy keeps his loincloth on throughout both the operation and its aftermath, so we never find out whether his status better qualifies him to play the 'before' or 'after' scene.

The play is based on a novel of the same name by Gore Vidal. Of course, Vidal has a bit of a thing about foreskins and circumcision. In Myra Breckinridge, for instance, there is a passage which says that Myron never forgave his mother for having him circumcised and later Miss Myra investigates whether Rusty is circumcised or not. Do we detect a bit of an obsession here? Join the club, Gore.

Back to the play. It's an odd story about time travel and a computer buff hacking back through time to delete all reference to the Christian story and rewrite it from a Zionist perspective. The play didn't get good reviews and needn't detain us further here. But the first 15 minutes meant that it was definitely worthwhile for any Acorn member.

And the second circumcision? Because this is a play about time, Timothy's circumcision is replayed. Again the knife, again the agony, again the moaning; and again, unfortunately, the loincloth.

Silence is the worst that an editor can suffer. This was my perhaps unwise comment in my first editorial. Well, you certainly ain't been silent! "Too pro-circ" was the comment after Issue 1. "We don't want to read about smelly foreskins" after Issue 2. What is a poor, beleaguered editor to do?!

Let me explain the picture as I see it. We have both cut and uncut in our membership. Many roundheads are convinced that their permanently denuded glans confers untold benefits. Many cavaliers have every intention of preserving that extra piece of skin. But we should not assume that everyone is happy with their status. Some uncircumcised members seek information and support as they ponder the final chop. Others, circumcised at birth and thus condemned to minority status, now seek to work through their complexes on the issue. In other words, we are all coming at this from different angles, all seeking something slightly different from the Acorn community and magazine.

Added to that, we all have our own fascinations with the topic. For some, the status of David Beckham is a matter of total indifference. For others, a definitive report on just what nestles in those Man Utd shorts would be the news coup of the year; and information about Brooklyn and Romeo would be the icing on the cake. Tales of pre-pubescent and adolescent awakening are a source of endless fascination to some, a yawn-inducing bore for others. Some find ritual and tribal circumcision exotic and erotic; others avert their eyes and turn away with a shudder. The message is that we each have our own take on the subject and it is unreasonable to expect that every article is going to be of equal interest to every reader. ## Editor's Interview

Growing up cut

What's it like to be young, living in rural England and circumcised? Virtually unique, says John who is in his early 20's and lives in middle England. John was circumcised at the age of 2 to cure phimosis. Interestingly, his younger brother was also cut in infancy for the same reason, confirming the observation that tight foreskins often run in families, although John does not know his father's status. Very few of his peers were circumcised so his penis has always been an object of interest to other males and his special status had provoked curiosity, ridicule and wonderment.

John was 6 or 7 when he first realised that his penis was different from other boys'. Fortunately, he had the sort of relationship with his mother where he could ask and she could explain what had happened to him and why. He learnt more about the foreskin at age 8 or 9. He and a school friend were first on the school bus in the morning, last off in the evening. These few minutes of privacy gave opportunities to compare and contrast equipment and he was able to view at close quarters the workings of an uncut penis. He recalls that he was an early developer and one of the first in his age group to grow pubic hair. This, and his modified cock with its very obvious circumcision, meant that his groin was the focus of many glances and stares from his class mates. There was a period during his teenage years when he was taunted about being circumcised and was called "Jewish boy". There were sniggers in the showers and at the urinals, so that he became shy about his body, hiding under a towel and only using cubicles in the toilet.

But he gradually overcame any sense of inferiority. He is now proud of his circumcision and quite happy to be seen naked. He recounts one recent experience after swimming when he noticed a guy in the showers eyeing his penis. In the changing room, the guy came up to him and said: "Can I ask you a personal question?" "You can ask." "Are you circumcised?" This led to a five minute discussion on the merits of circumcision and another display of the evidence.

John remembers with amusement the bewilderment of a Polish medical student when confronted by John's penis. Previously, his only sighting of a circumcised penis had been in a textbook illustration. He was amazed by John's very large and totally exposed glans. (John thinks that it was the size of his glans which caused the initial phimosis. But there may be a chicken and egg situation here; perhaps circumcising the constricting foreskin allowed the glans to expand and flare to its full potential. John's large endowment may be the result of his circumcision rather than its cause.)

John is gay and I asked whether he preferred his lovers to be circumcised. He is not against guys with foreskins – living where he does, he would have to be virtually celibate if he were! But the problem is, they don't know how to handle his cock. When masturbating him, they try to pull the shaft skin up over the glans as if he had a foreskin. This is painful and quickly makes him sore. He also finds that uncut guys cum more quickly than him. So whilst he is still highly aroused and enjoying himself, the other guy is on his first cigarette! One of his most satisfactory lovers was a guy who liked his foreskin held tightly back and being masturbated as if he was circumcised. Not surprisingly, he knew exactly how to bring John off.

And how does John masturbate when he is alone? He has two methods. In the first, he holds his cock tightly at the base with his left hand, smothers his glans with lube and strokes it, slowly at first, increasing in speed and intensity as climax approaches. Alternatively, he massages his circumcision scar line, stroking his frenulum from time to time to heighten the sensation. And his masturbatory fantasy? Circumcised US servicemen. Well, there are lots of those on our TV screens at the moment, enough even to fuel John's daily morning and evening orgasms (with a third frequently thrown in for good measure – and the Victorians thought circumcision discouraged masturbation!)

Although John has a fairly tight cut, he is considering a revision sometime in the future, although it's not a first financial priority. One problem is that he has skin bridges. On the top side of the penis, the scar is very close to the corona and in some places skin bridges have formed between the shaft skin and the glans. They can be painful and John would like them removed. He is also considering losing his frenulum. He says that it is very thin – as often seems to be the case with infant circumcisions where, even if the frenulum is not cut, it still fails to develop fully. One lover used to offer to cut it away with nail scissors. John thinks it would have been possible but was never brave enough to let him try.

John is delighted to have found the Acorn Society and a community of men as interested in circumcision as he is. He is hoping to attend the next meeting this autumn. He is, perhaps, the youngest member of the Society and it will be good to have him with us. He will be assured of a very warm welcome.

Preserving The Foreskin

The foreskin is a problematical structure in that any trauma or inflammation inflicted upon the prepuce results in tightening as healing and scarring occur. The trauma may be the result of forceful sexual encounters of all varieties. Inflammation may result from bacterial balanoposthitis – redness and swelling of the foreskin and glans penis. When these conditions occur and resolve, the foreskin is tighter and more difficult to retract than it started out. Likewise this tightness makes future trauma more likely since the prepuce must stretch more to retract behind the glans and the skin also loses some elasticity each time healing occurs. In addition to the preputial opening narrowing with trauma or inflammation, the frenulum may likewise undergo these same changes. The result is a shortening of the frenulum also rendering it more vulnerable to further injury.

While many men choose to manage these foreskin complications with circumcision, others may wish to retain the prepuce. To accomplish this, the tightness needs to be resolved so that repeated tearing and splitting will either not occur or will be minimized. The simplest and least invasive means of accomplishing these needs is the application of topical cream or ointments. These may be antibiotic preparations to combat an acute bacterial posthitis (inflammation of the foreskin) or balanoposthitis (inflammation of the foreskin and glans). Once the infection is cleared, the use of a topical corticosteroid will help to reduce any residual inflammation. Steroids may also improve elasticity and tightness of already established phimosis. These topical products are the first line of therapy for men with phimosis who desire to retain the prepuce. They are usually fairly effective with mild tightness. However, once there is significant loss of the skin's elasticity, topical agents have low chance of succeeding.

If a tight circular scar has formed causing phimosis, or difficulty retracting the foreskin, there are two foreskin-sparing surgical techniques which may be useful. The more aesthetically-pleasing is lateral preputioplasty. The basic concept involves transferring preputial length to its circumference. Generally, there is one ring of tight area on the inner surface of the foreskin. Through this area, small, longitudinal incisions, one to two centimetres in length, are made. These are then sutured vertically. That is to say, incisions are made parallel to the long axis of the shaft of the penis, which are closed with sutures in line with the penile circumference. The result is widening of the tightest area of the foreskin allowing it to retract more freely. Phimosis always affects the mucosal (inner) surface of the foreskin because it is the more delicate surface. Therefore lateral preputioplasty is done on the mucosal side making it a good cosmetic procedure with no visible scar tissue on the outer foreskin. With careful surgical technique, scarring will be minimized with good functional results.

A simpler option for surgical treatment of phimosis is the dorsal slit. This technique involves making a dorsal incision in the foreskin extending from the tip of the prepuce down to the corona of the glans. The edges are then over sewn so that a V-shaped notch in the end of the foreskin is the result. While producing an excellent functional outcome, the aesthetic appearance is suboptimal. This technique is most suited to the chronically ill or to men who are no longer sexually active. It is quicker and easier than a circumcision, and does preserve the foreskin, but does not yield an attractive result.

Another complication of the foreskin that can follow inflammation or trauma is shortening and tightness of the frenulum. The frenulum develops scarring so that it becomes under tension with erection which makes it increasingly susceptible to further trauma. Topical steroids are sometimes successful in treating this condition and making the frenulum more elastic and resilient. When medical therapy fails, surgical options exist.

Surgical management of a tight frenulum (frenulum breve) includes frenulotomy and frenulectomy. Frenulotomy or frenuloplasty utilize a similar technique to the lateral preputioplasty discussed above; the incision and direction of closure are opposite from preputioplasty however. Frenuloplasty involves a horizontal incision (parallel to the circumference of the penis) closed vertically (parallel to the penile long axis). This lengthens the frenulum. The other surgical option is removing the frenulum completely (frenulectomy). Either technique works quite nicely and leaves a good cosmetic appearance.

These are all reasonable options for rehabilitating diseased foreskins and are intended for men who are motivated to retain the prepuce or are too ill to undergo circumcision. A man with one of the aforementioned foreskin diseases who wishes to be circumcised should not allow himself to be influenced into having one of these procedures instead. Circumcision will permanently and definitively remedy any preputial disease and many would regard it as preferred therapy for phimosis or frenulum breve.

Latest Onslaught On Circumcision — From Acorn!

I refer to various articles in Issue 2/2003, just received but especially to your Editorial and Editor's Column (on 'Retraction') – and more especially to the highly anti-circumcision article by RBW entitled "Acorn Is Too Biased" on page 11.

I nearly choked on my cornflakes when the post arrived and I started by reading this article! Questions have to be asked about it and, in particular, why did you give space in our magazine to someone who, on his own admission, has resigned from membership because of his disagreement with Acorn policy? He talks about rejoining "should you once again decide to honour your terms of reference" – well, I for one hope that people with such anti-circumcision views never rejoin – or join in the first place! To exacerbate your position you then trail that another of his missives will appear in the next edition! If it is as misguided as the present one, it will be avoided by me ... and by many other members who share my views.

There is so much emotive rubbish (like the, oh so boring, 'genital mutilation' nonsense) written about this useless bit of skin, which is about as redundant as the appendix – and so many groups now which set out to defend it – that I feel very strongly that Acorn should no longer try to sit on the fence (an impossible position to be in anyway) but should be positive about the advantages of circumcision in men – i.e. a Pro-Circ Society. We appear unfortunately to be a dying breed thanks to the misinformation being put about by people such as RBW, and can do with all the help we can get to support the unquestionable positive benefits of being cut!

And, by the way, "Retractors" as your article called them are nothing less than Impostors. If they want to have the many advantages of being cut, they should show their convictions, and a small degree of courage to overcome the short-term discomfort, and have it done. Dr Cornell's excellent articles in your magazine should get them started. But let's not be fooled as we walk along a naturist beach: many who at first sight look cut are impostors and wannabees! Still I suppose it shows the general support men have for the look of the cut cock (flattery?) – especially so when combined with a smooth, hairless, body as is increasingly the case.

Contrary to what RBW believes, most women are far from "sentenced to second class sex lives" when partnered by a circumcised male: most women (according to a survey a short while ago and also my own observations from talking to many of them) prefer the look and performance of the circumcised organ (it's especially great for oral sex and it makes for 'longer lasting' too, they rightly point out). Some describe the uncut cock as being like an unhygienic repulsive 'elephant's trunk', nasty to look at, nasty to smell, nasty to taste and nasty to have intercourse with. A view with which I would not disagree even as a male – more so for a female into whose orifices the uncut penis is made to penetrate!

In fairness, from correspondence to my Smooth & Cut Naturists group I have had from all over the world, there are many mature uncircumcised men who would gladly rid themselves of this useless appendage but who just lack the courage to go through with it. There are a great number of reasons why infant circumcision (when the organ is small) is to be recommended and this is one of them: no remembered trauma or post-operative embarrassment. Others are: resultant larger growth of the glans (with well developed and deep corona) and even the simple ability to 'aim straight' when urinating from an early age.

In conclusion, Mr Editor, as a proudly circumcised man who can hold his head high(!) on the subject, I really do not want to be forced to read any more articles in your magazine about vile and disgusting foreskins (even the word makes me feel sick!) or from proponents of their virtues (if there are any) in the pages of your journal from now on.

My decision to rejoin Acorn this year was based on the fact that the Society seemed to be getting more pro-circ – if that is not the case you will find that both I and other members proud of their cut equipment will also be waving farewell at or before the next renewal.

Postscript Questions:

- 1 What is the percentage of cut to non-cut members in Acorn?
- 2 At the very least surely this percentage should be reflected in the overall 'official view' of the Society and its journal, shouldn't it?
- 3 If Acorn wants to sit uncomfortably on the fence, why not make alternate issues Pro- and Anti-circumcision and then all the many members such as myself who do not wish even to hear the dreaded "F-word" any more could quite simply "file" those editions appropriately without wasting precious time on them?

Reply To RBW's Article "Acorn Is Too Biased"

I don't understand your article and your statement that you are going to leave the society because it doesn't suit your uncircumcised views; it is, in my opinion, a coward's way out. I would NEVER leave the society; if it became too pro-foreskin then I would write articles and fight this idea. I always understood that Acorn was a pro-circumcision group, hence the title "Acorn" which is the symbol of the circumcised penis. I think it is utter rubbish to talk about "The damage caused us by circumcision" and to say that it has led to the complete failure of your sex-life due to a total loss of sensitivity. In my case it was quite the reverse and since my circumcision, my sex life has been a million times better without that useless foreskin. People are not "hell bent on causing damage to other little boys". They are out to ensure that their sons have a clean and healthy penis and will not become prone to many of the problems the uncircumcised encounter in later life.

It is not true that the circumcised rate in the USA has dropped from over 90% to about 60%. Well not according to the statistics I have read. Unfortunately circumcision seems to have dropped slightly but no doubt it will increase again when parents realise all the benefits from it. Despite the view that “Europe looks in incredulity at those who are prepared to jeopardise their children’s future sexual happiness etc.” more circumcisions are now being performed in Hungary, Germany and even Finland!

On a final note, I know dozens of guys who have been circumcised both as infants and in adult life and they are absolutely in favour of it and say that sex is wonderful. On the other hand I also know many uncut guys who are unhappy with their state, want to be circumcised but lack the courage to have it done. Many have foreskins that have never been retracted since birth and you are not going to tell me that is “Sex as Nature Intended It!”

Whining

With due respect, the contribution from RBW in Issue 2/2003 strikes me as the effusion of a whiner who is confident that he is the only one in step, everyone else being out of step. I think RBW would be much happier in a frankly and solidly anti-cut organisation.

The Acorn Concept

Some members seem to have the idea that Acorn is, or should be, totally pro-circ. To put the picture straight we had better start at the beginning. Forum magazine has large sections devoted to letters and “Dear Doctor”. The foreskin and arguments for and against circumcision are topics which come up more frequently than anything else, so much so that one of the editors refused to publish letters on the subject. So in March 1987 a Forum Group for those who share this interest was suggested. A member from Lancashire, who is now our President, agreed to run the group, and the first newsletter was published in January 1988. Here is one of his first paragraphs.

Why ACORN? The group was originally advertised as 'for foreskin/circumcision fetishists'. That may be a sociological description, but it is not a very convenient flag to sail under. I'd prefer to describe the group as 'for people interested in foreskins and circumcision'. One member summed up our aims as being 'for everyone interested in getting their cock into the best possible shape'. Another version of our aims would be to serve as a means of exchanging (views of) '101 ideas of things to do with a foreskin'. Various names for the group were suggested, including 'Cavaliers and Roundheads', 'To cut or not to cut', 'The cock-cut club', etc. But we decided on ACORN. At a glance, it is short, uncomplicated, fairly general, and could apply to a group interested in anything from computing to naval history ('hearts of oak, and all that"). But if you look in a dictionary, you will find that the Latin for acorn is glans, and of course, if you look at an acorn you will immediately see the point. Also it applies equally well to both cavaliers and roundheads. So I hope you agree that the name is appropriate: outsiders won't know, insiders will.

I think that says it all. I do know, having been editor for ten years, that if it had not been for the cut and thrust of debate (sometimes a little venomous), but simply a one subject group, it wouldn't have lasted two years.

Book Review

Sex As Nature Intended It by Kristen O'Hara (with Jeffrey O'Hara)

As the first generation of uncircumcised Americans – 35% of them – approach puberty, some of them are coming under pressure from peers and girlfriends to get themselves circumcised and are asking for advice. It appears that a lot of girls in the States are brought up to consider circumcision as the norm and foreskins as nature's little design fault. Clearly to reverse this a campaign targeted at American females needs to be started – and the first shot in this campaign has been fired by another woman – Kristen O'Hara in her newly published book, Sex As Nature Intended It.

I confidently predict that this book will prove to be a landmark in the progress of the campaign against RIC since it appeals to the enlightened self-interest of all women who prize the quality of their sex life, rightly a matter of increasing concern and enthusiasm to all 'liberated' women. The basic message of the book is this:

- a) Male circumcision removes a substantial capacity for sexual enjoyment in men.
- b) It removes an even greater capacity for sexual enjoyment in their female partners.
- c) The sexual deficit suffered by circumcised men and their female partners can to a large extent be remedied by foreskin restoration.

To reach these conclusions Kristen has carried out a carefully conducted survey of those in a position to contribute, not least herself, since she relates with surprising – and admirable – candour, her own frequently repeated experiments in comparing her sexual pleasure and satisfaction from sex with her intact lover and then with her circumcised husband Jeffrey. The unfortunate Jeffrey comes a very poor second! So pronounced was the discrepancy that Kristen was prompted to research the reasons for it and eventually to develop the theory upon which her book is based.

She says, “Real sexual pleasure (with a foreskin), as nature intended – tender, softly smooth and sensuous – is so much more delicious and rewarding than circumcised sex” and this lady is speaking from experience! She goes on to claim that “the surgically altered penis has untold negative effects on a woman’s pleasure throughout intercourse”. It is only when the foreskin is present that a man and a woman can achieve their full potential for sexual ecstasy. She develops her argument with the contention that the intact penis is more sensitive and therefore more gentle in its thrusts – to the delight of the participating woman! The length of stroke is affected since the pleasure zones are concentrated in the foreskin and frenulum area which makes short, rapid stroking more rewarding. As Kristen says, “These short strokes, deep within the vagina, cause the male pubic mound to make gentle, rapid, almost constant contact with the woman’s clitoral mound”, engendering higher levels of passion – with the corollary that “the foreskin is the key to a woman’s sexual ecstasy”.

The circumcised penis on the other hand compensates for its sensitivity deficit with rough, tough and much longer strokes which can be deeply unrewarding, painful even, for a woman, who does not experience the benefit of the closely maintained contact between male and female pubic mounds. She then states with ringing certainty that, “as they realise how important the foreskin is to their sexual pleasure, women will want their circumcised partner to begin restoring his foreskin without delay”! She bases this assertion on her good fortune to have been sexually intimate with a man with a foreskin. Until then, she like many women, didn’t realise that the circumcised article was the cause of much dissatisfaction with intercourse. As far as the men are concerned, they will queue up to join the Foreskin Restoration Movement when they realise what they are missing.

In subsequent chapters, Kristen develops her basic theme, represented by her claim that “sex with a circumcised penis and sex with a natural penis are as different as night and day”. “Women who have never experienced intercourse with a foreskin complain of vaginal discomfort and displeasure – the exercise also lacks the quality of ‘out-of-this-world, dreamy nirvana’ which those with foreskinned lovers take for granted”. The natural progression from this is that women have a much closer and more loving relationship with an intact man who can give them what they want in bed. Those with circumcised partners are more likely to split up, hence the 50% divorce rate in the USA.

Kristen moves on to what some may consider the most fascinating chapter of the book, where she describes her own experiences with, and reactions to, foreskins and roundheads. In the mid-60s she met her first lover, an intact married man. At the same time she had an affair with another man, circumcised this time and unmarried. She was having intercourse with both men several times a week and was therefore in a good position to make a comparison. With Tom, the intact man, she wanted sex to go on forever, whereas with Mike, the roundhead, she was continually frustrated: he banged away at her and she felt “unconnected” and unfulfilled. She thereafter had several short-term involvements with both intact men and roundheads and realised that sex was much more pleasurable with men with foreskins.

After three years enjoyable sex with Tom, she met her first husband, Jeff and although she was in love with him, found him vaguely unsatisfying which she eventually blamed on his circumcised penis. He never lifted her to the heights of passion she had known with Tom. A few years into the marriage she started seeing Tom again – finding her memories of sex with him irrepressible – she could “hear the angels sing” when they had intercourse.

After several years being faithful to her husband she renewed her affair with Tom finding “natural love” i.e. with a foreskin, irresistible. She then started experiencing considerable vaginal discomfort with her husband which finally developed into vaginismus, a painful condition where the vagina goes into spasm and sex is next to impossible. She claims that vaginismus in the USA is often related to repeated exposure to the circumcised penis. To check this theory out she once again contacts Tom, who to her delight performs the act without any recurrence of her spasms. This of course clinches it and she briefly tells her husband that his circumcision is the cause of her problem. Poor fellow. Help is at hand however and she gets him to undergo a surgical foreskin restoration after telling him all about Tom’s wonderful penis (my words, not hers, but implicit). Thereafter life becomes a bunch of roses, their sexual relationship is restored to match his new foreskin and both are now enjoying the fruits of natural love.

The important thing is that this book, once its contents become widely known in the USA, should sell on a very wide scale and if the many American women who are influenced by health or lifestyle innovations take it to heart, we should see a sudden and welcome reduction in the RIC percentage in USA, currently hovering at 55%.

Finding A Sympathetic Doctor

A common bugbear in members’ dealings with the medical community appears to be embarrassment or a wish not to ‘bother’ their GPs with circumcision enquiries?! Might I suggest these individuals use their local men’s health clinics (once known as STD or special clinics) as the Doctors there will have seen (literally) everything and will be more able to discuss the pros and cons of circumcision. They may be better placed in referring patients to a sympathetic urologist if surgery is desired. This will avoid costly private clinics with the possibility of unqualified staff. Chances are, the eventual outcome of any circs will be cheaper and more satisfactory! I understand the current charge for circumcision in Harley Street is well in excess of £1,000... The Doctors at men’s health clinics see literally thousands of penises each year and will be happy to deal with doubts and fears.

K.G. – London

Mostly A Complete Indifference

As a gay man I can honestly say that over the years, I've probably seen more cocks than your average Mr Great Britain – unless of course you happen to be a urologist in the local GUM clinic. My sightings have ranged from the huge to the minute and cover men of all ages. Observations reveal that the overall proportion of those circumcised is about 1 in 4 or 5 which compares favourably with the medically estimated number of British men who have encountered Madame Guillotine. I've read on various occasions that the circumcision rate in the UK is about 20 or 25%, allowing for religious or ritual circumcisions as well as for medical reasons.

From my own observations, the “cut off point” seems to be about 40 years of age. Below this age the rate of circumcision falls dramatically and proportionately with age and likewise, in reverse, the older you get the circumcision rate increases. Go each side of 40: at 20 a chap is almost certainly not going to be circumcised whereas at 60 years of age it will be a 50/50 chance that he will/will not be snipped. Again this observation seems to comply well with the calculated medical statistics.

However, whatever their status, there is an almost complete lack of interest in what to Acorn members is a very consuming subject and one that makes for a very erotic topic of conversation. This England is a country full of field sports and cruising is one of them although unlike fox hunting which ceases at the start of the mating season, cock hunting is in season all months of the year and even the coldest of weather seems to do little to deter it.

Often gay sex is anonymous and apart from the odd squeal of pleasure frequently no verbal exchanges are made. However, when conversation does occur it is almost always directed mostly to cock size, amount of pubic hair or lack of it in the case of those who shave their pubic bush and balls, thickness of shaft and size of balls. I can still count on my fingers the number of times that, when a chap has seen my cock for the first time, he has commented on the fact that I am circumcised. Even then it is only usually a general observation rather than an indication of pleasure or disapproval. Apart from a very few encounters with Acorn members over the years, I've still yet to meet a guy who shows any sign of great delight when discovering for the first time that I am a Roundhead. The norm in my experience is a complete lack of interest in my cut status to such a degree that mostly leaves me wondering if he has even noticed that I am completely divested of my foreskin. This is true for Roundheads and Cavaliers alike. The most I can expect is some vague comment as to the size of my knob or its extended flared rim but even then rarely ever to the probable cause – being circumcised.

If I mention being circumcised or try to bring up the topic of conversation, it seldom gets any reply more than “Yes” or “OK” or “Don't mind”. The fact is that other chaps, unless it happens to be an Acorn member or a prospective one, don't even notice if a cock is cut or not, or if they do then the necessary brain cell to trigger a response to this observation is just not in this particular head.

Just imagine that, just as in Acorn we note how cocks can/have been circumcised, so there is a sister group called Petal. Petal concerns an obsessive interest in how your finger nails are cut – how short/long they are – are they cut straight or curved – are they filed smooth or are they left jagged? Petal members are obsessed with the appearance of their fingernails and that of others and seize any opportunity to glance or stare at the finger nails of others whenever they can. Do you look at other people's finger nails? No, of course not, it has never occurred to you that you might want to until it is suggested that there are some people who might.

Likewise, others take no interest in your trimmed cock status; usually they are most concerned at how big it is – even if there are other aspects of its appearance you would far sooner they were showing interest in.

A Female View

Having just read the article in Issue 2/2003 submitted by “RBW”, after the magazine was shown to me by an Acorn member, I would just like to offer a few words from a woman's point of view in favour of the circumcised penis. Having had experience of both varieties (from an “end user's” viewpoint!), I have to say that in my opinion the circumcised penis is far preferable for many reasons.

For one thing, it looks better: much neater and not resembling an ugly elephant's trunk – and I am not the only woman who thinks this. Secondly, it is much more hygienic. In my experience no matter how clean an uncircumcised man thinks he is there can still be a “fishy” smell when the foreskin is pulled back – even only an hour after bathing. Not a lot of men realise this and seem to assume that it is only women who have an odour if they don't keep themselves meticulously clean. Thirdly, with the reduced level of sensitivity in the glans, the circumcised male is able to prolong lovemaking to the satisfaction of both partners. Another very important aspect to consider is that medical research has shown that the uncircumcised penis is one of the factors responsible for women contracting cancer of the cervix.

In his article, RBW complains of a “complete failure” of his sex life “due to a total loss of sensitivity” as he got older – but who is to say that he would not have lost his sex drive anyway as he got older, for other reasons? In my experience uncircumcised men have been equally likely to lose their sex drive as they get older, but this is often due to other health and psychological factors which can affect the libido (such as heart problems, depression etc). I have heard from men who have chosen to be circumcised later in life, and they told me that they have never looked back. They felt that it looked better and “performed” better, and their partners were also delighted with the end result!

As for RBW's statistics and “recommended reading material” – I would personally pay no heed to this, because anybody can come up with statistics and percentages to fit in with their own point of view – and there are many websites, articles and books for and against circumcision.

From a woman's perspective I am very much in favour of male circumcision and whilst I would not insist that an uncircumcised partner had this procedure performed, I would actively encourage him to do so if he expressed such a desire!

Off Centre

Thursday night into Friday morning, the 2nd and 3rd of January 2003. Coughing, sneezing, tossing and turning in my bed, I got up at about 4.20 a.m. to give my wife some peace and quiet.

I switched on the kettle and then the TV Channel 4. An American sit com called Off Centre had already started. As I find U.S. sit coms rather insipid and stylised, I concentrated on making the coffee. I returned to the TV at 4.30 a.m. and had the surprise of my life.

No glib one liners, no wise cracks, just the adorable Anglo Irish actor, the delectable Mr Sean Maguire, lying on a consultant's table in a surgical gown, with the consultant holding up the gown, peering at his cock, saying "It will have to come off". He then explained to young Sean Maguire different ways of loosening his foreskin including a dorsal slit, and various types of full circumcision including a discussion of where he would want the scar line. He then held up several appliances and explained how he would clamp and cut his foreskin with one type of silver appliance, of which he explained the working in some detail. In a wonderful piece of comedy acting, young Maguire milked the comedy aspects for all they were worth. He jumped up and went home, only to return to the consultant in a while to go through with the op.

I can only assume a few days passed because Sean Maguire was in a changing room scene with his peer group and his uncut status was remarked upon. A girl who strayed in and stared at his fabulous torso caused his towel to fall to the ground and she exclaimed that, sorry, she didn't fancy him after all, she was Jewish.

The rest of the programme was peppered with circumcision humour and accurate facts (as far as I could discern).

Perhaps we should obtain a copy of the programme from Channel 4 to show at the next meeting. Here are the details:

Channel 4, 3rd January 2003 4.25 a.m. Off Centre, lasting approximately 20 minutes. Video plus reference 92773135

Time For The Cut?

Congratulations on your first issue! A great read from end to end for a cock/circumcision enthusiast like me. I especially liked the new column by Dr Cornell, which I very much hope will continue.

Another interest for me are the self-circumcisionists. It's great to read the details of such exploits. Although I doubt my own nerve for DIY, I applaud those with a very strong desire but very small budget. From what I read, it does seem quite (unjustifiably?) expensive to go private, and if the operation really is simple, they have my admiration.

My own cockskin is rather ragged and holey from years of piercing, deliberately stretching the holes, some big enough to put a finger through, others large enough to loop over my cockhead! Nearer the rim, some cut away. Looping my large foreskin holes over my glans means that the head is exposed – the foreskin loop effectively fits under the corona ridge and the whole foreskin hangs below. I prefer to wank with my shaft skin held back tightly, digitally stimulating the bare (lubricated) head. This is the reason why, at some point, I want my foreskin removed and the shaft skin tightened so that it doesn't have to be held back. So, although over the years I have enjoyed having a foreskin, I would, I think, also enjoy having the whole lot cut away. Consequently, I enjoy reading about guys who have.

Lastly, I think it should be a membership condition that everyone should at some time at least write in a letter fully describing his cock.

Circumcision Does Not Harm Sexual Function

Circumcision does not appear to have adverse effects on male sexual function in sexually active adults who undergo the procedure. This is the conclusion of research carried out by the Department of Urology at the Louisiana State University School of Medicine and reported in the May 2002 edition of the Journal of Urology. The researchers set out to test unsubstantiated claims of superior sexual sensitivity and satisfaction for uncircumcised males. A male sexual function questionnaire was given to sexually active males older than 18 years about to undergo circumcision. After a minimum interval of twelve weeks after the operation, the survey was again administered. All 15 men circumcised during the period participated. The majority of the men were between 25 and 49. The questionnaire covered five topics: sexual drive; erections; ejaculation; problem assessment; overall satisfaction. The results were analysed statistically. No differences in reactions before and after the operation were found in any of the five areas. In other words, circumcision had no deleterious effect on sexual drive, performance or satisfaction.

Friends

I wonder if any of the other readers watched an episode of the American comedy series Friends which had a circumcision sub-plot? Joey, the tv star, had to play an Italian character in a play with some nudity; his character being uncircumcised!

He took the role, not pointing out he was radically circumcised... Friend, Monica, offered to fashion a suitable foreskin for him involving a scene replete with ham, baloney and turkey slice prepuces. Eventually a suitable cosmetic compromise was reached with a fold of silly putty. When the none-too-bright Joey shows his lengthy foreskin to the play's producers the silly putty prostheses drops off to the embarrassment of the cast and horror of the leading actor.

A View On Nudism

Last summer, not for the first time, I went to a naturist gathering of 800 in the Pennsylvania mountains. The difference this time was that I gave a lecture on the history of circumcision over the last 4,000 years. It took just over an hour, and I was happy to note that everyone was agog. Although just about all the Americans were circumcised, their ignorance of the subject was astounding. One chap, who was a headmaster, asked me for my notes so that he could give the talk throughout his school.

At the end of the lecture I asked if they were happy to be circumcised. A full cry went up of "No". When I asked why, they all said "We weren't given the choice". This appears to be the consensus of opinion throughout the States, as the circumcision rate is coming down. It's still high in the Mid-west at 80%, but lowest in California at 40%. Last year, four States dropped Medicaid funding for circumcisions – Montana, North Carolina, Arizona and Missouri. They joined California, Mississippi, Oregon, Washington and Nevada, about a fifth of the nation. To get back to the gathering, there were four of us Brits, all with foreskins, and we were always the object of the American fascination for intact cocks. Other than us, there were a couple of Canadians, and a smattering of American Chinese and Latinos.

Later on last year I went to the French Naturist resort of Cap d'Agde, a city in itself able to hold 40,000. I went after the school holidays were over, so it was only half full. Here, the picture was very different from America. Being all Europeans, the uncut rate was about 90%, most cut ones being British. Making comparisons, I had a sneaking feeling that European cocks were marginally longer and thicker than their American counterparts, but that was in flaccid states. No way could there be the opportunity to measure hundreds of erections. See what this year brings.

My profound apologies. That's what the Manager of my local Mailboxes Etc branch said to me. And that is the sentiment that I pass on to any of you who tried to contact Acorn between mid-May and mid-June. The new Acorn mailbox was opened last December when I took over the editorship of the magazine. The arrangement was working perfectly until suddenly... it wasn't. Mailboxes Etc for some inexplicable reason decided that the mailbox, fully paid up until September 2003, was no longer active. I had noticed that I was receiving no mail, but I assumed that, with the arrival of Spring, Acorn members had better things to do than write to me (as if!) It was only when the Treasurer had a letter to me returned as undeliverable that we were alerted to the problem.

The difficulty is that I do not know what mail I did not receive. Some rejected letters may have been returned to the senders; others may still be languishing within the Royal Mail. I am very angry about this. It is not just the loss of correspondence which concerns me; it is also the fact that often what members choose to write to me is very personal and is meant only for the eyes of like minded people. It is not a happy thought for such letters to be opened by strangers.

Male Circumcision — New BMA Guidelines

In April, the BMA issued guidelines on male circumcision and these are summarised on page 3. Although purporting to cover all such operations, they are largely concerned with so-called non-therapeutic circumcision – where the operation is performed without immediate medical cause.

The pamphlet acknowledges that the members of the BMA are split on this subject. No doubt there are many doctors who would like a total ban on such circumcisions. Yet, in today's multi-cultural society, it would be impossible, for instance, to ban Muslim and Jewish doctors from performing this rite, and such a ban would only serve to send the practice underground to back street practitioners.

But this split means that the logic of the pamphlet is, at times, tortuous. Doctors, we are told, have to act in the best interests of the child when agreeing to the circumcision procedure. The child must take part in the decision if he is old enough – although there is absolutely no guidance as to the relevant age. If a four or five year old objects, is this sufficient to veto the operation? As a general principle, the decision is that of the parents – and both parents should be involved. “The BMA is generally very supportive of allowing parents to make choices on behalf of their children.” The child's social and cultural circumstances are uppermost. Where a child is living in a culture in which circumcision is required for all males, the increased acceptance into a family or society that circumcision can confer is considered to be a strong social or cultural benefit.

However, circumcision for health benefits alone is not justified i.e. parents who seek to have their son circumcised for prophylactic advantages, whether hygiene, aesthetics or the prevention of possible future problems, should be turned away. Apparently, the evidence concerning health benefits is insufficient for this alone to be a justification.

This is disappointing. The BMA is essentially saying: “We cannot stop parents having their sons circumcised for ritual or social reasons; they have no right to choose circumcision for health reasons.” What happened to the BMA being generally very supportive of allowing parents to make choices on behalf of their children?

Of course, for the articulate, middle class parents, these guidelines will cause no problems. They can easily argue their case under a ‘social’ umbrella (“it is a family tradition”) and sympathetic doctors will have no difficulty ‘justifying’ their decisions to perform such circumcisions as being within the guidelines. But inarticulate parents, in awe of their doctors, are still likely to receive rebuffs when they seek circumcision, believing it to be the best policy for their sons. These guidelines bring RIC on demand not one inch nearer.

The BMA Guidelines — A Summary

The new guidelines concern the ethics of male circumcision and are designed to offer doctors a model of good practice and safeguards which should be followed when male babies and children are circumcised. In particular, the guidelines are concerned with non-therapeutic circumcision. This is defined as circumcision performed, not for clinical or medical causes, but for religious reasons; or to incorporate a child into the community; or because some fathers want their sons to be like them.

The guidelines acknowledge that circumcision at parental request is an increasingly controversial area and argues that the medical evidence about its health impact is equivocal. There is a spectrum of views within the BMA membership about whether non-therapeutic male circumcision is a beneficial, neutral or harmful procedure. The Association has no policy on these issues but it believes that parents should be entitled to make choices as how best to promote their children’s interests. Doctors must use their skills in a way that promotes their patients’ interests and weigh the benefits and harms of circumcision for the particular child.

It is at present generally accepted that non-therapeutic male circumcision is lawful, and there have been specific court rulings about the legality of ritual circumcision. In the mid 1990’s the English Law Commission concurred and called for law reform to put the lawfulness of ritual male circumcision beyond any doubt. There could however be implications in the Human Rights Act which incorporates Articles of the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law.

With respect to consent, the guidelines point out that consent for any procedure is valid only if the person or people giving consent understand the nature and implications of the procedure. Parents and children should therefore be provided with up-to-date written information about the risks. All children who are capable of expressing a view should be involved in decisions about whether they should be circumcised and their wishes taken into account. It would not be ethically acceptable to circumcise a competent, informed young person who consistently refuses the procedure. But doctors must balance the harms caused by violating a child’s refusal with the harm caused by not circumcising. Where children cannot decide for themselves, consent should be sought from both parents.

It is emphasised that doctors should perform male circumcision only where this is demonstrably in the best interests of the child. The responsibility so to demonstrate this falls to his parents. The social and cultural environment of the child may be a determining factor particularly in a culture where circumcision is a requirement for all males. Doctors should also take account of the fact that if they refuse circumcision, the operation may be performed elsewhere in unhygienic or unsafe conditions. The BMA is generally very supportive of allowing parents to make choices on behalf of their children and believes that neither society nor doctors should interfere unjustifiably in the relationship between parents and their children. Nevertheless, the child's best interests are paramount. Parents must explain and justify their requests for circumcision in terms of the child's interests. The BMA considers that the evidence concerning health benefits from non-therapeutic circumcision is insufficient for this alone to be a justification for doing it.

Poorly performed circumcisions have legal implications for the doctor responsible. However, action cannot currently be taken against a doctor simply because a man is unhappy about having been circumcised at all. There is no legal requirement for non-therapeutic circumcision to be undertaken by a registered health professional.

Although circumcision is not a service which is provided free of charge, some doctors and hospitals have been willing to provide circumcision without charge rather than risk the procedure being carried out in unhygienic conditions.

Doctors are under no obligation to comply with a request to circumcise a child. Where the procedure is a matter of patient or parental choice, there is no ethical obligation to refer on. The family is of course free to see another doctor and some doctors may wish to suggest an alternative practitioner.

Book Review

Circumcision: An Ethnomedical Study – by A. Thomas

This is a monumental production of 250 A4pp, extensively illustrated in black and white with an interesting full colour cover. The latter, I learned from the publishers, is the contribution of a professional print designer who experienced having to be circumcised in childhood.

Considering that the subject of this book is what many consider to be a trivial operation, one could be forgiven for assuming such a tome would be dedicated to heart by-pass surgery. Proportionately it might be assumed that a mere pamphlet would cover something as simple as circumcision.

But is it that simple? The title of the publication is only one word: 'Circumcision' writ large, but the subtitle: 'An ethnomedical study' defines its object. Thus, it is an academic work which is destined for libraries, public and private, where it will serve as a resource for overlapping disciplines. Historians, anthropologists, geographers, students of culture, sexology and medicine, will all find an abundance of relevant information. Indeed, parents too, if they are seeking to be informed before making the decision on whether or not to circumcise their son. As the author reminds us, this is the world's oldest and most frequently performed operation. It has arisen independently in differing cultures across the world. It is variously justified in religious ritual, rites of passage, medical expediency or prophylactic, and easier penile hygiene. It captures personal ambitions for body image and improved sexual performance. It flourishes in societies as diverse as Australian Aboriginal tribes and the United States of America.

Clearly, the task of organising the mountain of data which the author has gathered, is a tricky one. While focusing on one area, it is easy to stray into another. A discourse on methods may need to touch simultaneously on anatomy and history, instruments and results. Inevitably this gives rise to some duplication, but the book is none the worse for that if it is to be used as a dip-in reference.

The reader is helped by a comprehensive table of contents which is set out in three parts, the whole occupying some five pages of detailed topics plus a list of illustrations.

In Part I we are introduced to the subject with the anatomy, and variations of penises as they arrive delivered from the factory and as they grow into the adult model. It runs the gamut of naturally arising abnormalities and acquired penile problems. Clearly, nature deals most unfairly with many unfortunate males in this department. There is ample evidence of a lack of quality control at the manufacturing stage hence the need for in-service modifications – often soon after delivery and long before serious use. In some situations, it describes remedies that stop short of circumcision. Then, launching into the subject proper, there is a summary of the extent to which circumcision is performed worldwide, and the varied means by which it is accomplished. This résumé goes into the history and detail of instruments and techniques and ends the section with a discussion on the outcome that each provides.

Part II expands on the global dimension of the procedure and the variations evolved in religious and tribal ritual. This section both in text and pictures, is not for the squeamish. (Nor, for that matter, are some of the Part I photos of defects.) Many who peruse these pages will comfort themselves on their good fortune in being born into a modern society, ie, one where there is no requirement to undergo an un-anaesthetised public circumcision as a demonstration of your maturity. At the end, the scope of the book expands to cover penis piercing and jewellery, decoration, infibulation, and some of the wilder extremes of penile modification. And, just in case you are not happy with your circumcision, there is an explanation of 'un-circumcision' or 'foreskin restoration'. It takes all sorts...

Part III covers individuals' experience of circumcision and the practicalities of the decision to do it. It borrows extensively from Forum magazine which, a couple of decades ago, did a landmark survey of readers who had experienced this procedure later in life, or arranged it for their sons. This enquiry drew and tabulated some fascinating results. Forum has also long been a platform where strong and opposing views on circumcision have been exchanged. In the course of this, many correspondents have disclosed their before and after experiences in adulthood. Some of these letters have been lifted and augmented by anecdotes from other sources tapped by the author. A few are extremely long and detailed and do enter obsessive fetish territory.

I would have preferred to see more input from women – there are only a couple of short pieces. More than that, it would be good to have views and experiences from mothers of baby boys. They are in the objective situation of being the recipients of penises, circumcised or otherwise, in the creative process. Postpartum, as principal child carer, it is often the mother who makes, or largely influences, the decision to circumcise a boy. She too is the one who usually has to arrange the procedure and deal with his healing and aftercare. Perhaps some future edition will explore this avenue?

Not all boys are circumcised in infancy: many have to be cut at different ages all through to puberty. The book has a valuable assessment of the considerations which apply to doing it during the tender stages of childhood.

At the outset the author declares himself to be pro-circumcision. However, he makes a good 'devil's advocate' and the disadvantages and hazards of circumcision are not excluded or glossed over. The book concludes with a valuable and comprehensive set of five Appendices covering a glossary, bibliography, and resources for instruments and devices. It publishes a useful list of URLs to internet sites where the subject has been increasingly covered and debated in recent years.

At £25 this is priced as a professional textbook – modest in consideration of its production costs. An expensive investment for parents perhaps? There are in any case many other short tracts written to advise them one way or the other on this subject, each claiming they contain 'all the facts'. Nevertheless, it is arguable that the price of this more extensive work could be justified for a parent who is about to decide the fate of his or her young son's foreskin. Circumcision is for life and for most who are cut as babies, it's a long life to live with it. This implies an obligation to do informed research before ordering an irreversible operation on another person's behalf. It is interesting that enquiries have revealed that most parents circumcise their boys for reasons of personal preference and a gut instinct that 'it is better for them'. This being so, they may feel the expenditure is worthwhile if only to confirm their instincts are correct.

Turkish Circumcision

I have just started a relationship with one of your members. By accident I picked up his file with all of your newsletters, and discovered that we have another common interest – male circumcision.

I am Swedish and 28 years old. Sadly circumcision is not common in Sweden, but I had liked 'roundheads' as you say, when I saw them in porno films. My sister, Lisa, married a Turkish boy 10 years ago so the first time I experienced a 'roundhead' was during a visit to her in Istanbul. During 10 years, I have had four affairs with Turkish boys – all circumcised.

I was fascinated by their smooth penises. Their erections were very tight, their roundheads had big rims and the scar from the cutting was as much as 5 cm from the rim and round like a circle. When I talked with them, I was interested to learn that boys in Turkey are circumcised or 'cut', as they call it, somewhere between 7 and 12 years old. Some can be older and when he has it done, he is a real 'man'.

During holidays in Turkey, I learned about circumcision parties and circumcision palaces and saw many boys in the white circumcision clothes. But it was only in the summer of 2002 that I went to a circumcision party myself.

Lisa and Tomas her husband were arranging for their two boys to be done. I am like 'Godmother' to the older boy also called Tom. My sister invited me along and told me that they are big celebrations and good fun as she had been to loads before.

I arrived in Istanbul a few days before the party which was on a Saturday. I know they have a circumcision season in Turkey which lasts for the summer months and they say "Circumcision on Saturday, school on Monday". But at this time, it was the school holidays. Tom, 11, and Filip, 8, were looking forward to the big day because they get loads of money and presents at their circumcision. On Saturday morning, my sister put the boys in the bath. I was wanting to see 'before and after' so I was in the bathroom when my sister was washing them thoroughly even inside the foreskin before they got dressed in their white suits.

We arrived at the party at midday and took photographs of the boys outside which said "Sunnet Saraya" which to translate means "Circumcision Palace". We were taken to our table and were joined by other guests from Tomas' family, mother, father, sisters and others. There must have been hundreds of others as Mr Oskan, who is famous for his circumcisions in Istanbul, was going to do 21 other boys as well that day. I thought that was quite a lot but my brother-in-law's sister told me that Mr Oskan has a record for 'cutting' over 600 boys in one day. Kilos of foreskins!! Anyhow this day the youngest boy was 5. The oldest, Ali, a neighbour of my sister from an African Embassy, was about 16 years old – Ouch!!

It was an atmosphere of fun with everyone dancing and eating beautiful food. The first group of boys were called to a small row of chairs with their close relatives for the anaesthetic injections and then returned to the dancing while their 'willies' went dead. After another five minutes, they went to another chair to be circumcised.

My nephews were in the second group and my sister asked me to go with my 'godson' while she looked after Filip who was nervous. Tom was the oldest in the group – all the other boys were 7 or 8 years old – and he was called up first and sat down. The others followed. Mr Oskan undid his trousers and took them and his briefs down a little. His son then took his penis. He pushed back his foreskin and the needle was pushed longwise into the skin like any injection except this was into a sensitive part. When Mr Oskan junior let his skin go, it went back over his roundhead. Mr Oskan squeezed his penis to spread the anaesthetic around. Then it was off for a dance with time for the injection to work. Some of the other boys squealed at the injection and Filip was very upset and was held by Lisa and Mr Oskan senior.

Ten minutes later, I took Tom to the circumcision chair. A round multi-coloured seat for six boys which could spin around. A Muslim leader and some traditional clowns, who used to drown the screams of the boys before they used injections, sang. Mr Oskan again pulled Tom's pants down, took Tom's little foreskin between the thumb and first finger of his left hand and pulled it hard. When he was happy with the stretching, his son handed Mr Oskan a scissor clamp to hold the skin in front of his roundhead. When this was in place, Mr Oskan then took from his son a laser knife (I was told that it was this). Once again pulling hard on the foreskin with the left hand, he cut through the foreskin with the knife in his other hand. I was quite nervous but Tom watched it all with a smile. But we were both grinning when he removed the metal clamp and the skin that was left quickly slipped back over the penis head and down the penis shaft. I saw no blood at all. Mr Oskan took back the 'redundant skin' which his son had put in a muslin pad and popped it together with the new shaped willy back into his pants and did them up.

I went back to the table with Tom who received a round of applause. But I was even more interested and more happy to watch the operation when the last group, which included Ali the African boy, went to the chair. I went with our neighbour to see her son being cut. It was a good lesson to watch it as his foreskin was much stronger because he was older and it took longer to cut through it. After the metal clip was taken off, the little skin left jumped back very fast down his penis stem. A dark roundhead popped out which it was funny to see as it was different to the black skin 5 cm down the stem. The cut ring was very clear to see. It was a good job from Mr Oskan and Ali's mother was clapping her hands.

In an hour we went home as they all started to get a little pain. Lisa was given tablets to give the boys but Tomas her husband says "No". He told me when he had 'sunnet' when he was twelve years old, they did not have injections. The men held him on a table while the circumciser cut him with a sharp knife. There was a lot of pain and blood. From it, he remembers 'becoming a man' even now, and Tom and Filip must remember it too. The boys did not put on their clothes for two days as Lisa said the roundheads get sore in the beginning. My nephews did go to sleep but woke up in the night because of the pain. Lisa took some cold cream and we wiped it on the very red circumcision rings. On Sunday the pain was a little better. The rings were red and the penis stems were black and blue. Ali and his mother came with gifts on Monday. He was OK but he walked carefully. At the weekend when I went back to Sweden, my nephews were really well and happy little 'roundheads'.

I am now even more a circumcisionist (if that is an English word). I love the roundheads! And after the summer I want to learn more about other countries and the different ways it is done there. Another Swedish girlfriend told me she has read that in Indonesia they do 'sunatan' (circumcision) for 10 and 11 year olds and some people of poor parents who do not have money to buy the circumcision for their boys ask sponsors to pay for it. Even they have 'mass circumcisions' paid for by lots of sponsors, who buy the presents for the children too. Chris and I and other members from Acorn who prefer roundheads could sponsor a boy or some boys in Indonesia in return for some video film of the circumcision and the whole occasion. Can I have suggestions for this? And I also want to learn what is done in other places mainly Algeria, Morocco, Tunis, Egypt, Muslim Soviet States, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Yemen, and different parts of black Africa. All do it different ways and boys for circumcision can be any age from 6 years to older than 20 years.

Can you help out?

Miss L.L. - Cardiff

Appearances Are Deceptive

The use of the term 'penile transvestite' (Editor's column, Issue 2/2003) certainly added a hint of naughtiness to the retractor who has trained his foreskin to stay back, maintaining an exposed glans. Through choice he can display the ultimate nudity of an erection even when flaccid. What advantage he enjoys over a surgically circumcised man is that he retains all the erogenous tissue of his penis and the particularly sensitive frenum.

There is a more appropriately named penile transvestite in the restorer who has 'dressed' a glans which had been bared by circumcision. He is a reluctant Roundhead who has restored glans cover through a programme of dedicated skin stretching, so can pass for a Cavalier when flaccid. Though having lost about half of his penile skin and possibly his frenum, his glans sensitivity becomes enhanced with the surface changing to being less rough, membranous, moist and smooth.

In both cases appearances can be deceptive in the flaccid condition. With sufficient training the Cavalier becomes Roundhead and the Roundhead a Cavalier. It is the degree of persistence which separates the two transformations as I can testify. Whereas retraction to permanent glans exposure can be readily achieved, in many cases restoration can take 4-6 years, particularly if the penis had been radically circumcised.

These cosmetic changes, far from being a feature of modern times, have been popular for nearly a thousand years, and are even practised on a nation-wide basis today. Retraction is undertaken by Japanese men in the following manner. After the foreskin is shoved back behind the glans, it is tied with a string until it remains in place permanently. 'Kawakamuri', the Japanese for 'skin covered', is a mark of exceedingly bad taste, and at the communal bath or medical examination, a Japanese would never present himself with a covered glans. He would quickly skin his glans so as not to offend against decency. Japanese art never shows the penis other than with the glans denuded.

Restoration, like circumcision, is steeped in antiquity. Aurelius Cornelius Celsus (53BC - 7AD) devised a method of uncircumcision in which the penile skin could be stripped, with the penile tissue bound to the glans. Even as late as World War II (1935 - 1945), Polish doctors used techniques based on the Celsus method, often without anaesthetic, to save circumcised males from execution at the hands of the Nazis. In the second century AD, Greek manners and their gymnastic games had reached Palestine. Because contestants performed naked, in public, young Israelites eager to participate were ashamed of their circumcised state, and indulged in epispasmus, the formation of an artificial foreskin.

Yes, with the penis cosmetically clothed or denuded, appearances are truly deceptive in the flaccid condition. Personal preference can overcome the dictates of parents, doctors or creeds. It is only in the erect condition that the deception becomes unmasked; there is no circumcision without cutting and every incision leaves a tell-tale scar, often revealing the technique used on careful inspection!! For any man dissatisfied with his penile status, this penile transvesticism can lead to him feeling happier with his body and more confident within himself; I strongly recommend it both as a cosmetic status change and as an achievement.

Baring All?

I read Ivan's article on 'retractors' (Best of Both Worlds) and T.S.'s similar one regarding 'apparently' circumcised naturists (Observations) in issue 2/2003 with interest. Is it really that common that male naturists like to look circumcised? I am not a naturist, though I do enjoy swimming in the nude (once you've got into the water without any trunks, you never want to wear them again!) and therefore I have limited evidence to examine. So once again I went to the Internet to see what was on offer that might throw some light onto this idea.

There are, of course, many websites devoted to naturism and it was some time before I found what I was looking for. Peter's Nudist Page website (www.addicks.fsnet.co.uk/nat/ppage.htm) was ideal. Though Peter and I share the same name, we are quite different in one major detail. The Internet Peter is attached (quite literally) to his foreskin and has no wish to get rid of it - whereas I am happily bereft of mine. Peter does though have a page devoted to circumcision, so even he feels it necessary to discuss this aspect which has such an obvious impact in the naturist world. It is when you move to the 15-page Visitors' gallery of naturist/nudist contacts around the world that I became quite startled at the results of my endeavours. The pictures are almost all of men – women seem very reluctant to include themselves in the gallery whilst men seem to enjoy showing the world what they've got. I fully expected the American, Canadian and Australian men to be circumcised and I wasn't let down – I don't think there was an uncut amongst them. It was when I examined the photos of British and European men that the possibility that, in the naturist world, the percentage of circumcised men does not seem to mirror the general male population, became apparent. All right, we all know that in Britain if you are over 50, then there is a very good chance you will be cut and this seemed to be largely (though not exclusively) the case. But on checking out the younger men and European naturists I was distinctly puzzled. Admittedly a number of the younger men were clearly uncut as I expected, but that so many of them were apparently cut made me get a little suspicious. Whilst we know that very few European men are cut, I found it hard to believe that so many French, German, Spanish, Italian members of the naturist fraternity appear to be circumcised.

I was left with the possibility that the world of naturism really does attract circumcised guys or that a significant number of them were imposters. Is it that when men are publicly nude they want to expose as much of their body as possible? Is a circumcised cock the ultimate in nakedness? T.S.'s suggestion of 'flattery by imitation' seems quite a well-authenticated idea. I could of course be completely wrong and that all these men are genuinely circumcised. This would then beg the question, does being cut lead to a greater desire to show to the world your status – a sort of "look at me, I'm one up on the rest of you" attitude?

In the past being circumcised was called 'the mark of a gentleman' and it is possible there is an element of this feeling of superiority creeping in. So do the 'retractors' unconsciously want to be thought of as the elite? Or is it something a little more base? A kind of "my knob is bare and I'm ready for action" signal? You could call it being 'nude and rude'! I really don't know the answer, but I'd be interested to hear if others have also found this to be as evident as I have.

Cautionary Tale

The 3rd May issue of the British Medical Journal (BMJ 2003;326:992) contains a cautionary tale from the consultant and staff in the department of urology at Leicester General Hospital.

A 22 year old man who wished to have a circumcision decided to undertake the operation himself. He bought a self circumcision kit from a Korean company via the Internet. The device worked by constricting the blood supply to the foreskin and the instructions stated that it was to be left in place for ten days. In fact, it fell off after six days and the man then needed to go to casualty with bleeding from the distal foreskin. He subsequently underwent elective circumcision.

Circumcision Without Pain

The Journal of Advanced Neo-natal Care has recently published a pictorial and video guide to circumcision without pain. Circumcision is very commonly performed in the United States in the neo-natal period – the first few days of a baby's life. It has frequently been argued that the baby's capacity to experience pain is not fully developed at this stage and that circumcision without anaesthesia is therefore justified. The article refutes this claim. Pain during circumcision results in physiologic instability, affecting heart and respiratory rates. Infants who experience painful circumcisions exhibit behavioural changes, including increased crying and irritability and poorer feeding and responsiveness to their mothers in the post-operative period. They also have a stronger response to pain during subsequent routine vaccination. Yet a survey examining self-reported clinical practices surrounding the use of circumcision anaesthesia showed that 29% of paediatricians, 44% of family practice physicians and 75% of obstetricians performed circumcision without anaesthetics. The guide sets out strategies whereby pain and discomfort caused by circumcision can be drastically reduced or eliminated.

The guide first considers injections. Two penile nerve blocks are discussed – the dorsal penile nerve block (DPNB) and the subcutaneous ring block (SQRB). Both are safe, effective and without significant complications. On balance, the SQRB is said to provide more complete anaesthesia during all phases of circumcision compared with DPNB and may be technically easier to administer. The efficacy of both these nerve blocks depends upon a clear understanding of the anatomy of the penis, and the web enabled guide provides both diagrams and video clips to demonstrate proper technique.

Some doctors argue that the injection may be more painful than the circumcision itself. The local infiltration of lidocaine can cause some discomfort but this can be reduced by using a fine gauge needle and administering the solution very slowly. Some doctors also consider the time associated with administering the penile nerve blocks a disincentive. However, the injection itself takes less than 60 seconds, and the 3-5 minutes waiting for the block to take effect can be used by the circumciser to don sterile gloves and surgically prepare and drape the area.

The guide also considers topical anaesthetics such as EMLA, a lidocaine-prilocaine cream. It certainly diminishes the pain of circumcision, although not as effectively as the penile block. It also has to be applied to the skin of the penis with an occlusive dressing for 60 to 90 minutes before the operation. Analgesic options administered by mouth are considered ineffective for pain control during the procedure, although they may be helpful in pain relief following the procedure.

Sweet tasting oral solutions, such as sucrose, can provide consistent analgesia, especially used in conjunction with a pacifier. Although not as effective as a penile nerve block, they do provide significant pain relief to infants undergoing circumcision.

Circumcision boards, used to immobilise infants for circumcision, appear to cause babies distress. This may be because the natural state of flexion is forced into an unnatural state of immobilised extension. Simple padding of the restraining board and swaddling of the upper part of the body adds to the infant's comfort. Two other points:

- There is little evidence that music or other sound relieves pain.
- The practice of withholding food before circumcision adds to the infant's discomfort.

The guide also considers the most popular instruments used to circumcise – the Gomco clamp, the Plastibell and the Mogen clamp. The article does not comment on the efficacy or the cosmetic outcome of each instrument. However, research has shown that the Gomco and Plastibell methods take almost twice as long as with the Mogen clamp. Since infants experienced similar pain per unit time, whatever the technique, from the point of view of minimising pain, the Mogen clamp is the preferred method. The fact that the Mogen clamp is quick to use means that circumcisers adopting this method were 22% less likely to use anaesthesia than those using other devices. But although surgical speed may minimise the duration of pain, it does not diminish the intensity of the pain. A randomised controlled trial comparing various forms of anaesthesia in infant circumcision found that every newborn in the placebo group (i.e. no anaesthesia) exhibited extreme distress during and following circumcision.

Summing up, the guide recommends a multi-modal approach to pain prevention. It suggests that the infant is premedicated with acetaminophen by mouth about 30 minutes before the procedure; is placed on a padded circumcision chair with legs restrained in a comfortable, semi-flexed position; is given a pacifier with sucrose; is given an SQRB injection slowly; is circumcised with a Mogen clamp; and is given an additional post operative oral dose of acetaminophen. Such an approach is likely to ensure that the baby is circumcised in a relatively stress free, pain free manner.

Acorn Meeting Cancelled

Sadly, it has been necessary to cancel the next Acorn get-together which had been scheduled for early November. Unfortunately, the organisers have unexpectedly found themselves unable to attend at that time. We apologise to those of you who had already pencilled the date into your diaries and were looking forward to the event.

To alleviate disappointment, we are considering holding a meeting in the first two or three months of 2004, probably in Leicester at a weekend. If you might be interested in attending a meeting then, it would be helpful if you could send an email to Ivan or drop him a note at the Acorn mailbox. This will help us gauge the support for a meeting at that time.

My Lifelong Interest In Circumcision

When I was at school in the 1940/50's about 50 per cent of the boys were circumcised. I first discovered the difference between my then uncut cock and the circumcised ones. They always fascinated me and I wished and wished I was like them. My foreskin was always loose and I used to keep it back as much as possible to make out I too was circumcised. I once asked my mother why I had not been circumcised as it was very fashionable when I was born. She told me it had been considered but our family doctor at that time didn't believe in it, foolish man. I first started playing with other boys' dicks in junior school and it was only the cut ones I was interested in. Later I went to a private school and the headmaster was a Church of England priest. However despite this there were many Jewish boys there so I had a field day with them and also many of the others, being 'upper class' were all circumcised. Then I went to a secondary-modern school and again many were cut. I finally went to an Art school which was mixed so there was no real opportunity to play with the other boys' dicks. I went into the RAF for my National Service (actually did 3 years) and many of the guys there were circumcised. Of course you had to be very careful but I managed to get my hands on some of the circumcised ones.

Through my 20's and 30's I still was very keen on circumcision and wished I had been done at birth. I saw an article in a Naturist magazine about circumcised vs. uncircumcised and how many men wanted to be circumcised but their doctors would not do it. However they said that if you wrote to them, they would give you the address of a sympathetic doctor who would perform the operation. That was how I came to be laying on the table in Dr Newill's office near to Harley Street one lunch time. He gave me a local anaesthetic, injected into the base of my dick, and that was the only real pain. We were speaking the whole time he was performing the operation and he told me he was a great believer in circumcision. He had been circumcised whilst serving overseas as a doctor in the army. When I had my cut I had no idea about the various styles such as tight/high, low/loose etc. Dr Newill did say however that he would remove as much foreskin as possible as he didn't want me to have to come back for a re-circ.

Since then I have never looked back and consider it one of the best things that ever happened to me. Everything and I mean everything is so much better: sex, appearance, cleanliness, no smegma etc. Before I was circumcised I used to wash my dick several times a day but it still smelt unpleasant.

All I can say to anybody if you have any doubts about being circumcised, don't. Go and get it done – you won't regret it.

I would appreciate any comments/questions.

A Bargain Recut

Given the high costs of surgery that are quoted in Acorn, members may be interested in my recent pleasant experience.

I was cut at sixteen years of age, on my own insistence, disliking the uncut and to my mind unhygienic and anaesthetic state, but that is another story. I had rather a loose cut and an extensive frenulum, left intact. In recent years, this frenulum became tight to the point that sex was uncomfortable and caused bunching of the skin.

I saw my GP who referred me to a local hospital to see a urologist. The appointment was made and I was seen in about three months. "Ten minute job", I was told, but the waiting list was nearer to ten years! I made a private appointment with the same surgeon and I asked him to revise my circumcision as well as do the frenoplasty. I suggested how much skin I wanted removed. He agreed with my request and indicated that he could tidy up the existing scar tissue. We discussed costs and I saw that the charge for accommodation and nursing alone would be over £500, with surgeon's fees as well. When I said that I was not in private health care and that I would prefer local anaesthetic and not to stay in hospital, an appointment was made for about two weeks hence in the Day Care Unit. On the day I was shown into a small treatment room and the op was done in about half an hour. A very jolly Nursing Sister assisted the surgeon and I was soon on my way home.

The result is cosmetically much better than before and the frenum has been reduced to a thin, minimal structure. I paid for my private consultation at the time, £70. Some weeks later, the dreaded invoice for the operation dropped through the letterbox. The charge? £60! I thought there had been a mistake and checked with the hospital; no, the charge was correct. I paid by return of post. Total cost was therefore £130. All this in a Teaching Hospital with all its facilities, should they have been needed. It pays to make enquiries and to make your needs clear when seeking medical care, just as in any transaction.

First Cut Is The Deepest

In his article 'Mostly a complete indifference' (issue 3/2003), William says that his observations of the number of circumcised cocks he has seen "compares favourably with the medically estimated number of British men who have encountered Madame Guillotine". I was always under the impression that the guillotine cut a man's head off, it didn't just remove his balaclava!

Childhood Circumcision

In issue 2/2002, C.A. – North Kent states that when he was prepubescent and waiting in hospital to have his tonsils removed, a doctor carried out a prolonged masturbation examination on him, pulling his foreskin tightly back and as far forward as possible. He assumed that the doctor was considering circumcising him. Sadly this was not done.

I had not heard of a ‘masturbation examination’ before. Is this a usual test for the possibility of circumcising a boy? Have any other members ever come across this type of examination previously, or when prepubescent being subject to such an examination? Did it ever result in a circumcision being done?

C.A. also says that circumcisions done pre-puberty are more natural looking than an adult circumcision. I agree. A boy’s penis, when he is circumcised pre or early teens is generally smoother on his shaft and his scar is not so pronounced as in an adult circumcisee. If he is radically cut and his frenulum completely excised, this can result in his circumcised penis jutting out slightly because of the tension in the shaft skin instead of drooping when flaccid. A number of members in the past have expressed a preference for this result.

Family Ways

Neville’s article on celebrity circumcision (Issue 2/2003) must have rekindled much interest, but the names were quoted, as they invariably are, out of family context. Many famous families adhere most zealously to circumcision, passing the feature from generation to generation. These notable families include that of President Carter, Kirk Douglas, Clint Eastwood, Errol Flynn, and Ernest Hemmingway, all of whose sons were circumcised, matching their fathers. Then there are the shorn sibling groups like the Osmonds, Jacksons and Bee Gees!

What really fascinated me from published celebrity material was not the matching of fathers and sons, which is expected in American and Jewish families, but differences in penile status! Intact fathers with circumcised sons include Max Baer, Sean Connery, Lamas Fernando, Dean Martin, Ronald Reagan and John Wayne. There is a most famous opposite case – Vernon Presley, the father of Elvis was circumcised whilst his pelvis gyrating son remained intact.

A most curious category is the “mix ‘n’ match” situation which often registers a strong female influence as in Bing Crosby’s family. The intact old groaner had four intact sons by his first marriage (Dennis, Gary, Lindsay and Phil) and two circumcised sons by his second (Harry and Nathaniel).

Medical necessity often intervenes to produce dissimilarities between brothers but the above would be almost exclusively elective. A relative who is happily circumcised with four intact brothers once told me, much to my astonishment: “It’s no different from cutting hair or nails!”

Editorial

The hot, extended, summer has been wonderful, but not, unfortunately, conducive to long hours at the keyboard. So there has been a wider gap between issues 4 and 5 than I had planned. My apologies. You will receive another issue before the end of the year.

Not that I am the only one who has been idle. My thanks to all the contributors in this issue – but there are too few of you. Consequently, there is within too much of me, too little of everyone else. Please, now that autumn is upon us, take up that pen and write!

One innovation this time is the introduction of illustrations. I am grateful to Vernon, the production editor, for making this possible. Of course, the illustrations do take up space but on the principle that “a picture paints a thousand words”, I hope that you will feel that less is more.

Finally, there is a new date for the postponed Acorn meeting – see page 7. Please note it in your diaries now.

Machine Cut

Later this century, robots will begin to replace human surgeons. This is the prediction by Susan Greenfield in her book Tomorrow's people: How 21st Century Technology is changing the way we think and feel. The surgeon Henry Marsh is quoted as having likened current neuro-surgical practice to a large JCB digger attempting to pick up a safety pin. An error of mere fractions of a millimetre can make all the difference to how a patient lives the rest of his life. Inevitably, mechanised approaches to surgery will be developed; more precise and reliable than current fallible humans.

We can speculate what this might mean for circumcision. Now, men agonise as to the finish they want – high and tight, or low and loose? How much inner foreskin should be left? Where should the circumcisional scar be placed? All too often, surgeons choose to ignore their patients' wishes and adopt the one-size-fits-all approach to circumcision. The patient is then dissatisfied with the end result, often sufficiently to seek revision, when a second surgeon becomes free to disregard what the patient wants!

Picture instead the mechanised future. There will be a whole series of high specification surgical machines which will carry out surgery to undreamt of precision whether to excise a brain tumour (every diseased cell, not one healthy cell removed), to replace furred up arteries or transplant a genetically grown new organ. The circumcision machine will no doubt be cylindrical in format. The flaccid penis will be placed within and the machine will measure with accuracy to whatever decimal place is specified, the dimensions of the penis, including its length and girth, the size and shape of the glans, the length of the inner and outer foreskin, the extent and thickness of the frenulum. The machine will induce an erection so that the same measurements can be taken in the tumescent state. The rest will then be mere programming, with data keyed in by an operator from a sheet completed by the patient (or his parent). The patient (or parent) will have specified matters such as: the amount of inner foreskin to be left, the amount of surplus skin to be left (anything from nil to several centimetres), how defined the scar should be, whether the frenulum should be removed. Partial circumcision will be an option, with the possibility of leaving the glans anything from half to fully covered, with just the overhanging rosette cut away. For those unwilling to go to the trouble of completing the form, the machine will have a default setting whereby, in the absence of instructions to the contrary, the machine will perform a circumcision as high and tight as possible with frenulum totally excised and a prominent circumcisional scar.

Once the operator has fed in and checked the data, the patient will himself press the switch to set the machine in motion. The automated process will then begin. The machine will inject local anaesthetic (will the operation without anaesthetic be an option?), will test whether the penis has been numbed, will measure precisely where cuts are to be made, will operate by laser, cauterising arteries and veins as these are cut. The machine will also undertake an initial desensitising of the glans so that the newly and permanently exposed glans will not be over-sensitive following circumcision.

Finally, when the required amount of foreskin has been ablated, the two skin edges will be aligned and finely sutured, and a dressing will be applied. From the machine will emerge the penis, cut in absolute conformity to the specification. Because there will have been minimal handling of the penis, trauma and bruising will also be minimal and healing will therefore be very rapid.

Of course, excellent though this machine will be, it will itself in due course become obsolete. Further into the future, when genetic coding is perfectly understood, babies will be produced in accordance with parental specification. Babies will be specified to the last detail and, for baby boys, no doubt there will be a whole section on the penis where parents will determine how long and thick it should be, the size and shape of the glans, and, of course, whether or not there should be a foreskin. But can one really believe that in those far off elysian days, any father will really choose to burden his son with an unnecessary piece of skin? Maybe the future, as far as the penis is concerned, is long, thick ... and circumcised.

Better Late Than Never

Six years ago in my late forties I was circumcised for the first time. In part the decision to go ahead, at what some may think rather a late stage, was fuelled by the need to pluck up courage in the knowledge that once done, there would be no going back. And having thoroughly enjoyed masturbation since puberty, there was a fear that a great deal of pleasure might be lessened.

I suppose my interest in circumcision started at boarding school in the early sixties. Seeing other boys naked in the showers, one was able to see that perhaps 15 per cent were circumcised. I later read that circumcision in England was then much more common in the upper classes – no doubt a hangover from the passion for circumcision in Victorian times to stop boys playing with themselves. So in a way I felt left out and not part of a certain club. As well as this feeling, I thought the cocks of the boys who had been circumcised looked neater and tidier. In the course of the usual mutual masturbation that went on in boarding schools in those days, I found that it was usually the uncircumcised boys, including myself, who were involved rather than the circumcised ones. On the rare occasion that I handled the erect cock of a friend who had been circumcised, I found the tightness of the skin strange and when he talked of the need for soap in the bath to have a wank, it was a whole new insight. These images and feelings have stayed with me.

On a practical note, I found that as I got older and the skin started to get less elastic, my foreskin seemed to get longer and become more and more in the way. I found that during foreplay when wearing a condom, the foreskin slipped back over the glans and then could not be retracted again due to the grip of the condom. It spoilt the normal sensations from the glans and led to loss of erection.

After discussing the matter with my wife, who thought perhaps circumcision might put a stop to my wanking and was in favour of me going ahead and having the operation, I made a definite decision.

I advise anybody contemplating the operation to shop around, as prices vary enormously. Six years ago I found that clinics outside London tended to be cheaper and I would recommend clinics specialising in sexual/gender problems rather than cosmetic surgery.

Anyway, I made an appointment at a clinic in Leeds (which no longer offers the operation) and then had to wait an endlessly long three weeks. Finally the big day came. I arrived at the clinic and was shown into a comfortable sitting room. The surgeon came in and asked me a few questions such as why I wanted the operation plus some questions about my general health. Having read the letters from your other correspondents, I asked him to take off as much foreskin as possible because I wanted the remaining skin to be really nice and tight. He said that he always did a full circumcision, which would leave the glans fully exposed. I signed the necessary forms and, five minutes later, was lying stripped below the waist on the couch in the operating room. A very pleasant female nurse assisted and talked to me all through the operation.

I tried to watch the proceedings but was told to lie down fully and could therefore see very little. The first step was a large injection of anaesthetic into the base of my penis, followed by four or five smaller ones just into the foreskin covering the corona of my glans. Then the operation proper commenced; the surgeon and the nurse each took a pair of forceps and, gripping the tip of my foreskin on each side of my penis, pulled it upwards as far as possible, I think it must have then been cut across just above my glans; unfortunately I couldn't see. The foreskin was cut away leaving about 15 millimetres of inner skin attached at the sulcus.

Like some dentists, the surgeon had wasted no time and the anaesthetic was still taking effect somewhat unevenly, so I actually just felt the cutting away of the last part of the foreskin. Up to this point the whole procedure had taken perhaps five minutes. He then had to stop the flow of blood from the cut vessels in the skin, which he did by cauterising each one in turn. He completed the job by stitching the edges of the remaining skin together. Finally, a small dressing was applied and in less than an hour it was all over. Afterwards as I sat having a cup of tea, the surgeon came and had a little chat with me and I asked him if he had removed the frenulum. He said he hadn't as it was not a usual part of his procedure. While I was slightly disappointed, I did not really know at that stage if I had wanted it removed or not.

The healing process was remarkably quick, although one has to be careful not to knock the stitched join on the first evening while the anaesthetic is still in effect. The skin from the sulcus to the stitches swelled up alarmingly for the first two days but then subsided. There is not much pain, more of a tenderness; it is not as bad as a vasectomy.

After eight days, I felt able to let myself have my first erection with a circumcised cock. The feeling was everything I had hoped it would be. The whole skin was very tight and my cock had a completely different feel to it. I let the erection subside, not wanting to do any damage before the join was fully healed. Over the next few days, I had further erections and found I could not wank in the way I done all my adult life. The stitches were self-dissolving and came out after about two weeks.

I was delighted with the result of the operation and wished that I had had it done 15 years ago, at the same time as my vasectomy. I recommend it to all men as a new start to their sex lives and I am surprised that many more women do not absolutely insist on their men being circumcised.

Circumcision: A Covenant Of Grace

[Editor's note: It is often said that there are evangelical Christian sects which require male members to be circumcised, but I have been unable to trace any such sects. If any readers are aware of these, I would be pleased to hear. In the meantime, there follows an article from the internet promoting circumcision for Christians as a continuation of the original covenant of grace made with Abraham which, the author argues, should still be honoured.]

There is plenty of information available on why not to circumcise, but virtually nothing in the way of supportive or unbiased information based on Scripture. The following is the result of my own search for answers in the Scriptures. I hope it will be useful to you, or someone you know.

Circumcision Instituted By God

Circumcision for the people of God was instituted by God Himself, as a sign of His Covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17:10-14). Circumcision was a "seal" of the righteousness God had already credited to Abraham for his belief (Rom. 2:25-29) prior to circumcision. It was a sign of the Covenant God made with Abraham, and from the time of its inception, all male babies born of Abraham and his descendants have been circumcised on the eighth day (Gen. 17:12, 13; Lev. 12:3).

What Exactly Was The Covenant?

God said to Abraham:

Genesis 17:

4 You will be the father of many nations.

6 I will make you very fruitful; I will make nations of you, and kings will come from you.

7 I will establish my covenant as an everlasting covenant between me and you and your descendants after you for the generations to come, to be your God and the God of your descendants after you.

8 The whole land of Canaan, where you are now an alien, I will give as an everlasting possession to you and your descendants after you; and I will be their God.

13 Whether born in your household or bought with your money, they must be circumcised. My covenant in your flesh is to be an everlasting covenant.

14 Any uncircumcised male, who has not been circumcised in the flesh, will be cut off from his people; he has broken my covenant.

In a nutshell, God promised Abraham everlasting fruitfulness (children), everlasting citizenship in a then-foreign land, and Himself as their God. God's covenant in the flesh was to extend even to those bought with money.

Do Christians Need To Circumcise Their Sons?

The apostle Paul states several times in various ways that, "Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing. Keeping God's commands is what counts". (1 Corinthians 7:19) So the simple answer is no, Christians don't have to circumcise their sons, because we are "not under law, but under grace" (Romans 6:14). But many do. And there actually may be a very good Scriptural reason to do so.

Balancing Act: Law and Grace

First of all, consider that the Law of Moses was given because of sin – and no one becomes righteous by obeying the Law, we simply realize we are in sin because of the Law (Rom. 3:20).

Next, consider that the Covenant of circumcision was given to Abram in Genesis 17 – long before the Law was written. Way back in chapter 15 there was just Abram and God, having a conversation about the future. God promised him descendants as numerous as the stars, although Abram was then very old – and childless. Then, right there in chapter 15 it says, "Abram believed the LORD, and he credited it to him as righteousness." (Gen. 15:4-6) There is no law, no covenant, just Abram believing God and getting "righteousness by faith".

Some 400 years later, along comes Moses with the Law, which indeed says to circumcise all boys on the 8th day after birth. But this was not because people would become righteous by obeying ... rather it drew attention to the sin of those who were disobeying.

So Abram's "righteousness by faith" is well established long before the Law comes into the picture. Eventually Jesus Christ comes, not to abolish the Law, but to fulfil it (Matt. 5:17). And "righteousness by faith", such as that which Abram displayed, is now available to the Gentiles as well (Rom. 9:30-32).

The original covenant (sealed with circumcision) which God said would be "everlasting" was never rescinded, replaced or abolished. It was and is everlasting. Gentile Christians (i.e., all non-Jewish Christians) are children of Abraham because of our faith (Gal. 3:6-9). Are we not therefore still under the original covenant? Not under the Law of Moses, but under the Abrahamic Covenant, which God said would be everlasting and included circumcision as its seal.

Bringing Circumcision Into the New Covenant Thinking

Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, the same one who said circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, also said we are not under law, but under grace.

Because the law was temporary – grace is permanent. Abraham knew God's grace – not God's law – and he was under the covenant of circumcision. Why would it be any different for us today?

Consider that God's promises to Abraham were completely fulfilled in Christ. God promised Abraham everlasting fruitfulness: now we see that his own descendants are far too numerous to count, and Jesus is the everlasting "Seed" of Abraham. God promised everlasting citizenship in a then-foreign land: today all believers have eternal citizenship in Heaven, although we are not there yet. God promised Himself as their God: and certainly today He is the God of the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and anyone else who, like Abram, believes Him. Finally, God's covenant in the flesh was to extend even to those bought with money. Are we Gentiles not "bought with a price" to become "children of Abraham" by faith? (1 Corinthians 6:20, 7:23)

Conclusions??

Understanding that this is a lot to swallow, let me just make a few concluding comments about why we chose to circumcise our sons.

First of all, it was because of the Abrahamic Covenant as explained previously. Secondly, it was out of a belief that if God implemented such a procedure, it couldn't possibly be as harmful as our modern, God-less culture would have us believe. Thirdly, the proof of history: men have been circumcised for thousands of years without adverse effect, whereas there are certain known health risks (for both men and women) to uncircumcision. Fourthly, because I believe God in His infinite wisdom had reasons for choosing circumcision as the seal of the Covenant (when He could have chosen any number of other outward, physical signs) ... reasons which I neither pretend nor feel a need to understand. It's one of those areas where I can just say, "OK, Lord," and not worry about knowing exactly "why".

In Praise Of The Penis

I can never remember a time when I didn't enjoy my foreskin, but being shy, I found it difficult to share my passion with other men, and over the years continued to experiment in various ways to excite and indulge my fantasies. At one point, I seriously considered circumcision as a further step to pleasure, but decided at the last minute that retaining my foreskin gave me more options as a cavalier. I never, at any time felt medically or psychologically pressurised to become circumcised, nor did it concern me one way or another what any man wanted for himself. Out of the blue, some 20 years ago, came an introduction to the Uncut Society of America – a group formed with the sole purpose of bringing together foreskin enthusiasts and particularly those cut Americans who were keen to restore their foreskins in any way they could. For me the society provided many opportunities for sharing experiences and mutual feelings, and led to the formation of many friendships both in the States and here. I have been especially impressed by the fervour of so many men who are learning to 're-build' their foreskins having lost them, unwillingly, at some earlier stage of their lives. I have also gained some appreciation of the pleasures of the uncovered glans while enjoying friendships with those of my mates who are circumcised. For me it's always been the enjoyment of the penis, big or small, white or black, cut or uncut!

The Story Of Dave's Dick

Part One: Life with a Foreskin

Why are men so fascinated by their dicks? Of one thing I am certain: it has nothing to do with being gay or straight. It must be a very basic instinct which is present in all of us, yet is suppressed by so many men, which is a terrible shame. I have no such inhibitions, nurtured by formative years at a single-sex boarding school, developed by a love of sea and sunshine on naturist beaches, encouraged by the desire for circumcision and the wonderful freedom of expression found in the internet groups.

My interest in penises was awakened in the lavatory of my primary school when I noticed a boy beside me who had a willie that was different from mine: he had a little round knob on the end and mine had a flap of skin. So I asked him why his was different and he told me that I could make mine the same as his if I pulled the skin back, which I found almost unbelievable. As soon as I got home, I tried it for myself – and it worked!

It was at my boarding school that I first started experimenting with skinbacking, even before puberty, as I had always envied those who had been circumcised. My relatively large glans has always allowed me to do this. At first, I would try to maintain it for a week, and then for a month, but I always felt more natural with the glans covered, so my experiments came to an end.

After puberty things were different. As my penis grew, the foreskin became shorter and the glans bigger, to the point at which the foreskin would slip back spontaneously, resulting in erections at the most embarrassing times. I had frequent wet dreams, due, I suppose, to this wayward foreskin, which would pop back during the night giving an immediate erection and a quick ejaculation.

One of the great joys of having a foreskin is the huge thrill that always surges through the body as an erection develops. As the penis swells, the glans gradually pushes out past the foreskin and then, finally, it is totally exposed in all its glory. The incredible sensations that accompany this occurrence are something that a person circumcised at birth will never experience – and this is something that worries me about being cut: will I regret the loss of this? Despite its drawbacks(!), the foreskin is packed with nerve endings and undoubtedly adds greatly to the sensations experienced during any form of sexual play.

But the disadvantages of the foreskin were too great: the sudden unwanted flipping back, the unpleasant cheesy smell, the awakening each morning with an exposed glans, were too much to bear. Finally, at the age of 30, the foreskin remained back permanently. In many ways I looked and felt like a circumcised person, apart from the rather wrinkled appearance when flaccid. I conquered all the hang-ups about having an exposed glans, and went nude swimming and sunbathing without any feelings of embarrassment. It had become for me the natural state.

Despite this long period of time with an uncovered glans, I always felt more comfortable with the skin in the forward position. In this position I was totally unaware of my penis, whereas when the skin was back I was always aware of it, and it was not totally comfortable. So, periodically, I would bring it forward and try to leave it there, but it was so wayward, so ill-disciplined. Merely leaning against the kitchen cupboards to open a window, or the action of jumping up and down would cause it to slide back, probably with a subsequent erection. And then there was that smell, which would return within a day, despite twice daily washing. And in any case every morning I would wake up skinned back, so what was the point in trying to be like a proper uncircumcised person?

During all this time I never lost the desire to be cut. I was self-conscious about my uncut state. I felt a fraud, pretending to be cut when I wasn't, and even my two sons thought that I had been circumcised. One of the hardest moments of my life was when I was told that my eldest son, who was then three years old, should be circumcised, because of recurring phimosis. I found this hard to bear, and was sorely tempted to ask the surgeon to do me as well, but could not bring myself to say anything. I am certain that, if this happened now, I would have done so, especially as he knew me quite intimately, having examined my piles and sewn up a hernia!

Sex with my wife had gradually got less as our two boys grew into adults. Time was when their presence did not matter. There was one marvellous occasion when our five-year-old son came into our bedroom when we were enjoying ourselves, climbed on my back and said "Go on, horsey! Faster!" But, once the boys reached puberty, we found ourselves being embarrassed by their presence in the house, especially after ribald comments had been made about our nocturnal activities.

Three years ago, the elder son left home to go to university, but the younger was still with us, a situation that we found incredibly frustrating, especially as his bedroom shared a common wall with ours. Then, at last, he found a job and left home. We were on our own! It was like a second honeymoon. This was the final jolt that I needed. "I am going to investigate circumcision." I said to my wife one night while I was going well. I had had enough of that stupid foreskin flopping around. I suppose it was also my mature age that gave me the confidence I needed to take the first step of going to my GP.

Visiting one's own doctor and asking for circumcision is one of the most difficult things I have had to do. I dreaded it, but found that the only way was to decide which day I was going and to stick to it. I went, and got the reaction I expected, making me feel extremely embarrassed and wishing that I had never gone. But at least I was given an appointment with a consultant – and he did not even want to look at my dick!. However, the consultant did, of course, and then stood up and said: "Have you been circumcised already?" I was incredulous. I couldn't believe that a surgeon could not see that I was intact, with a complete, if short, foreskin. Of course, I got the expected refusal.

So I turned to the internet next. Here was a different story altogether: good information and fantastic support from the various groups. It was wonderful to be able to talk freely and to swap pictures, making comparisons and comments without any feelings of embarrassment or smut. It gave me increased confidence with the realisation that my dick was actually quite decent in size and shape, and was something of which I could justly be proud.

Making arrangements was not easy, as I soon discovered. The powerful anti-circ lobby coupled with the ban on advertising makes it difficult to locate surgeons who perform circumcisions. But persistence paid off, and soon I had what I wanted, the name and address of a surgeon, followed quickly by an actual appointment. I was on course for the cutting table, at last!

By now I had become used to my dick being examined at close quarters, and any feelings I used to have of embarrassment disappeared. Yet it seemed strange to be lying there while a guy pulled my dick around at all angles. I was not too sure what his judgement would be. Would he decide that my foreskin was too short already and that circumcision was pointless? Or would he simply say that I was too old? A great thrill surged through my body when the Doc said yes, he would do it, showing me where he would make the cut. The excitement made me start an erection, so the Doc said quickly, "You can put your clothes on now."

This was it: I was on a roller coaster that could not be stopped. The date was fixed and the price agreed, and I walked out of Harley Street with a spring in my step, and a lift in my dick. But this was not to last, because I found my spirits surging from peak to trough as each period of time passed and the op got nearer. Was I doing the right thing? What if the result was a reduced level of sensation? I have a perfectly good penis which looks circ'ed, so why mess with it? The last couple of weeks were the worst, especially after reading some anti-circ propaganda.

Then the day came when I had to send the cheque for the advance payment. I didn't hesitate. I wrote the cheque and put it in the post. I had crossed the Rubicon. The camera became even busier. Every moment when I was on my own, out came my dick and more shots were taken, from the top, the side, underneath, flaccid, hard, skinned, covered, scientific, erotic, even shooting. I was becoming totally besotted with my dick, which worried me slightly. Then I decided to trim my pubes. The Doc had said it was not essential, but I got the hint that it was advisable. I ended up by shaving everything – it felt so erotic!

The night of 3rd December was not good: sleep was very spasmodic. I was filled with a mixture of excitement about being circ'ed and the worry of doing the wrong thing. Strangely, the thought of the actual op itself did not cause me any anxiety at all.

The Cerne Abbas Giant

Whilst musing on penises, the perfect Acorn jolly came to me in a flash. There should be a pilgrimage to the 180ft tall Cerne Abbas Giant near Sherbourne in Dorset to wonder at his enormous erection which may or may not be displaying a circumcision. My guide book tells me that as late as the early 19th century, women believed that sleeping on the hillside could cure barrenness.

Anyone else interested in going?

Literary Extract

[From Part Two of Caesar's Women by Colleen McCullough]

[The action takes place in Syria during the time of the Roman occupation. One of the Romans, Publius Clodius, spreads disaffection about the Arabs by poisoning the mind of the Roman Governor against them. The Arabs decide to teach him a severe lesson. He is kidnapped.]

Bound, gagged and blindfolded, Publius Clodius was carried to a room without windows, a room without murals or decorations or differences from half a million such rooms in Antioch. Nor was Publius Clodius allowed to see beyond a glimpse as the cloth over his eyes was removed along with the gag, for a sack was slipped over his head and secured around his throat. Bare walls, brown hands, they were all he managed to take in before a less complete blindness descended; he could distinguish vague shapes moving through the rough weave of the bag, but nothing more.

His heart tripped faster than the heart of a bird; the sweat rolled off him; his breath came short and shallow and gasping. Never in all his life had Clodius been so terrified, so sure he was going to die. But at whose hands? What had he done?

The voice when it came spoke Greek with an accent he now recognised as Arabic; Clodius knew then that he would indeed die.

"Publius Clodius of the great Claudius Pulcher family," said the voice, "we would dearly love to kill you, but we realise that it is not possible. Unless, that is, after we free you, you seek vengeance for what will be done here tonight. If you do try to seek vengeance, we will understand that we have nothing to lose by killing you, and I swear by all our gods that we will kill you. Be wise, then, and quit Syria after we free you. Quit Syria, and never come back as long as you live."

"What-you-do?" Clodius managed to say, knowing that whatever it was could not be less than torture and flogging.

"Why, Publius Clodius," said the voice, unmistakably amused, "we are going to make you into one of us. We are going to turn you into an Arab."

Hands lifted the hem of his tunic (Clodius wore no toga in Antioch; it cramped his style too much) and removed the loincloth Romans wore when out and about the streets clad only in a tunic. He fought, not understanding, but many hands lifted him onto a flat hard surface, held his legs, his arms, his feet.

"Do not struggle, Publius Clodius," said the voice, still amused. "It isn't often our priest has something this large to work on, so the job will be easy. But if you move, he might cut off more than he intends to."

Hands again, pulling at his penis, stretching it out – what was happening? At first, Clodius thought of castration, wet himself and shit himself, all amid outright laughter from the other side of the bag depriving him of sight; after which he lay perfectly still and shrieked, screamed, babbled, begged, howled. Where was he, that they didn't need to gag him?

They didn't castrate him, though what they did was hideously painful, something to the tip of his penis.

"There!" said the voice. "What a good boy you are, Publius Clodius! One of us forever. You should heal very well if you don't dip your wick in anything noxious for a few days."

On went the loincloth over the shit, on went the tunic, and then Clodius knew no more, though afterwards he never knew whether his captors had knocked him out or he had fainted.

He woke up in his own house, in his own bed, with an aching head and something so sore between his legs that it was the pain that registered first, before he remembered what had happened. Pain forgotten, he leaped from the bed and, gasping with terror that perhaps nothing remained, he put his hands beneath his penis and cradled it to see what was there, how much was left. All of it, it seemed, except that something odd glistened purply between crusted streaks of blood. Something he usually saw only when he was erect. Even then he didn't really understand, for though he had heard of it, he knew no people except for Jews and Egyptians who were said to do it, and he knew no Jews or Egyptians. The realization dawned very slowly, but when it did Publius Clodius wept. The Arabs did it too, for they had made him into one of them. They had circumcised him, cut off his foreskin.

More Celebrity Circumcisions

Some thoughts on Celebrity circumcisions (Issue 1/2003). I'm pleased to note that Tim Henman is "one of us" – I now watch him with more interest on TV and don't fast forward. I have also wondered about the status of Seb Coe and Ian Botham.

From biographies – I did read that Paul McCartney and his brother were circumcised; and the late Lord Hailsham relates that although he'd been "done", he remembered at about 5 years old being taken on to someone's lap and cut again without any anaesthetic – what a revision!

The Royals – I always believed that they were cut and a British Jew informed me that an eminent mohel visited soon after Edward VIII's birth so that he would be "done" properly. A similar report on the current Prince of Wales (Charles) suggests his brothers Andrew and Edward were also circumcised. Yet I have read that Charles and Diana decided NOT to have William and Harry circumcised and accordingly were praised by the American BUFF – which I think is Brothers United For Foreskins. Finally, referring back to the original article, I must be stupid but I am not sure why the author has no doubts about Errol Flynn – is it that EF is circumcised and as an American that is likely anyway? The same article notes that Noel Coward asked Derek Jacobi whether he was circumcised – this strongly suggests to me that Noel Coward was himself circumcised and so had a preference for the "cut" ones.

Repairing David

Apparently there is a proposal to clean up Michelangelo's sculpture of David in Florence. Several weeks ago a photograph of it appeared in The Guardian, prompting the following letter to the Editor:

"Your photograph of Michelangelo's statue of David showed that it could not have been modelled on a Jewish David. Is it too late to repair this?"

Dr Ben Glaizner – Manchester

Although I did not send a letter in response, I thought that it might be an idea to write one on the following lines. It is intended to be light-hearted rather than serious so I hope that it does not cause offence.

"Dr Glaizner wonders if Michelangelo's sculpture could be repaired to make it Jewish. Whilst God may not mind anyone altering (mutilating?) His handiwork of the design and creation of the male form, I don't think Michelangelo would take too kindly to anyone altering (mutilating?) his handiwork. In any case, is the sculpture authentic in other parts of the body? Might David's hair have been straight rather than curly or might he even have been a skinhead or naturally bald? Did he not have a moustache or beard rather than being clean shaven?"

I think that we should be satisfied with a clean-up rather than risk having any complications that might arise from the operation!"

Another thought – I wonder if there was anyone who read Dr Glaizner's letter but did not understand what he was talking about!

Circumcision Russian Style

Come to Moscow and get circumcised. This was the offer made by the Russian President Vladimir Putin to a French reporter during a press conference at the Russia-EU summit last November. The invitation came in response to a question on Chechnya, a subject which is highly sensitive as far as Putin is concerned. Putin described Chechen separatist rebels as radical Islamists who believe that all non-Muslims deserve to die. Implying that the reporter must be a terrorist sympathiser, Putin told him: "If you are prepared to become a radical Islamist and undergo circumcision, I invite you to Moscow. We have specialists who can deal with this problem. I suggest that you have an operation so radical that nothing grows out of you again." The remarks were reported in one Russian newspaper under the headline: "Putin suggests Europe gets circumcised."

It is not known whether the reporter has yet accepted the invitation!

Circumcision Mishaps

Circumcision should be a straightforward procedure but unfortunately this is not always the case. Andrew Ryan, 20, a muscular dystrophy sufferer, went to Shotley Bridge Hospital in Consett, County Durham, for a routine circumcision operation on 25th July 1997. But he was given an overdose of local anaesthetic more than three times the recommended level which led to convulsions, respiratory failure and untimely death. The anaesthetist, Pravin Chaturbhai Patel, was charged with manslaughter.

Another surgeon, who left patients in agony after bungled circumcision operations, was struck off the medical register in August 2001. Peter Silverstone of Elmfield Park, Newcastle upon Tyne, failed to anaesthetise two baby boys properly before operating on them.

Their mothers had been coerced by their family doctor into consenting to the operations. The GP, Dr Michael Harbinson, presented the case as a fait accompli. He did not explain the alternative to circumcision. One of the babies had the operation because he had cysts. The mother of the other baby said that every time she took her baby to the surgery, Dr Harbinson would try to persuade her to have him circumcised. When the child caught a urinary infection at the age of six months she agreed.

Dr Harbinson paid the surgeon, who was practised in religious, not medical, circumcisions, out of his fund-holding budget. Silverstone performed the circumcisions in 1998 when the boys were six and seven months respectively. Both babies screamed in pain during the operations and one boy bled for hours after the operation until Silverstone visited the family home to give him stitches. Silverstone was found to have abused his professional position over the circumcisions and to have acted inappropriately and incompetently.

Creating Head Room

A number of readers wonder why a circumcised man has a flared and prominent glans penis. Perhaps the foreskin has a “corseting” effect on an already bulging bell-end? The surgical removal of an overly tight foreskin will then allow full expansion of the head of the penis. Moreover, the tight scar left by circumcision acts as a ligature in preventing the blood draining in full from the organ. Placing an elastic band around the glans would give a similar albeit temporary effect.

I recently met a middle aged American gentleman who had a very thick shaft to his penis; his glans was the size of a teacup. He kept his towel on for (most of) the duration of the sauna and said he felt extremely self-conscious about his protuberance. He said the entire glans and coronal ridge was clearly evident through his Speedo swimming trunks!

More About Examinations

Your New Zealand correspondent, D.B. (issue 4/2003), refers to a “prolonged masturbation examination” carried out on another Acorn member (no pun intended).

Presumably most normal (!!!) genital examinations consist of a visual inspection of the penis and contents of the scrotal sac. This will be followed by a manual examination of the genitalia: palpitation of the testes and, if the man is uncircumcised, retraction of his foreskin. The glans penis will be thoroughly inspected for smegma, lesions or warts. The urethra, or water pipe, may be opened to check for discharges. A great many doctors will “stretch” the organ to see its size when erect. It is possible that more sensitive patients (often teenagers) will develop an erection at this point. The exam will usually continue although some medics allow a period for said “stiffy” to go down. Some patients are mortified when they become visibly “aroused”. One surgeon, in my experience, expressed delight at erections as he maintained “everything was working – normal sexual response”. It can however be uncomfortable to examine a tumescent organ – in short the foreskin WOULD be retracted and stretched especially if circumcision was the order of the day!

More Deadly Than The Male

I wonder how many readers have been watching a Channel 4 programme on Urology featuring the inimitable Miss Evans? Seemingly, she (Christine Evans) is one of the few female urologists and genito-urinary surgeons in the medical business and is based in Wales. So far in the series of hour long programmes Miss E. has dealt with impotence by inserting an inflatable (!!!) implant. For the stronger viewer she has also effected a male-to-female gender reassignment by removal of the testes and a penile amputation! She has also operated on a bladder malignancy and all in her very own no-nonsense style.

Evans admits to having complaints over her forthright manner e.g. she told one gentleman that his foreskin was “unsightly”. The programmes are very watchable, not least for Christine Evans herself as she seems the parody of a Women’s Institute member ... I think that I would rather trust my genitalia to the male of the species as the female seems so much more deadly.

Editorial

Merry Christmas! I hope that the contents provide some light but entertaining reading over the holiday period.

This is the sixth issue this year, so I have reached my target – even if the last two issues have been a little late. I have enjoyed my first year as editor immensely, not least because of the many new contacts that I have made. My thanks to all the contributors. Thanks also to the rest of the Team: Steve, my predecessor for a smooth, supportive handover; Douglas the Treasurer for keeping the funds safe and for organising the meetings; and Vernon for his meticulous work as production editor.

I read a comment on a web bulletin board recently that there is nothing new to say about circumcision. I disagree. In this issue, for instance, there are three personal circumcision stories: Daniel who was circumcised unexpectedly and traumatically aged 13; Dave who was cut by choice in middle life; and Cliff who has suffered the knife three times to get the perfect finish. The diversity of experience amongst Society members is vast, and all of it is valid and interesting. So, in 2004, I hope to supply you with, not more of the same, but a lot more of the infinite variety that this topic provides.

Editor's Interview

The Cutter

John is South African but of European descent. In his part of the world, circumcision is widely practised as an initiation ritual among the ethnic cultures, and he counts himself privileged to have seen many tribal circumcisions performed.

John describes the operation as being quite simple. The foreskin is pushed back, and a needle inserted under the frenulum. The now pierced frenulum is lifted, and sliced with a quick stroke of a razor-blade. This enables the circumciser to pull the foreskin forward for the operation without any attachments to the skin. Once the frenulum is dispatched, the circumcision takes place. There is merely a hard pull of the foreskin, and a sharp knife, downwardly sliced, removes it completely.

The operation is swift and stitches are not used. No emotion is allowed to be seen by the observers (all circumcised, no women allowed). In fact, John believes that the operation is so quick that the pain is not as great as might be expected. The 'wound' is bound with a certain type of leaf, and then tightly wrapped with a leather strip. The penis is then tied to a leather thong around the waist, so it doesn't dangle and knock the thighs. Twice a day, the 'bandages' are removed, the wound inspected for sepsis, and re-dressed. The healing period is 2-3 weeks. After healing, the scar appears to be a sort of loose circ, without a frenulum.

Initiates are usually 18-22 years old. 'Circumcision seasons' coincide with holidays, i.e. July and December, and one can see numerous little 'bee-hive' huts dotted around the country, especially in the Eastern Cape, at that time of the year.

John had one white friend who decided to be circumcised tribally – which is very unusual. The only stipulation was that the guy provided his own knife. John and his brother went to watch. The guy did not even flinch, and was congratulated on being a 'man'. He said the cutting was not really painful – he likened it to holding a hot cup of coffee that was just too hot to hold. The healing can be more painful, especially when there's an erection. For this reason, the initiates are isolated in the veldt until the wound has healed, not being allowed to see any women at all.

This made John decide that he would have his frenulum cut tribally. Since he was circumcised as a kid, along with most English speaking white South African boys, this was the closest he could get to experiencing a tribal circumcision. His frenulum was cut by a male African servant who had recently undergone circumcision himself.

In due course, this led to John becoming a cutter himself, performing circumcisions and specialising particularly in frenulum cutting. To date, he has performed more than 400. I asked John to describe the procedure: "Cutting the frenulum is pretty simple. I do it basically the same way as mine was done. The foreskin (if it hasn't been removed) is retracted, and the area is swabbed with a sterile preptic swab. A sterile hypodermic needle is inserted under the frenulum, behind the glans. The needle is 'lifted' upwards, and using a sterile blade, the frenulum is severed with one quick sharp slice. I use the hypodermic needle (it's very sharp and sterile) so as not to cause unnecessary pain and discomfort. The operation is virtually painless, and I find bleeding minimal. No anaesthetic is used for that op. On only two occasions have I had to insert one or two stitches afterwards, because it has bled a lot." Most of the frenulums he has cut are on circumcised subjects, although there have been exceptions.

"Where do you perform the op," I asked.

"I've cut guys lying on a table, and on a rock, but it's normally done on a bed, legs open, and pants pulled down. In a tribal circumcision, no uncircumcised male may watch, and it's the same with the frenulum cutting, I don't allow guys to watch, unless I have cut their frenulum (or a friend of mine who now also cuts frenulums) unless they have undergone the procedure, or are waiting in line for it to be done. I'm very strict with this rule – it's only fair."

"What about dressings?"

“Yes, a dressing is applied in the form of a band-aid, with a little betadine. I advise the guys to abstain from wanking for at least a day, maybe two days. Myself, I wanked off the same day mine was cut, even though there was still a little bleeding; and one subject that I did apparently had sex with his girlfriend the same night that he was cut, although he DID use a condom. Some guys, especially the uncircumcised ones with larger frenulums take about 2-3 days to heal completely.”

Frenulum Gone

The advantage of frenulum removal is that it decreases sensitivity ever so slightly, allows the skin to become totally retracted if the guy is uncut, and alleviates any tendency for the frenulum to pull the head downwards. John says: “I became interested in cutting frenulums, especially after I noticed the difference it made to me. My penis became a little less sensitive, and I (and many guys I’ve done) have noticed a general increase in glans size. My brother, as an example, was cut by me, and his girlfriend was SO impressed by it, he came and got cut again. Many friends I have cut are so impressed by the advantages. Two guys have even told me that the glans grew so much, that it actually ‘peeled’ almost like a flower that’s too big for its bud. I didn’t have the chance to see this myself, I was only told about it later by them.”

Guys hear about John via word of mouth, through recommendations from friends and family who have had it done. Some guys do have tight frenulums. But mainly guys want to be ‘part’ of the ‘man scene’ and they also want it done because of the great difference they’ve heard it makes sexually.

John will also excise the frenulum completely if requested. For this procedure, he usually gives a shot of local anaesthetic. He first severs the frenulum, as described above, and then cuts away the two sliced ends. Sometimes a fair amount of bleeding occurs and then he inserts stitches. Ultimately, after healing, the guy is left with a completely clear and exposed V cleft under the glans.

For circumcisions, John uses a Smart clamp and he will do the cut with or without anaesthetic. He has thought of coming to the UK and plying his trade (both frenulum cutting and circumcision). There are certainly quite a few guys in the UK who could benefit from his services – perhaps even a few members of Acorn! Interestingly enough, John has cut two frenulums in the UK (both circumcised South African lads on a rugby tour of which he was part).

John would also be willing to arrange an unusual type of package holiday in South Africa. Guys could have a break on the beautiful Transkei coast, and have their frenulum cut at the same time. He could also arrange a ritual circumcision, either by himself, or by the ‘ngcibi’ who did his cut. Anaesthetic (local) would be available for those who wanted it. As he says: “At the end of the day, a wonderful holiday at the coast, with the option of experiencing the tribal culture at first hand.”

Why Was I Circumcised?

My very first memories of life date back to my circumcision when I was about three years old. I can recall walking to hospital with my mother and older brother, then aged nine years. I remember being carried down stairs, having a mask over my face and counting. Next memory was being at home in my parents' bed with my brother when I wanted to be sick – no doubt because the anaesthetic used was ether. Nothing much arises although we were both 'nursed' downstairs but I have no memories of dressings etc or comparison with my brother and no explanations were given. In fact, I didn't feel, react or behave any differently then. This happy state lasted for a few years. I used to play with two neighbours' boys and one had a large house and many outbuildings – great for kids to play in (and smoke too!). So I was at school – i.e. 5+ and one day playing with these two boys when it was very hot. We only wore shorts and it was easy for us to drop them and dance around naked. But I became the object of notice, rude remarks etc because they were different from me and I was the odd one out.

I felt quite embarrassed when one of them discussed the matter with his aunt in front of me. So I decided the best thing was to keep everything covered up. I did not see or talk to my brother – although we both slept in the same room, we were all bathed separately. School passed OK but I would not go to school weekly sessions at the baths as changing cubicles were large and four kids were made to use one cubicle. We lived near the sea and spent hours on the shore, going down after school to join my younger brother and mother. One day I saw people next to us with a naked boy of my age being dried by his mother. His 'John Thomas' looked a real mess to me. I asked my mother what had happened to him. She replied that like me he had been circumcised, although this puzzled me as mine was a neat and tidy cut.

At eleven, I prepared for High School and decided I had to learn to swim. Once I could swim, I was allowed to go to the baths on my own on Saturday mornings. One day I arrived at the pay box behind another boy – at the same school but in a different class. The manager told us that the pool was getting busy and that we would have to share a cubicle. This we did, changing carefully but when we had swum, one of us let our towel slip, and lo and behold, we were identical. I felt I'd found a real pal and we remained so at school. I soon learnt and saw that his cousin was done too.

There was still no explanation why I had been circumcised and I didn't like asking, although on a short holiday I did see my father and noticed that he was not circumcised. I did have this continuing interest as to whether others were cut or not and was pleased to see from Acorn that I'm not alone in this. From swimming I soon realised that this need to know and see was best met by being in the nude. As I said earlier, we had baths separately and as I got older would bath at night. I found my mother would come into the bathroom on her way to bed – I liked being seen and would often stand in the bath, soap all over and around, and hope to be admired. I had realised long before this that my younger brother (9 years younger) had not been cut and I must have been 18 years old or thereabouts when I was wet and truly erect in the bath when my mother came in and I dared ask why I'd been circumcised. Her reply was that doctors were not in favour of it at first, but then when I was three years old, the family doctor had told her that opinion had changed and if she brought both boys to the hospital next week, it would be done. I found that she had been told that the eldest son of her great friend had been cut, and quite often, as I found other 'pals', she seemed almost as interested as I was about their status. I then dared to ask why my younger brother was not cut – and was told that we had changed doctors, and that the one involved was not in favour of doing it. So I can't say why my parents waited to make the decision. It seems possible that my mother proposed it though left it finally to the doctor. So there was still the position – I was the same as my older brother (though I had still not seen him) and different from my younger brother!

It was only near his life's end that I did see my elder brother's identical penis. He had diabetes and a long hospital stay involving leg amputation above the knee. As only pyjama tops were worn, I did at last have my curiosity cleared and as he made no effort to conceal his circumcised penis, I mentioned the fact to him that it was the first time I'd seen it. As for the 'cut', his comment was: "Mother wanted you to be done, so I had to be done too!" So who decided or when still remains a bit vague. I've often asked other people why they were circumcised and I find that it is normal not to be told anything or to get any explanation.

Up to a point, mother's part in the business was proved when I was courting and felt it best to mention to my fiancé the fact that I was circumcised. I knew her brother was not, but need not have worried – she replied that she knew what it was because her cousin Peter had been done and this was because it was very small! Later I saw that Peter was small but successfully cut. Years after we visited his mother (my wife's aunt). In discussion, she told us how she had been surprised when Peter, keeping her company one evening recently, had asked her why had he been circumcised. She didn't give us her answer but just looked at me and so I replied quite honestly that I had asked my mother the same question! End of story.

Second Time Around – Again

In issue 1/2003, I asked members who had had a revision operation (second circumcision) or who were contemplating such an op to volunteer to fill in a questionnaire. I am grateful to all members who completed the survey. Unfortunately, it took me longer than I had hoped to analyse the responses, but a report will appear in issue 2/2004. In the meantime, if there is anyone in these categories who did not complete a questionnaire before but is willing to do so now, could they please contact me.

My Background And Three Circumcisions

Well, to be accurate one circ and two revisions, but the methodology was much the same. You may be wondering why anyone should want to go through the 'ordeal' of so many ops, but to me it was far from an ordeal as I will be explaining later. But first I'd like to recount a little of my background.

I was born towards the end of the war, and at primary school had little interest in (or opportunity to observe) the private bits of the other boys until the last year when we had to share cubicles at the local swimming pool. Most kids were fairly shy, but one was something of an extrovert, and was always flashing his uncut willy around. Being an only child, I never had any opportunity to check out anyone else's willies.

At grammar school on the London/Surrey borders I discovered that a fair proportion of the boys were cut, something like about a quarter or so from memory, and I seemed to appreciate what the difference was from mine even though I can't remember anyone actually explaining it all to me. There were a few really massive cocks around (even on boys of around 14 or 15), some cut with big bulbous heads, the uncut ones I remember had very loose foreskins and without the 'tassle' we often see. I also had the chance to examine the cocks of some of the boys of around my age who lived near the holiday home my parents had for regular weekends. Being in the country there was plenty of opportunity for privacy for that purpose. There was only one who was cut; he was a couple of years younger and Jewish, but had not fully developed at that stage. The others were uncut, including one boy whose cock had a distinct twist downwards and to the side.

The first (and at that time probably the only) circumcised cock that really impressed me belonged to a friend of mine near my home – he'd been cut just a few years earlier in his early teens, and his certainly did look like a work of art. After that I really gave no thought to the matter of circumcision for many years, in fact after I had been married for several years, and with a couple of young daughters to show for it. By then I was beginning to find that my foreskin just got in the way during sex, even though it was not too difficult to retract when necessary, (and of course it would immediately plop forward again given the slightest excuse). I found it particularly annoying, as several other people have already observed, since it covered the sensitive glans head on the outward stroke. Over several years it became more of an 'obsession', and around that time I also began to appreciate the more aesthetic appearance of a well-circumcised cock. That was the beginning of what has become a long-time fascination with the whole subject of circumcision.

In the mid/late seventies, the only source of circumcision information and advice was, of course, Forum Magazine, but there was then no discussion or awareness of the various styles and methods around the world. When I wrote to, and subsequently visited, a surgeon near Durham for the op (I think it was about £18 at the time) there was no thought in my mind about what sort of circ I wanted. I was just delighted that I was about to be relieved of that awful overhang that made my sex life such a misery! He left a scar about a quarter inch from the glans, and just used a scalpel, I think. (I don't remember much at all about the operation itself.) I think he probably also removed my frenulum, though it had always been quite insignificant and had never pulled the penis down on erection. I gather the surgeon was reputed to use a Gomco Clamp on occasions, but I am sure that was not so in my case. Healing was pretty rapid, and I think I was virtually back to normal after a couple of weeks.

However, that circ was fairly loose, and over the following 10 years the skin gradually stretched until it was beginning to come over the edge of the glans even when erect, so I made enquiries about getting my first revision. By then, the Marie Stopes Clinic was offering circs as well as vasectomies (which I had done there, in London), so I decided to take the plunge. I visited Dr Hassan, and he did the revision, but was wary of removing very much skin for fear of making erection uncomfortable (despite my protestations about just how loose it was when erect).

There was some improvement, but again, by the Spring of 2002, I had decided to try for my ideal circ – something that was fairly tight when erect, but not so tight that it would pull my scrotum halfway up the shaft. This time I settled for Dr Z in East London, and I have to say that in every way this was an excellent choice. He, and his nurse, make you feel very much at ease, and he actually listens to what you are saying. In other words, he will try to give you the sort of circ or revision you want, assuming it is technically possible with what you have there to start with. Thanks to his skill, I had minimal discomfort (I certainly wouldn't use the word pain) at any time during or after the operation. There was very little bruising or subsequent swelling, and I was even out mowing the lawn and gardening later the same day. The scar line is now about an eighth of an inch from the glans, the line is much more even than it was before, and the scar is slowly becoming less visible. When erect there is a slight tension on the shaft skin which I greatly enjoy, yet there is just enough skin left for lazy masturbation, i.e. without lubricant, though I can use that if I am in the mood because then there is virtually no movement of the shaft skin unless it is grasped very firmly.

My reasons for the original circumcision, and subsequent revisions, were a mixture of hygiene, appearance and sexual performance. My ideal circ would have been a high and very tight one, but the first circ being low, one could not then change that back again, and in terms of tightness I think it is something that's much more difficult to achieve in adult circs than, say, teenagers or toddlers. The surgeons always seem to judge the amount to remove by looking at a flaccid penis, whereas you really need to see it erect to judge accurately just how much can be removed. Have any other members had the good fortune of being examined with an erection to improve the outcome?

Throughout, the decision for the circ and revisions has always been totally my own, though my wife has always been supportive once she appreciated it was something I really wanted. Like many women, I suspect, she prefers my cut status for a number of reasons, but doesn't have my obsession about the subject. I suspect very few women do. Even though what I now have is probably the best end result I am likely to achieve, I still enjoy looking at pics of other circumcisions, partly to admire the handiwork of the many skilled surgeons that are around working on adults to give them belatedly what they yearn for, but perhaps equally to drool over what might have been mine if my parents had had me trimmed as a youngster.

If anyone has any questions or comments, I'd be glad to hear from you at cliffordha@aol.com

Wartime Experiences

On leaving school in the mid 50's, I took a temporary job in a school and soon became friends with the caretaker who had been a medical orderly in the war, connected with a mobile field hospital in Northern France and Belgium.

He was an incredible character; as a result of his wartime service he only ever slept for one hour per night spending the rest of his time renovating old cars. He had the ability, in a very few words, of painting his wartime experiences which he did without much persuasion.

There were three 'surgeons' attached to the hospital. They had to deal not only with serious war wounds but also with numerous cases of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). In many cases, the surgeon had to amputate the penis and sometimes the testicles as well in order to save the patient's life. The drugs available were very primitive compared with today. Anaesthetics consisted of dripping ether onto a gauze face mask.

The surgeons soon discovered that the majority of troops with STD were uncircumcised and agreed to carry out more circumcisions in an effort to control these infections. This policy did prove successful with a marked reduction in cases although it was difficult to eradicate completely. The surgeons would often carry out the circumcision when dealing with the war wounds. My friend was responsible for cremating the bits and pieces which he said was not a pretty sight.

During October, the Daily Mail printed a number of articles on the steep increase of chlamydia in young girls – but there was no comment on how they had become infected, which must have been from their male partners. With so few circumcisions now being carried out, it would seem that the foreskin must at least be partly responsible for spreading the infection.

There has already been considerable comment on the spread of AIDS and the foreskin; from tests carried out it would appear that the inner foreskin is particularly to blame. There was a TV programme sometime ago discussing the benefit of circumcision in combating AIDS.

Part Two: The Loss of a Foreskin

December 4th was a lovely day: the sun was shining brightly, dazzling me whilst driving over 100 miles to Luton. Despite the mental tension of the impending operation, I had not lost my appetite and consumed sausage, egg and chips, and two pints of my favourite beer only 1½ hours before being cut. Perhaps this was not a sensible thing to do just before circumcision, but too bad!

There was complete bedlam in the surgery, making me wonder what I had come to: babies screaming everywhere, a crowded waiting room, people milling about. It was interesting to observe the other patients, all looking somewhat nervous. I was dying to say to them all: "I know what you're here for!" But the Doc didn't keep me waiting long and was very direct. After walking into his surgery there was no small talk: "I want you to take off your shoes and socks, trousers and pants and lie on the table, please." This is it! No going back! I ask if I can take photographs during the operation. "Yes, of course. That's a nice camera. What is it?"

First, the Doc took a marker and made a line across my dick at the point at which he will make the cut. "I want it high and tight," I said, but this received no reaction whatsoever. I suspect that with the guided forceps method there is little that one can do to affect the style of the circ. Then came the injections, which were probably what I had been fearing most, as I had read about the painful nature of these needles. After all, who would relish the thought of hypodermics being pushed into the most delicate organ of the body! But fear was totally unwarranted, as I didn't even feel the needle going in. Several injections were made into the shaft skin, and then some more into the foreskin itself. Being left on one's own to give the anaesthetic time to do its numbing is not ideal just before being cut. Lying there, on my own, the same mixed feelings were surging through my brain. Why am I doing this? Will everything be alright? I must be stupid! And then I looked at my poor dear little dick. It had a weird swelling all round, making it look more like Michelin man. I touched it, but could not feel a thing. A few more injections were necessary to give complete numbness – a very odd sensation, seeing my dick being handled, and yet feeling nothing – glad it's not normally like this!

The next part of the op happened so quickly that it was a few moments before I realised that the deed had been done. The Doc picked up what looked like a pair of tin shears. "These are known as bone crushers," he said, menacingly. With a pair of forceps, my foreskin was stretched towards the ceiling and caught between the jaws of the bone crusher, manipulating the skin so that the marked line was visible. "Let's make sure the glans is below the jaws." "Yes, please. I still need that!" said I. After a bit more fiddling, which I could not photograph because Doc's back was in the way, I suddenly realised that the foreskin was missing. It had been cut off! I was circumcised! This was it! I am a cut guy! WOW! This was the supreme moment that had to be photographed. This was the apotheosis of the long wait of many years. It occurred to me that I must be very weird to be photographing my own dick during a circumcision operation.

From this moment on I was totally relaxed. I suppose with the foreskin gone there was no longer the nagging feeling that I shouldn't be doing it. It had been done. There was no going back now, so I might as well enjoy it. After all, this was what I had been yearning for for most of my life. There was no pain whatsoever and it was actually becoming quite fascinating.

One thing I missed because of the rapidity of the action was the foreskin – I must have a photograph of my foreskin; it's the last I shall see of it. I was sorry that I didn't see the actual cutting, but the Doc was very intent on what he was doing and seemed to forget that I had a camera with me. Not surprising, I suppose, because how many people can be so crazy as to photograph their own circumcision? He had to scabble around in the waste bin to find it, but there it was, dangling from the giant forceps that he had used to grip the foreskin before cutting. The foreskin in the forceps. It looked enormous!

Farewell, O foreskin! I hope I won't miss you too much!

Then, there was a bit of a bloody mess, when the blood vessels were sought out and tied off one by one. It was at this point that I recognised a familiar feeling coming over me – I was in danger of fainting. "Mind over matter," I kept repeating to myself, staring hard at the ceiling and trying to forget what was going on down below. Then I felt the desire for a pee coming on. What the hell do I do now – I shouldn't have drunk so much beer just before coming here. This probably took my mind off feeling faint, because it passed, and so did the need for a pee, thank goodness.

Now for the sewing-up job. I could see from the gap between the two halves of the skin that I was going to have a tight one. Wonderful! Fantastic! First he made certain that there were no more leaky veins by carefully mopping up the blood and probing around. When he was satisfied that there was no further bleeding, the joining of the two halves of skin began, starting with the frenulum area to make sure that the join was in the right place. He was very nimble with the needle, and very careful and thorough. The anaesthetic was beginning to wear off and I felt the last two stitches, but it was nothing to worry about.

Finally, on went the dressing and two or three layers of sticky plaster. The Doc was now behind schedule, because I think mine took slightly longer than he expected, although it was only 50 minutes. Being ushered out quickly, I had to complete my dressing in the waiting room, with everyone watching. But, what the hell, I was proud of myself and grinned at everybody.

Before leaving, the Doc wanted to see if everything was OK, so I dropped my trousers, and there I saw for the first time my beautiful circumcised cock – and started to get an erection! “Mind over matter,” I said, and it stopped rising, although maybe the pain had something to do with it, because the anaesthetic was distinctly weak now.

Without any doubt, witnessing that operation in great detail and photographing each step was one of the most incredible experiences of my whole life. Having now gone through it, I would say to anyone: “Get cut: you will not regret it.” But it must be done under local anaesthetic, so that you can be fully aware of what is going on. That moment when I realised that the foreskin had been separated, and I saw my cut cock, I could have screamed for joy. Many would think what a strange person I must be, but these are the emotions that go with the fetish of circumcision and cannot be suppressed.

No Taking The Michael

Michelangelo Buonarroti started his 13<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> ft sculpture of David in 1501 when 24 years of age and completed it in 1504. By next year, the statue will have presented its genital ambiguity for a full 500 years. But only recently there has been a furore as to whether the penis is Jewishly circumcised or not (see issue 5/2003). Some, like Dr Ben Glazner of Manchester, claim that David's penis has not been initiated according to the covenant, so he is not a true model of the original Jewish David. Dr Glazner suggested 'repair work' to correct the anomaly.

True, the David of the statue appears not to have undergone ritual Jewish circumcision as practised today. But in Biblical times, it was the protruding tip of the foreskin which was excised with a sharp stone or flint (a tearing rather than a cutting) and later with a metal knife (an ismol). This cut is only the first stage (Milah) of today's procedure. Peri'ah (tearing the inner membrane and skinning the glans) was added in about 140 AD and a split shield was introduced in the 17th century to protect the glans. With the shield, much more of the foreskin could be removed without endangering the glans or frenulum, and, with the membrane excision as well, the entire glans was exposed during healing.

I consider that David is displaying the milder circumcision of antiquity (and even to over 100 years after the death of Jesus) which was customary before it was stylised and radicalised in stages over the centuries. The details are laid out in the Dinim of Milah prepared by Bernard Homa, MRCS, LRCP; this covers all aspects of ritual circumcision in Orthodox Judaism.

There is therefore a continuity of cutting, but its nature has evolved considerably in a thousand years, and could even become less drastic and more symbolic in times to come. The Star of David might yet assimilate the Scar of David!

As a footnote, I would like to add extremes from the distant past and present. In folklore, Abraham is said to have circumcised his son with an axe, and was rebuked by an angel for his haste! This contrasts with some reform Jews of America who have forsaken the Brit Milah for the Brit Shalom alternative initiation with no cutting at all.

Notes On Issue 5

It was great to see the illustrations in issue 5/2003. I hope that this innovation will continue. Part One of Dave's Dick only showed uncut pictures of his penis. Perhaps Part Two of his story will be illustrated by the circumcised version. He states that his eldest son was circumcised at the age of three. Was his younger son circumcised as well? Are all the males in his family circumcised?

With regard to the photograph of Michelangelo's David: I am sure that the penis shows Michelangelo's depiction of the male genitals as following the Greek ideal of a diminutive uncut penis, more suitable for a young boy than a mature man. It is a great sculpture and should not be altered in any way. I suggest that if Ben Glazner does not like Michelangelo's concept of an uncut penis, he should take up a mallet and chisel and a block of marble to produce his own version of an authentic circumcised David. I by far prefer to see a circumcised penis rather than a childish looking uncut one, but I recognise a masterpiece when I see it so it should be left alone as Michelangelo produced it.

Is it time that a survey was conducted of cut and uncut members? If circumcised, style and method of circumcision and any other detail that may be of interest to other members could be surveyed. A form in Acorn should be possible with no extra postage. There would be quite a bit of work to correlate the results so perhaps some member would volunteer to help out with this chore.

Like Father, Like Son...Like Grandson?

I was circumcised just after I reached puberty. I live in the U.K. but am of an Anglo-Indian background. My parents were divorced when I was very young and I only stayed with my English father once a year for two or three weeks. My father caught sight of my penis just before my thirteenth birthday. It was probably the first time that he had seen it since I was a small baby. He was appalled that I still had a foreskin and was horrified that I was still uncircumcised. He had obviously forgotten that I had not been cut when I was born and presumed that my mother had had me circumcised when I was very small. I do not think circumcision was a big issue with him. He just felt that all boys should be cut and that was that! By the way I also saw his penis at the same time – it was rather thick, circumcised, with a big head on it. It certainly was not cut as tight as mine was to be.

He took me to the local doctor in Northumberland the following day and asked the doctor to circumcise me there and then. My father, in my hearing, just told the doctor to ensure that the head was fully exposed. I think the fee was £10 – rather a lot in those days. When asked about giving me a local anaesthetic, my father said that he could not possibly afford another £8 for that as well! It did not seem to concern the doctor.

My father then left and the doctor asked me to take my clothes off and lie on a table. I was extremely nervous. The doctor examined my penis, sliding the foreskin back and forth across the head a few times. He explained that he was going to remove the foreskin, that it would be painful but that it would only take a minute or two. I asked him why I needed my foreskin removed. All he said was: “It will be much nicer without the skin.” He called in his son to hold me and proceeded to circumcise me freehand, first using a scalpel and then surgical scissors to tidy it up. Finally he pushed the inner foreskin down the shaft to meet the remaining shaft skin and bandaged it up. It was excruciatingly painful and I nearly passed out. The doctor cut me extremely tight so that when I had an erection there was almost no movement on the shaft. It has loosened up slightly since. The doctor left my frenulum intact. I think I have what is described on the net as a high and tight U.S. military style circumcision.

For a week I was in considerable discomfort but it all healed up within about three weeks. At the time I was deeply traumatised by what had happened since I was not consulted at any stage. I deeply resented what my father had done. In time, I came to terms with it and began to rather like the appearance of my circumcised penis. Curiously I now think it was one of the best things that could have happened. My penis, to me at least, looks and feels great. It is much easier to clean, my various partners have adored it. What more is there to say!

I now have a son who is just fifteen and uncircumcised. When he was born we did not even consider circumcising him in view of what I had been through. However, he is now keen to have his foreskin removed for a variety of reasons. His main problem is that he has a rather tight foreskin which he finds difficult to retract over his rather larger than average penis head. We took him to our doctor who prescribed a cream to loosen the foreskin but it has had little effect. The doctor now advises circumcision. I have discussed it with my son and he is keen to go ahead even though very few boys of his age are circumcised in this country. I have asked him to think about it. It is entirely his decision. If we go ahead of course he would have an anaesthetic. I have not got as far as discussing what style he would want.

Welcome Back!

Having rejoined Acorn after a lapse of a few years I was sad to see it in a diminished form compared to the (8 issues) early years. Clearly this has come about through lack of contributions and I congratulate those on both sides of the debate who have struggled to keep the Society and its newsletter going. Particular thanks too for the efforts of all the editors.

My story appeared back in Acorn editions in '93 and '94 under a shy 'anon'. With later contributions, I identified myself as 'G.D.' and here confess I was the one who designed and submitted the ACORN logo and masthead of this publication – still going strong I see!

I won't repeat my long story. It's sufficient to tell new readers that I'm in the 'no choice, circumcised' group, cut at 8 on either parental whim or a health professional's advice. Once over the emotional shock and re-adjustment of a permanently exposed glans rubbing on clothing, I've never looked back with regret, only relief I was spared the encumbrance of my anteatery in sexual activity. I'm grateful to whoever decided they could dispense with my foreskin and did it. My father was circumcised but never talked to me about it, nor mum. I was given no instruction to retract or wash under my foreskin and never did. Until my teens I didn't realise uncircumcised boys were supposed to do this and shudder to think how many males grow up in, and still practise, this ignorance. My wife and I tried to circumcise our two sons but all our requests were refused by the medical profession. That's another long story – which bugs me still, and I'm a firm advocate of routine infant circumcision as a PARENTAL CHOICE.

Today's NHS is failing its patients in this area. It should provide a clear neutral leaflet to all parents listing the pros and cons of the procedure (for me there are no cons!), and conclude with a consent/application form in case they wish to proceed. This is a clear prophylactic measure, on a par with immunisation and would save money long term. That's another thesis of mine I need space to set out.

My regards to all Acorn friends old and new.

G.D.

Yet More On Celebrity Circumcisions

I read the article on More Celebrity Circumcisions (Issue 5/2003) with interest. Nothing has been recorded for either Seb Coe or Ian Botham but I did hear that Coe was Jewish so must be cut. I would guess Botham is uncut but who knows?

According to various sightings and a photograph (maybe fake?) I saw of Errol Flynn, he was definitely circumcised. The photograph depicted him nude near to a waterfall and while his penis was not the considerable size that it had been reported as, it was very thick. Incidentally Flynn was Australian (born in Tasmania) not American, but circumcision was very popular in Australia also. Noel Coward is recorded both as cut and uncut and I don't suppose we will ever know? Regarding other sportsmen, Allan Border and Dennis Lillee, both former Australian cricketers, are cut. I have a report from a good authority on a personal sighting that Lillee is definitely cut. Geoff Howarth (former NZ cricket captain) is uncut but I wonder about Sir Richard Hadlee?

I would still be interested in finding out the status of Russell Crowe (NZ born) and Viggo Mortensen, born in New York of an American mother and a Danish father!

Neville – Northolt

And Finally...

[Ending on a slightly sour festive note, Anthony has written these words, to be sung at a rollicking pace to the tune of Jingle Bells, to commemorate the fact that, for many baby boys newly born at Christmas, one of their gifts may be a surprising and rather unpleasant experience.]

Jingle Bells

Chorus

Jingle bells, Jingle bells, Santa's on his way,
As you lie beneath the straps, young babe, on Christmas Day.
O, close your eyes; you'll despise being circumcised
Pain and cutting all abound from Santa's festive ride.

Ho! Ho! Ho! He'll fetch
Forceps first to stretch
Probe around the glans will he Till surfaces are free.

Clamping, cutting next
Baby screams, perplexed
What agonising surgery
To cut your foreskin free – So

Jingle bells, Jingle bells etc

In his Yuletide pack
Instruments he'll pack,
Off to see another boy,
His cheerful smile a ploy.

You are lying there,
Glans all bloody, bare
Gomco clamp has had its way
You're circumcised today – So

Jingle bells, Jingle bells etc

Editorial

This issue my editor's column takes a look at the Acorn Society membership – our ages, status, and for those circumcised, the age at which we were cut. But, at the end of 2003, there were only 110 of us – a rather uncomfortable fact. This is far too few, compared with the number of guys interested in foreskins and circumcision in the UK, not to mention overseas. So, a New Year's resolution (if it's not too late for these) is for us to undertake a recruitment campaign. The first stage of this is to revamp the web site which has not been touched for a number of years. The core activity of the Society is the printed newsletter and this will certainly continue in this form. But a web site can be a very useful publicity tool to which potential members can be referred for information. (Sample copies of the newsletter will of course be sent by post to those who have no Internet access.) So, in the next edition, we will be launching the new website as a prelude to a recruitment drive.

A quick reminder. The next Acorn meeting will be held in Leicester over the weekend of 27th/28th March (details page 5). If you can make it, please do. There is no reason to feel shy or inhibited. The atmosphere is very welcoming and it soon feels entirely natural to be discussing your favourite subject with fellow aficionados.

Editor's Column

Who Are We?

That we share a fascination with circumcision and foreskins is taken as read. But just who are the members of the Acorn Society?

At the end of 2003, there were 110 of us. We are predominately UK based (97 members) but have a sprinkling of members in mainland Europe (4) and in the rest of the world (9). There are 79 circumcised members and 22 uncircumcised with 9 members not declaring their status. Ninety-nine members confessed their age. The average is 54 with our youngest member at 23 and our oldest at 87. Three quarters of us are between 40 and 70 (see Figure 1).

There is no significant difference between the overall age profile of the circumcised and the uncircumcised.

What do the data tell us? Of the circumcised, 23% were cut in the first year of life, another 9% by the age of 5 and a further 8% by the age of 18. Thus 40% of the circumcised members were circumcised as children (in the broad sense), leaving 60% who were cut as adults. Advancing years appear not to be a barrier to getting circumcised. 19% were over 40 before they underwent the knife and two intrepid members waited until their seventh decade before losing their foreskins.

Figure 4 gives a clue about this delay. The reasons for members being circumcised as adults is not recorded but it safe to guess that the majority were elective. Such circumcisions were very difficult to obtain before the 1980's. There was a medical interdict against circumcision from the late 1940's onwards and this is borne out by the low numbers of members circumcised in the 20 years 1954-1974 as compared with the previous and following decades. As elective circumcision became more widely available, the numbers jump significantly with many more members obtaining circumcision in the thirty years since 1974.

Figure 3 bears this out. All things being equal, one would have expected adults wanting elective circumcision to get cut in their twenties. But figure 3 actually shows a surprising correlation between age now and age circumcised i.e. the older the person now, the older he was when circumcised. On reflection, perhaps we should be less surprised. Someone aged 70 now would have been 50 in 1983, someone 60 now would have been 40 then, someone 50 now was 30 then. Thus the ages of 50, 40 and 30 respectively probably represent the earliest at which these cohorts could arrange, without extreme difficulty, to have themselves circumcised. And this is what figure 3 tends to show. If the same analysis were to be done in twenty years time, the pattern would almost certainly be different. Then, I would expect the majority of blobs for people up to the age of 60 to be concentrated in the age circumcised band 20-30. Partly this is because routine infant circumcision is much rarer now and thus future circumcised members of Acorn are likely to be largely those who elect to be cut as adults. And since thankfully it is now much easier for those who want rid of their foreskins to arrange it without question or embarrassment, those adult electives are likely to arrange their cut early in their adult life i.e. in their twenties.

One interesting question. Why are all those members who were circumcised electively as adults still members of Acorn? They wished to be cut, they've had their op, they are now circumcised. Isn't that the end of it? Apparently not. Most men circumcised electively as adults are entirely happy with their new state (although it may take one or two revisions to gain perfection!) Nevertheless, for most, the interest does not die. Similarly, the fact that we have uncircumcised members across the age range shows that interest in foreskins (and their removal!) does not wane with age. For all, foreskins and circumcision remain subjects of intense fascination.

And as long as they do, Acorn will live on!

My Muslim Son – Part II

A corn readers may recollect that in My Muslim Son (issue 2/2003) I described how I eventually came to the decision to go ahead with the circumcision of my Anglo-Indonesian nine year old son. As you will see, the operation which took place on 31st July in Jakarta during the school holidays was not the positive experience that I had planned. Let me elaborate.

First, finances were tight since it had cost about £2000 for the four of us, two adults and two children, to fly out there. My wife and her brother, a man on a modest wage with an eleven year old boy due to be circumcised at the same time, were keen to have the operation followed by a ceremony at home two days later with invited guests paying their respects by giving the boys money. This meant hiring in catering, and the combined expense was therefore going to be high. Second, the doctor, chosen on the recommendation of one of my wife's relatives, was not to be consulted prior to the operation with the boys in attendance because my wife and her brother, who were paying, wanted to save money.

After a long hellish early morning drive through a suffocatingly hot and traffic clogged Jakarta, the boys, my wife and her brother (another one acted as the driver) and I arrived at the clinic where we were introduced to the doctor. My brother-in-law, yet again as with the circumcision of his elder son (this circumcision was video filmed) chose not to be involved with discussion of the methods, which were either laser or knife/scissors, or the operation itself. The non-English speaking Muslim doctor put my wife and me off laser, commenting that a by-product of laser was the smell of burnt flesh though on the other hand it was a bloodless procedure.

My son, dressed in his chequered sarong, collarless shirt and white skull cap, was the first to go. Nervously he entered the operating room and lay on the prepared couch, one of three in the room. When the doctor examined his penis, he was concerned about its small size and proceeded to induce an erection, as well as retract my son's adhesion free foreskin. Accompanied by a headscarfed nurse, he then injected a local anaesthetic into the base of the penis, which caused my son much distress and, disconcertingly, drew blood. Standing at my son's side, clutching his hand, I watched the doctor pull the trunk like foreskin forward, hold it with forceps and pinch the penis to ensure that the anaesthetic had taken effect, and then make a dorsal slit up to the corona. The foreskin was next cut off and the frenulum left intact. My wife photographed the event from the start to the stitching and bandaging.

What was not recorded on film was what occurred subsequently at the clinic. It broke my heart to see my son lying on the couch in the foetal position sobbing: "I never wanted this to happen." "Had I betrayed him?" I kept asking myself. And there was more.

Towards the end of my son's circumcision, I noticed a young boy come in. He had seen what was going to happen to him too and was determined not to be part of it. However, his parents had other ideas and refused to listen to his pleas.

Eventually, in a shocking spectacle, he was dragged onto a neighbouring couch and forcibly circumcised by another doctor while his parents pinned him down and kept his legs open. He wailed: "I want to go home, I want to go home", but it was useless. I wish that I had had the courage to intervene.

Sickened by this sight, I said a silent prayer that my nephew's circumcision would pass quietly. Unlike my son and I, he was well endowed which allowed the doctor to circumcise him in a flaccid state, although adhesions between the glans and the foreskin had to be removed first. Indeed, my nephew, a small skinny waif, was so quiet I barely thought he was alive.

The outcomes for the two boys were fair. My chubby son quickly recovered to display a penis where the glans is only fully exposed when erect; my nephew endured infection post-operatively but is the one who is truly a 'roundhead'. The outcome for me is that I am even more cautious than before for my five year old son whom my wife also wanted cut. If his turn comes, there will be a consultation in English in England. Until he can retract his foreskin without pain, there will be no operation. Watch this space for the next instalment: My Muslim Son – Part III?

Acorn Spring Meeting

A meeting of the Acorn Society has been arranged to take place on the 28th and 29th March 2004 at the Ramada-Jarvis Hotel, Leicester.

The cost of Dinner, Bed and Breakfast (shared twin bed room) is £47.00 per person per night. We have taken an option on a small number of single rooms for which the cost is £51.00 per night.

Experience suggests that a number of members will gather on the Friday evening and meet informally. The larger number usually arrives for the meeting on Saturday afternoon, about 2.00 pm, and stays over to Sunday morning.

Some of our member will attend the meeting on Saturday and will not take overnight accommodation – the choice is yours!

More About That Statue

The last two issues of Acorn have carried articles regarding Michelangelo's famous statue, commonly called 'David'. Anthony's article (Issue 6/2003) appears to contain a number of factual errors which are worth noting.

Firstly, there is no evidence that Michelangelo was intending to sculpt the Jewish boy who slew Goliath. He does not seem to have given his statue a name. It is most likely that some museum curator, anxious to thoroughly label all his exhibits decided that it looked like David and thus named the statue as we now know it.

If Michelangelo had indeed intended to sculpt David then he would clearly have known that the boy would have been circumcised. However, as with most artists, he would also have been moved to use artistic licence to fit in with what was expected by people of the time (after all, he needed to sell his works to make a living and couldn't go against what potential buyers liked).

The classical form was to always present the glans as covered. Also the genitals were presented proportionately smaller than might be expected for the size and age of the subject, thus grown men were depicted with the genitals of teenage boys (and a correspondingly small amount of pubic hair – as can be seen in this statue).

Anthony repeats the oft-stated claim of the anti-circ lobby that Jewish circumcision originally only removed the very tip of the foreskin. There is absolutely no evidence to support this claim. What evidence we can glean clearly points to a more complete circumcision. Let us consider a few facts:-

1. From a surgical point of view, it is almost impossible to cut through the foreskin without it being under tension – this would be even more critical when using a relatively blunt flint knife! – and when under tension it is unlikely that the cut would be made close to where it was being gripped at the tip, it is much easier to cut closer to the glans thus leading to at least part of the glans being exposed.
2. We know from wall paintings and examination of some mummies that the ancient Egyptians circumcised by pulling the foreskin out and cutting off a substantial portion of it. If only the tip had been removed it would not have been possible to confirm the circumcised status of the mummies. The Biblical Jews lived in captivity in Egypt for a long time and almost certainly one nation actually learnt circumcision from the other, thus a significant difference in method is improbable and so the Jews almost certainly also removed more than just the tip.
3. Many tribes around the world (eg the natives of Australia and Africa) independently adopted circumcision as part of their tribal identity. Every one of them, even those only performing a dorsal slit, exposes the whole glans in their operation. What reason is there to conjecture that the Jews were any different?

4. Since many men are born with a short foreskin which does not cover the whole glans in later life it is very unlikely that a procedure designed to provide a 'tribal mark' would be done in such a way that a significant number of men (including many outside the 'tribe') wouldn't actually have to undergo it to appear to have the 'mark'.
5. Underlying the religious requirements of both Jews and Moslems to abstain from pork and to be circumcised there are actually very sound medical reasons based on the environment in which those great religions began. From a medical standpoint, circumcision is highly desirable in situations where there is a lack of water for washing and also high temperatures and a lot of fine sand (as many a British soldier has found in desert campaigns from WW2 to the present day). However, if the tip alone is removed then the situation is actually made worse because there is still a large moist area under the foreskin to trap the sand, etc but a much larger and looser opening to allow it to enter in the first place. Only a complete circumcision totally eliminates the problem.
6. We do know that in the post-Biblical times when Greece was the 'centre of world culture', some Jews had become slack in their observance of circumcision so that it was possible for many to pull their foreskin remnant forward and tie it over the glans to match Greek sensibilities in the Gymnasium. This does not prove anything about the original method of circumcision, only that, at that time, the inner skin was not necessarily fully removed but just turned back.

I have carefully re-read Genesis chapter 17 which recounts God's original command to circumcise, and the circumcision of Ismael; and chapter 21 recounting the birth and circumcision of Isaac. Nowhere is there any mention of an axe being used, nor of any rebuke by an angel. It would seem that this is yet another of Anthony's fantasies.

Finally, whilst there are no doubt some of Jewish origins who have abandoned circumcision, they can no more now be called Jews than those of Christian ancestry who reject Christ or refuse baptism can now be called Christians.

That Statue – A Postscript

With regard to the photograph of Michelangelo's David: I am sure that the penis shows Michelangelo's depiction of the male genitals as following the Greek ideal of a diminutive uncut penis, more suitable for a young boy than a mature man. It is a great sculpture and should not be altered in any way. I suggest that, if Ben Glazner does not like Michelangelo's concept of an uncut penis, he take up a mallet and chisel and a block of marble to produce his own version of an authentic circumcised David. I by far prefer to see a circumcised penis rather than a childish looking uncut one, but I recognise a masterpiece when I see it; so it should be left alone as Michelangelo produced it.

Part Three: Life as a Cut Guy

The immediate post-operation period was not entirely a comfortable one. A hot stinging sensation was gradually becoming more apparent, changing slowly into the dull throb of a toothache, but powerful pain-killers soon calmed it down. Potential erections kept occurring throughout the homeward journey, which required considerable brain power to subdue. When bedtime arrived everything was fine, the pain had all but disappeared and I went to bed a very happy person. Sleep that night was wonderful, as I did not sleep well the previous night, being too full of apprehension and excitement.

However, subsequent nights were not as good, as several times each night I was rudely awakened by considerable penis pain, which I soon realised was being caused by a very hard erection. Now I realised the reason for the fairly massive plaster that the Doc had wrapped around: it had to withstand these onslaughts of raised blood pressure and stop the stitches being ripped out. These erections, of course, were being caused by the desire for a pee, and the only way to deal with this was to go as quickly as possible, which soon relieved the situation.

On close examination everything seemed to be fine. There was not much bruising and very little swelling. The Doc appeared to have done a marvellous job. As far as could be seen, the frenulum had been removed and the shaft skin seemed very tight. It was difficult to tell with the dressing still in place, as it was obviously preventing expansion of some of the skin. The following day, less than 24 hours after being cut, I was required to play the organ (not mine) in our local town church for a charity service. This was not easy, although I did manage to drive the car myself. I had to be somewhat careful with playing the pedals, which require a fair amount of movement of the lower half of the body. When asked by the vicar how I was, I told him the true facts, causing great embarrassment. This is when I realised that circumcision is not a subject that can be discussed openly, which is a great pity, especially when one has just gone through the experience and wants to share it with others.

Taking a shower was one of the most difficult tasks while the dressing was still on. The Doc had told me not to get it wet, which seemed rather difficult under the circumstances. His advice was to wrap it in cling film, which seemed to me to be very comical. So, I tried it, but immediately got the inevitable erection, which was fortunately not as painful as the nocturnal erections. With the aid of a flannel I was able to prevent most of the dressing from getting wet.

Eight days later on 12th December I went back for the after-sales service when Doc removed the heavy plaster bandage by cutting it off. For the first time I was able to see my new dick, and I was so thrilled that I could feel an erection coming on, one which was not going to be stopped. I apologised, but the Doc retorted “Don’t worry about that! It’s useful so that I can see if I have removed the correct amount of skin. I don’t often get the chance to see an erect penis.” Strange, I thought, I imagined that most men would get a hard-on under those circumstances. But after all that, he did not remove the stitches, which surprised me. So, following the recommendation of many others who have been circ’ed recently, I whipped them out on the tenth day, but kept a clean dressing on until all weeping had ceased. I did not want to run the risk of getting suture tunnels, which can be so disfiguring – and appearance is all important to a man with a newly circumcised penis!

On 13th December, the ninth day after the circ, everything seemed to have healed beautifully, so I did not replace the dressing. For the first time I was able to experience a bare cut cock – and, wow, what an experience! It was so sensitive that I got a real hard-on in the middle of the street, and had to cover my front with my bag. In fact, I had to stop walking until things calmed down. And, what’s more, I was back at the organ playing for a carol service that same day! Fortunately, this effect soon subsided, and I was able to walk normally only a couple of days later. I started using an antiseptic wound healing cream at this point, which seemed to help to soften the scar and accelerate the healing.

A few days later I began to get the natural desire for some sort of relief. After all, it was now over two weeks since I had had any form of sex, and I was beginning to get desperate, but I had been told that I must desist for three weeks to one month. I realised that this degree of abstinence was not going to be possible, so I tried gently massaging the glans, avoiding any movement to the shaft skin. This seemed to work quite well and I brought myself to ejaculation, which was a huge relief. But during this process I had strange feelings inside my penis, as if something was parting company. I have no idea what caused this feeling, but I suppose it could have been the severed blood vessels floating around and finding their new positions. But this did cool my emotions and made me determined to show more restraint.

At five weeks after the op it became apparent that the frenulum had not been removed. There was a tight bridge of skin joining the shaft and the glans that was pulling the glans downwards quite considerably. This was even tighter than before circumcision, due, I suppose, to the shortening effect of the removal of the foreskin. The Doc agreed that he would do something about it, but suggested waiting until the original wound had healed thoroughly.

Five months after circumcision the frenulum was attacked, but when the wound had healed I was still not satisfied, as there was still a tightness, with a degree of pain during sex, and it looked very untidy. So, back to the Doc again! He agreed to do a radical frenulectomy, but warned me that the tightness could be due to scar tissue, in which case further surgery would not ease the problem. However, I decided that I would take the risk. This proved much more painful than the original cut. The injections were quite nasty and the after-effects of the excision lasted longer. The frenulum is obviously a strange and difficult structure, causing annoyance to many people both before and after circumcision.

How does it feel after almost two years? Firstly, there is no regret at going for circumcision, even though there is a degree of disappointment. Now that I have got through the euphoria of the actual circumcision, my everyday life has returned to normal, and is no longer penis-orientated, which it was for several weeks. While it lasted, although exciting, this phase was quite worrying because, being self-employed, it was interfering with my work and causing a lot of lost time. Physically, things are much better. When flaccid, my penis feels very comfortable. I no longer have to choose between covered or bare glans, neither of which situation was satisfactory before cutting. Now, it just feels absolutely natural, better than either of the previous states, and has a better appearance.

However, I think that some people on the pro-circumcision groups exaggerate the benefits, to the point at which it becomes an all-consuming fetish. "Sex is a million times better!", they say. Well, it may be for some, but for others it will prove less exciting. Every penis is different, with different lengths of foreskin, different degrees of tightness, and different proportions of glans to shaft. All of these parameters contribute to the ultimate result. The anti-circ lobby makes a great deal of the reduction in sensation that accompanies the loss of the foreskin. They are not entirely wrong: I miss some of the exquisite tingling sensations that the foreskin used to produce, especially during the onset of erection. There can be no doubt that the stretch sensors in the foreskin play an important role in the sensations of erection and movement. Now I am sometimes uncertain whether I am actually having an erection, and have to check with my hand to feel if my dick is hard. The sensations during masturbation are also weaker, and a different technique has to be adopted. But when the technique has been perfected, orgasm is still good!

Finally, what about intercourse? There is a distinct difference, both for me and for my wife, who says it feels different, but can't quite explain why. There is undoubtedly a reduced sensation, which can be an advantage in that it reduces the risk of premature ejaculation. The tight shaft skin results in more friction, especially during the outward stroke, which gives a most pleasant sensation. But there are times when I find myself having to work so hard that my wife complains I am making her sore before reaching a climax.

So, in summary, I am proud of my new dick and proud to be circumcised, even though I have some misgivings. I have no desire to return to my previous state and in common with everyone else who has been circumcised as an adult, I wish

I'd had it done sooner. As the Doc said after the op, it is probably better to be cut before puberty, and then you will never know what you have missed! The converse is that I found the experience very emotional and would happily go through it all again – but I don't think I will bother with any revisions, as I am perfectly happy with it as it is!

Wilfred Thesiger R.I.P.

Wilfred Thesiger died on 24th August 2003 aged 93. Intrepid explorer, especially in Arabia, Thesiger's main interest as far as Acorn readers are concerned will lie in the time that he spent in Iraq. He lived with the canoe-borne marshmen of Iraq over a period of seven years, attaining acceptance only by learning the unusual skill of circumcision. This is recorded in his book The Marsh Arabs.

As a European Christian, he was finding difficulty in being accepted. For instance, the stricter Shias would not drink from the same cup as an infidel. This changed when he stopped in a large village in the Amaira country on his way north. After dinner, his host asked what Thesiger kept in his boxes. On being told they contained medicines, Thesiger was asked whether he was a doctor ("I know about medicine") and whether he could circumcise. At this stage, Thesiger had never performed the operation although he had watched it being carried out numerous times. So he took a chance and answered that he could. This led to a request for Thesiger to circumcise the host's son, Kharibid. It had been some years since anyone had come who knew how to circumcise and the boy could not marry until he had been done. Thesiger agreed somewhat apprehensively.

Amongst the Marsh Arabs, circumcision was often deferred to manhood and was done by specialists who travelled round from village to village, although Thesiger is disparaging about the technique and cleanliness of these practitioners. Often wounds became infected and took months to heal. Not unnaturally, there was some reluctance on the part of fathers to allow their sons to undergo this hazardous operation.

The operation was performed next morning in the open air with Kharibid sitting on a mortar and with a small crowd looking on. Unfortunately for Thesiger, the boy had an attached foreskin so his very first circumcision operation was not the most straightforward. Thesiger started to prepare a syringe to anaesthetise the area but Kharibid told him to "just cut it off" and couldn't be persuaded otherwise. He remained motionless during the operation and, at the end, just stood up and said: "Thank you."

After the operation was complete, the boy who had been assisting Thesiger himself sat down on the mortar and said: "Now it's my turn." With a shock, Thesiger realised that the nine boys standing round had all come to be circumcised – although boys is really a misnomer since the youngest was fifteen and the eldest twenty four. So Thesiger did as requested and operated on all of them.

By the time that Thesiger reached the next village, the news had spread and a score of boys were waiting to be circumcised. From then on, few of the people were willing to let the local specialists circumcise them. They preferred to wait until Thesiger visited their village, or they sought him out elsewhere. On one occasion, one hundred and fifteen turned up and Thesiger was hard at work from dawn until midnight. In The Marsh Arabs, there is a photograph of an Arab youth, naked except for headdress, sporting a clearly circumcised penis – witness, presumably, to Thesiger's skill.

Thesiger spent the final decades of his long life living among the Samburu of northern Kenya. Thesiger became embroiled in a series of disputes with local administration officials, particularly over them using a local witchdoctor to circumcise the young Samburu boys. As in Iraq, so in Kenya, the local practitioners caused pain and infection through their crude, unhygienic methods. When the officials took no action, Thesiger bypassed them and started undertaking the circumcisions himself.

Eventually, Thesiger became so frail that he had to return to England. But his heart was always with the native peoples whom he had befriended and who had befriended him. His attitude to circumcision was straightforward. He saw that it was an important rite to these peoples, he saw the butchering which they suffered for the sake of initiation, he knew this to be unnecessary and he took practical steps to ensure that the operation became the simple, relatively distress free ritual which he knew it should be. He is no doubt sorely missed by those amongst whom he lived for so long.

No Regrets

The first circumcised cock I ever saw was when I was about 6 at first school and stood next to a friend in the toilets. I asked him why his cock was different and he said he had to go to hospital and when he woke up that's what it was like. I remember saying to my mum about his willy being different and she just said some boys had to have that done.

I never saw another one until I was at middle school and we had swimming lessons. Out of a whole class there was only one cut guy. We never made fun of him and I must say that at that age I began to be fascinated by it.

It was when I reached secondary school that my eyes were really opened. Although still a minority there were cut guys a-plenty in the games changing rooms, and I got to see again that very first cut cock from first school. Andrew was loosely cut and the skin bunched behind his glans but all the cut cocks looked so much better and there began my desire to get cut.

When I was 19 I finally decided to do something about this. I had seen an advert for circumcision in the Sunday papers so wrote away for an information pack. It was being carried out by the Surgical Advisory Service – do they still exist? – at the Marie Stopes clinic in London. I paid my money and went for the op.

The doctor asked me various questions as to why I wanted this done and then examined me. He said everything was fine and off to the operating table I went. I found the injections very uncomfortable. but after that I never felt anything. At that time (14 years ago) I did not know anything about styles. All I knew was I liked cut cocks from the porno books I had seen and wanted one myself. The op did not take long. I was bandaged and checked over and that was it. I was a cut guy at last. As I walked back up Tottenham Court Road I wanted to tell everyone that I was cut!

The bandages stayed on for a couple of days and then came off. The stitches soon followed. I ended up unpicking and taking them out myself as I did not want skin tunnels. I was finally cut, but I was not pleased with the result. I had been cut by the freehand method, and although the left hand side was fine, not as much had been taken off the right hand side so when flaccid the right half of my glans would be slightly covered by bunched up skin. It was also very lumpy. I contacted the surgeon and went for a check up. He agreed it was not perfect and was very apologetic but he would not consider doing anything for a full year as he said the swelling and scar tissue had to fully go down.

A year later I was booked in for a revision. Again I found the injections the worst part. The revision did not take as long as the original op, and I have been left with a high and tight circ. The skin is not drum tight, but then some slight movement is good...well I think so, and also I don't want my balls half way up my shaft. I have a very prominent scar about an inch behind the glans and the difference in skin colour from the inner and outer skin is very clear to see. I know not everyone likes the ring scar but I really find it attractive.

In 2000 I had one final revision when I had a frenulectomy carried out by a Dr D'Silva in Luton. That took quite a while to heal, but he has done a great job. My frenulum was rather large but it is now a very thin line with no pulling whatsoever. It took a year of massage with vitamin E oil to reduce the hardness of the scar so that today nothing can be felt where I had my fren removed. I would ideally love to have the classic V cut where the fren is totally cut out from the glans. Perhaps one day...

I have never regretted having this done!

Deadlier Than The Male – Again

In the issue 5/2003, there was reference to the TV series of uro-genitary ops carried out by Miss Christine Evans (Deadlier than the Male). It prompted me to re-run an earlier video.

This lady is the Clarissa Dixon Wright of men's underpant department surgery who, also a year or two ago, gave us a splendid demonstration of surgery for Peyrone's disease. The patient then was a very public-spirited guy who was bravely prepared to have the nation view his bits in widescreen. Prior to the programme we were given a public health warning that some of the photography was explicit – all the more reason to watch it for we circ devotees. Would there be a sighting of his status? Surely they couldn't show the operation and hide that?

The film started with an interview with the couple in their middle forties who had suddenly found their love life seriously curtailed. The man's pecker had developed a constrictive fault about half way up and refused to inflate properly above it. The resulting 'bendy toy' was literally not up to the job.

His wife, rather an attractive if modest and shy lady, (who wouldn't be, in this situation?), confessed that they wouldn't be seeking treatment in the form of this risky op. if good sex had not been an important part of their relationship hitherto.

At the consultation with Miss E and when she pulled down the guy's jockeys it was gratifying to see he was, against the odds for his age group, nicely circumcised. No wonder his beloved found their intimacy pleasurable, I thought. I could also imagine more than a few puzzled women at home challenging their partners with: "Yours doesn't look like that?"

On the operating table it was explained that once the patient went under, they would connect his penis up to a saline pump to induce and maintain a good erection during the whole operation. And so it was. This brought his penis up to full screen for extended close up scenes during which we could see his circumcision was a nice tight version of the operator's art. The sort most of us would be proud to own.

In the background were three or four assisting nurses whose eyes above the face masks showed more than a passing interest. The lady in charge of the pump seemed to be enjoying her job. There was a male nurse with a large Polaroid camera taking pics as commanded by Miss Evans whenever she paused for this purpose – which she frequently did.

The next bit was not for the squeamish as Miss E quickly applied the scalpel all the way around just below the coronal rim. Rather indelicately she likened this to 'skinning a rabbit'. As she stripped the whole shaft skin down to the base, the arterial plumbing was revealed in one gory trunk of pipes and inflated flesh. It became worse as Miss E attacked the fibrous tissues causing the problem. There were audible 'cracks' as this was snapped off to give the underlying erectile parts the space and freedom to work that they had previously enjoyed.

When Miss E reached critical points she gave cautionary commentary about the danger of cutting vital nerves with likely permanent loss of function – not comforting for the patient who was having it all done under local. He was conscious but couldn't see anything (a mercy!). However the lady operator seemed very skilled and knowledgeable. Her manner suggested jolly abandon but I suspected that she was, under it all, a clever woman exercising great care. How else could you risk playing this show in front of the cameras.

Later we learned there was a happy and successful outcome as the film followed up. The only negative thing revealed at the inspection was that the penis appeared to have healed with a looser circumcision and the remaining foreskin was bunched at the rim. This may have been deliberate. When quizzed as to why she hadn't made the incision at the half way point where the problem was, she said her reasons were merely cosmetic. She said she had followed the line of the original circumcision which gives a much better cosmetic result. So under all that brusqueness is a lady who really cares about men.

I'd love to watch her do a circumcision as I suspect she is very pro (only a hunch). However I guess they would be hard put to spin out the surgery for fifty minutes viewing. Then again if they went into history and interviewed a lot of circumcised guys 'before and after', maybe not.

Let's hope.

But What's Best For His Brother?

On an internet discussion list recently, a mother told how, after some difficulty, she had arranged for her four year old son to be circumcised. She was delighted to report that the operation had been carried out successfully and without trauma to the boy. However, she had decided against circumcising her elder son, who had just turned 7. She felt that he was now old enough to remember the event well into adulthood, so it would be best for him to make the choice himself after he turned 18.

Some members of the discussion list questioned this decision. One said that, from experience, he knew that, when one brother was circumcised, it was highly advisable to get the other brother done as well, irrespective of age. Circumcision was one thing that could unite their brotherhood whereas one being different from the other could and had caused friction among some siblings.

Another member listed what he perceived to be the benefits of circumcision before the age of puberty:

- * At this age, the boy's interest in his sexual development increases, and the advantages of circumcision can be explained convincingly.
- * His penis and foreskin are larger than an infant's, allowing greater surgical accuracy.

- * The glans is free to develop fully during the adolescent growth spurt, unrestricted by foreskin, allowing a more bulbous glans to form.
- * The adolescent growth spurt may tighten the shaft-skin.
- * He already has experience of the advantages and disadvantages of a foreskin.
- * He can be told that circumcision is a preparation for the bodily changes of adolescence, including the greater need for cleanliness.
- * Healing is likely to proceed rapidly, less impeded by the powerful erections of puberty.
- * Circumcision can be promoted as a 'rite of passage' from 'boy' to 'man', bringing entitlement to respect.
- * The decision is covered by parental authority to give consent.
- * The matter is already up for discussion in the family, as a consequence of his younger brother's circumcision, and the elder boy can see that it is 'no big deal'.

A third member pleaded that the mother should not insist on waiting until the older boy reached 18. Now that his brother had been circumcised with little fuss, he might ask about it for himself. Furthermore, it was much easier and less of a disturbance to his life if he could be done before puberty. The mother should make sure that he knew that he could get circumcised at any time. A slightly more forceful reminder a short while before he changed schools at around 11-12 years old would be in order as this was probably the next best time to perform the operation.

It would be interesting to hear Acorn members' views on this subject. Leaving aside the question of circumcision at or soon after birth, if one son has to be circumcised in childhood, should any other sons be circumcised at the same time, or should they be left intact? And what about a step-son or an adopted boy brought into a family where his step brothers are circumcised? In other words, is uniformity or diversity best? Let's hear your opinions.

Boohbahs

I wonder if your members are at all aware of a range of children's toys, based on the Boohbahs, a television series. The toys are soft and come in a range of bright colours, each purporting to represent an individually named character. Most interesting of all, however, is the fact that each of these Boohbah's heads resembles a large glans penis complete with a roll of soft fabric that is exactly like a retracted foreskin. The head and plush prepuce look identical to the penis of an uncircumcised man! The 'neck' can even be rolled up or down to cover the dome-shaped head. The heads themselves look like nothing more than policemen's helmets. Me, I bought a purple Boohbah...

Editorial

The new Acorn website has been launched. For some years the Society has had a web presence but the URL (web address) was not intuitive and people tended to come across it only by chance. It was also very basic with a short 'mission statement' for the Society and an application form. In an information hungry world, the web is now the central information source and an internet search is the first recourse of information seekers. The Society needed to update.

We are grateful to Vernon for arranging the hosting of the site with its new, more obvious address – www.acornsoc.org.uk – and to GD for redesigning the site and rewriting the material in user friendly form. The site now has a more extensive introduction, a downloadable application form and taster articles from back issues of the newsletter. The site can and will be expanded in the future, not least by providing links to other relevant sites. But web maintenance can be a time-consuming business and there is no intention of duplicating the other circumcision/foreskin sites already in existence with their extensive archives of articles and photographs.

Acorn Society meets in Leicester

What better venue than the Cromwell Room for members of the Acorn Society, Cavaliers and Roundheads alike, to come together for their annual meeting. On the weekend of 26th-27th March, about 25 guys descended on the Ramada Jarvis Hotel in Leicester to share their mutual fascination with foreskins and circumcision. Some arrived on Friday evening and left on Sunday; others came just for the day. As with all events of this kind, the meeting was as much about informal chat at the bar and over dinner as about the formal proceedings.

The meeting proper took place on the Saturday afternoon, starting with Society matters. The Treasurer presented the accounts and the Society was shown to be financially sound with balances of over £2000. Recruitment was discussed; although renewals are at a high rate for 2004, the Society's long term survival depends upon recruiting new members. A budget was agreed and the Chairman and Treasurer were delegated authority to start a publicity campaign in cooperation with a couple of members who have offered help in this area. Future meetings were discussed. It quickly became obvious that the meetings are highly valued by the members and are, for them, an integral part of belonging to Acorn. The possibility of meeting twice a year was explored but a final decision was left until the next meeting in November. Ivan reported on the newsletter with which members seemed basically happy and Vernon talked about the development of the new Acorn website (see page 1).

The formal business having been despatched reasonably speedily, members broke up into informal groups to address the real business of the day – the discussion of foreskins and circumcision. It would be inappropriate to report these proceedings in detail for the whole point of this part of the meeting is to allow members to share in total confidence their experiences, hopes, fears, fantasies, questions, answers. For some, it was perhaps the first time ever that they had been able to discuss their interests openly in a sympathetic forum. Even for the veterans, it may have been their first conversation on the subject since the last Acorn meeting. The friendly, inclusive atmosphere meant that everyone soon felt at home, and groups formed and reformed naturally throughout the afternoon. For those wishing to browse the past, Vernon had brought all issues of the newsletter since the very first edition. Also on display was a TaraKLamp, although since it remained firmly within its cellophane package, one assumes that the same number of cavaliers left the meeting as arrived!

Guys fascinated by foreskins and circumcision have often in the past felt alone in their interest and therefore lonely. The value of the Acorn Society has been to bring such like-minded people together, to demonstrate that, far from being alone, they form part of a community diverse in age and background but united in interest and support for each other. For many, the newsletter is sufficient link into that community to sustain and stimulate interest; for others, the opportunity for actual conversation and debate is invaluable – long may the Acorn Society continue to facilitate this!

My Story

I heard of circumcision at an early age as I had a tender foreskin and my father did not have one at all. The (Jewish!) GP said he did not think it necessary for me to be done, so I wasn't.

I had a bush of curly pubic hair at the age of 11 before any other boy in my class and by the time I was 13 was indulging in mutual masturbation. I gradually extended my repertoire and at 19 was having sexual relationships with men usually several years older than me. This often included my taking an active role in anal intercourse. This puzzled me rather at first. Then one of them told me; my not overly big cock encouraged him to try something he had always been too scared to try. The rigidity of my erections was often commented upon too. For many years I had a very active gay sex life. Intercourse was not the be all and end all for me however. Seeing other people's bodies, kissing, fellatio, fondling and masturbation are equally valid. Long before AIDS I decided that wearing a condom was healthier and it also reduced the sensitivity of my foreskin; it was short, the skin was thin and easily hurt. It retracted itself on erection and sometimes got in the way. I wished I had been circumcised when a lad.

In my early 30's I was as randy as ever. I wasn't coming four times a day like I was at 16. But I made sure I did once a day, preferably with someone else. If not, I had plenty of porn mags (gay and straight given to me by a neighbour) to toss myself off with. He was bisexual and made me curious about losing my virginity with a woman. Eventually I met two couples where the husband was bisexual and enjoyed the threesomes (and occasionally foursomes with my neighbour) very much. I did not change my emotional and romantic attachment to men but I liked the contact of soft tits and vaginal intercourse compared with the hardness of the male body. The women and their husbands remarked too on the rigidity of my rod and the different feel of different cocks in their orifices.

To return to foreskins, my neighbour had a big fat cock but his foreskin did not retract easily and like so many men's cocks would have looked a lot better circumcised. I also had a relationship for several years with a colleague. He was short and stocky, good-looking, muscular and adventurous. His cock was big and beautiful with a very prominent vein down the middle. His foreskin was thick, long and ample and having had 'docking' demonstrated by another colleague, I showed him how to do it. It was easy to hold the glans of my erect cock under his capacious (and always very clean and tasty) foreskin. I could not reciprocate with my tight short one. He had a very good example of a foreskin that worked well, gave extra pleasure and was attractive to look at. It would have been criminal for him to be circumcised!

In my mid-forties, my foreskin gave me more and more trouble with inflammation. It became cut easily with intercourse even when I wore a condom. GUM clinics prescribed creams that had only a temporary effect. One specialist said that circumcision was too drastic. I was really fed up.

I heard that an acquaintance a little older than myself had recently been circumcised, so I went to see him. He had had the same problems as me and eventually was operated on through private medical insurance and was so much better. I decided to see my GP and assert my strong wish to be circumcised. He referred me to the local Urology Department and the young female Asian doctor immediately agreed to the operation. I was elated.

The operation was carried out in day surgery under general anaesthetic. Beforehand the two surgeons discussed with me what I wanted. I refused a local anaesthetic which I could have had in addition to the general; I did not like the idea of a needle in my manhood! I asked for the skin on my shaft not to be very tight – I wanted a little give in it. I was out for twenty minutes and came to in a small ward. My cock looked barely recognisable with the stitches, bruising and swelling. Not long after, I was padded and strapped up and taken home by a friend. The pain was negligible and I never had to take even an aspirin. The general anaesthetic took about three days to wear off and I enjoyed the long sleeps I had. After three days I took off the bulky dressings and strapping but a couple of days later I woke up in some pain with a hard-on. In the bathroom I discovered that I was bleeding somewhat, so I put on a new dressing for a couple of days more.

I never looked back. I was off work for a week and the walk to work, my first since the operation, was a bit painful but pleasurable so. I felt my knob rubbing against my pants. Since then I have been much more aware of my prick and get erections in my trousers more often and without any discomfort. I like its streamlined look when it is erect; when it is flaccid it is slightly bigger than before since it does not have a foreskin into which to retreat. Intercourse (even anal) is a pleasure not a pain: I should like some vaginally now and again. I can now masturbate in two ways – moving the skin of the shaft up and down or moving my hand over the skin of the shaft and knob. The latter creates some friction and is best done with a little lubrication with KY. For some time I have very much enjoyed using a vacuum developer. I'm not bothered about making my cock bigger, and its hardness and angle of erection have not altered since puberty. But the erection produced so quickly is intensely pleasurable, even more than with your own hand and your cock does expand more in the tube. You will want to delay ejaculation for quite a while. My circumcised cock delights in this treatment – I couldn't have done it before. Another side effect is that I don't have dribbles running down my leg after a piss. Before, I always drew back my foreskin and shook my cock but there were always some wayward drops.

So, I was circumcised – at the grand old age of 52! It made a difference to my sex life and my self esteem. Friends who have seen before and after like the result. I'm now 56 and semi-retired and find that I am fitter and need sex more often than when I was working full time. My circumcision has given me confidence to seek new adventures. I should welcome hearing from other members of their experiences, techniques etc.

Epilogue To Circumcision

As a new member of the Acorn Society, I have been following with interest the various views that have been expressed regarding its ethos, in particular whether it should be a society that promotes circumcision. I was also very happy to supply the three-part story of my circumcision. All is now revealed!

From the moment when I first discovered the glans lurking beneath my foreskin, through the period of experimenting with skin-backing to the permanent state, I had always hankered after a bare glans, a desire that seemed to be totally irrational. Now, having been circumcised, not because I felt an imposter, as has been suggested, but because I had been caught up in the fanaticism of pro-circ groups on the Internet, I also thought that sex might be better with a tight shaft skin. My enquiries of the various groups were met with replies such as “Sex will be a million times better!” and “You’ll never regret it!” and “You’ll wish you had had it done sooner.”

Well, after two year’s experience as a cut guy, I am just slightly disappointed, as I don’t seem to have reached the heights that were promised. I have a penis of which I am very proud, which looks better, which feels better when flaccid, and which is cleaner. And it works well, and I still get great pleasure from using it. But I miss very much the wonderful sensations that the stretch sensors in the foreskin used to give. The onset of an erection is less exciting, and I sometimes have to work so hard that my wife becomes sore before I reach a climax. I remember discussing this with the Doc when I went back for a frenulectomy, and his comment was that circumcision is best done before puberty, so that you don’t miss what you have never experienced.

If I could turn the clock back, I think I would still go ahead with circumcision, but it is not nirvana, neither should it be promoted as such. There can be no doubt that the effects of circumcision and the degree of satisfaction obtained from it will depend on many factors and will be different for every individual. It will depend on the tightness of the foreskin, its length, the relative sizes of glans and shaft, the sensitivity and age of the man. All of these parameters should be taken into account before making the decision to be cut.

My feelings now are that, despite what the Doc said about being cut before puberty, I found it an amazing experience, an experience that would be denied a man if he were cut as a baby. I am therefore not in favour of infant circumcision. But regarding adult circumcision, I think it should be considered very carefully and not rushed into with the impression that sex will be raised to unimaginable heights.

When I joined the Acorn Society, I was assured that it had a good mix of cut and uncut, gay and straight, shaved and hairy. This is the way it should remain, and it should not be allowed to degenerate into yet another pro-circ lobby. There should be no pressure one way or the other, so that we can all simply rejoice in the delight we gain from discussing, comparing – and using – our penises. Having read the most sensible and balanced article written by the Editor in issue 2/2003, I was somewhat taken aback by the bigoted and rather offensive article that appeared in the next issue. Let us keep Acorn as an open society, with members of all sexualities, some straight, some gay, some cut, some intact, so that nobody feels inferior and everyone is able to hold open and easy conversation.

Dave – Notts.

Comment on Dave's Story

Part three of the story of Dave's dick (issue 1/2004) made interesting reading, enhanced, I must add, by the photos. I would like to congratulate Dave on what I see is now a smooth, firm and very handsome cock. How does it feel to a red-blooded heterosexual to have another guy admire his cock...?

Feeling 'absolutely natural' is a curious, seemingly contradictory concept for one who has just had part of his cock removed, but I can somehow see what he means. I too take the view that a well-cut cock somehow looks more 'natural'. There must be a psychological reason for that somewhere. I look forward to the day also when, like Dave, I no longer have to choose between a covered or bare glans, and can lose that flap of skin which hides, and prevents from full development, potentially the most attractive part of a man's whole body.

The frank way that Dave assesses his post-op situation, including the short-comings, is laudable. I admire his conviction that, regardless of everything, circumcision was the right thing to do. It absolutely was, of course.

R.M. – Suffolk

The Cavalier Viewpoint

At the risk of reopening the debate, I take the Acorn year of 2003 as a representative sample over a representative period, and have to conclude that the magazine content has progressively moved towards the pro-circ lobby. There was just a solitary single paragraph item 'In praise of the penis' in issue 5. Nothing at all in issue 6 of a pro-foreskin view. Through the full six issues, I can identify only five pro-foreskin pieces, including mine in issue 2.

Amidst the bias furore in mid-year, a voice of reason and moderation emerged from David, our former long time editor. He put things into perspective with his original definition of Acorn as a group “interested in foreskins and circumcision” and for everyone “interested in getting their cock into the best possible shape” (presumably whether circumcised or not). His final observation was extremely telling: “had it not been for debate and simply a one subject group, it (Acorn) wouldn’t have lasted two years”.

I fear that this is exactly what is happening and that the debate is waning. Not just with the balance of articles in the magazine over which I accept our editor has no control, if content from the pro-foreskin lobby simply isn’t forthcoming. But more fundamentally, shouldn’t we be considering why the pro-foreskin lobby is increasingly poorly represented? Here I believe is where the subtle but very potent reason lies for Acorn as an organisation moving slowly but surely to a one subject, pro-circumcision group.

Of the five pro-foreskin items in the year, two were promptly rounded on and condemned – “We don’t want to read about smelly foreskins” was directed at Y.A., and R.B.W. then had a barrage of three condemning pieces in issue 3. After braving this for many years he has sadly thrown in the towel (an excellent way to do it with the book review in issue 3, also subsequently denounced of course). OK, it’s a viewpoint and obviously held by a majority in Acorn but if R.B.W. is pilloried for hating his circumcised state, what about the continuous torrent of “hated foreskin”, “repulsive elephant trunk”, “useless bit of skin”, and, in issue 6, “spared (by circumcision) the encumbrance of my anteater in sexual activity” – even more contentious but never, at least in the magazine, condemned or even criticised. Equally extreme, the steady stream of revision circumcisions and DIY circumcisions recounted in graphic detail. Anathema to me, but tolerated as a topic within David’s “group interested in foreskins and circumcision” definition. On the other hand, mention smegma, an equally valid topic within the definition, and “we don’t want to read about smelly foreskins” is the cry. Clearly what is sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. There is imbalance, but in reaction more than content – if you’re pro-foreskin you are either in possession of a smelly foreskin or rabidly anti-circumcision.

This situation must in time squeeze out contributions from, and subsequently membership of, confirmed cavaliers and any anti-circumcision lobby. “Good riddance” would certainly seem to be the verdict for R.B.W., from those who can’t stomach any strong but logically argued view opposed to their own.

Let me say: those in possession of a foreskin, sadly or not, are in the majority, and an increasing majority, and they have the more promising future. This is why perhaps, in contentment with their state, they don’t feel the need to argue their case. It’s argued for them by sheer weight of numbers of those intact, as nature intended, and enjoying all the benefits that it endows. My diminishing personal reason for remaining as a voice in the growing wilderness of Acorn is two-fold.

1. I am not anti-circumcision. Circumcision for religious reasons – OK. For the very few medical reasons, BXO but little more – OK. Even for so-called aesthetic reasons, including revisions and DIY – OK, but only if past the age of legal majority. Younger than this, an infant or boy is not mentally or sexually mature enough to make his own adult decision on circumcision in possession of all the facts. It is wrong for someone else, even his parents, to make that decision for him.

2. As a cavalier who had a foreskin problem – yes, a tight, overhanging anteat – and very nearly succumbed to misguided medical opinion and circumcision. With knowledge now proliferating on what can be done non-surgically, I have, albeit in middle age, cured the problem with dilation to stretch my foreskin. Even before this, I was aware of some of its benefits. Now I experience and enjoy the full package. Had this information, not discovered by me until a decade or so ago, been available 40 years ago, I could have enjoyed a more fulfilled sex life. I hope my successful non-surgical experience might encourage those younger with a similar tight foreskin (and I'm sure there are many) to correct the problem and preserve and enhance their foreskin benefits.

So my position is pro-foreskin, not anti-circumcision. I simply support the minimisation of unnecessary circumcisions. I won't reduce my argument for this case to an anti-circumcision rant even though some of the pro-circ lobby avidly resent this. In issue 3, JH says that he will be waving farewell to Acorn if it veers from being pro-circ. This is like the little boy taking his bat home if everyone doesn't play the game his way. As for those of us remaining in the pro-foreskin lobby, let me challenge the pro-circ lobby (nay, all members) to reread my piece 'Foreskin Benefits' in issue 2/2003 and, unlike when it first appeared, be prepared to make some observation, or better still, logically debate, contest or even agree with its content.

As our editor said when he took over, the worst thing is not criticism, but silence ... to which I add the rider – providing that the criticism is not totally destructive and has some worthwhile foundation and sound logic to it. I wait to see whether we still have healthy controversy and worthwhile debate in Acorn. Or may it just be that my list of foreskin benefits is complete and correct – Q.E.D?

F.S. – Derbyshire

1. Protection of the glans so it's kept sensitive and moist, and therefore much more receptive to the subtleties of foreplay, intercourse or masturbation.
2. It has "frenar bands" around the inner walls of its tip. These numerous nerve endings are supremely sensitive to heighten the sensations from almost every type of sexual activity.
3. It gives its owner flexibility. With full coverage, a man can retract partially, or totally to simulate a short foreskin or a circumcised state. Not possible, unfortunately, from the circumcised corner.]

Circumcised For Masturbating

I was circumcised on my fifteenth birthday – my mother said that that was my birthday present for that year. This was many years ago and some of the facts are forgotten, but others are as yesterday.

I was caught masturbating maybe a dozen times, always in my bedroom, in bed, pumping away. I always got a tongue-lashing for doing it and scolded that it was a very bad thing. I was warned of the dire consequences: my father would be told and then I would go to the doctor to straighten things out and stop the nonsense. Finally my mother took me to the doctor and had me cut in his office. I watched the whole procedure in horror. I was strapped to a steel table as he first cut the end off and the skin dropped down showing the meat underneath. It looked like a freshly opened can of Spam. Then the doctor used scissors to go around the head. I can remember the knife and scissors cutting. It hurt the worst when the skin underneath at the frenulum was finally severed. I don't remember any needles or anything but there could have been. It all took no time. Only the sewing took time and he didn't get the skin lined up perfectly – but it's OK. The penis was really swollen and black and blue for a week then it healed up in about 3 weeks so no bandage was needed.

It is a tight circumcision. I was left  $\frac{3}{8}$  of an inch of frenulum and about three quarters of an inch of foreskin on the top. I had to put a sock over the head as I kept getting erections from the chafing. I couldn't jerk off for about a year until a friend told me about Vaseline and I was back in business. I was warned that I would face worse consequences if I still tried to masturbate.

I had my two sons cut at birth and they see nothing to it. They like it and think that it is the normal way. My son has his own son cut. They cut him really tight so the balls come up the penis quite a way when he has an erection. He said he couldn't masturbate and he has just got married at eighteen! Too bad so young.

I have much interest in the subject and I am now very glad they did it to me as the women always loved my being cut.

Celebrity Circumcision – Richard Branson

(From an interview for the Daily Telegraph in March 2001 by Giles Brandreth)

Richard Branson's first marriage, to a 20-year-old American girl, Kristen Tomassi, didn't last long. According to Richard, they had "a bizarre sexual allergy to each other. Whenever we made love, a painful rash spread across me which would take about three weeks to heal. We went to a number of doctors, but we never resolved the problem. I even had a circumcision to try to stop the reaction. Being circumcised aged 24 is not a good idea, particularly if the night after your operation you find yourself watching Jane Fonda's erotic film Barbarella."

Remembering Thesiger – and T. E. Lawrence

The title 'Wilfred Thesiger R.I.P.' in the Contents of issue 1/2004 at once caught my eye, and I read the article with avidity. Thesiger was a really remarkable, not to say, unique man.

I have the American editions of the four Thesiger books: Arabian Sands (1959), The Marsh Arabs (1964), The Last Nomad (1979-80: British title Desert, Marsh and Mountain) – all published by E. P. Dutton, and The life of my choice (W. W. Norton 1987-88). I also have Marsh dwellers of Southern Iraq by Thesiger and Gavin Maxwell<sup>1</sup>, in the February 1958 issue of National Geographic magazine. I presume that the photograph mentioned in the article, of a naked circumcised youth, is the one printed as Plate 6 of the Dutton edition of The Marsh Arabs where it is captioned 'A boy from Qubar'. The same photo appears on p 207 of The Last Nomad; there it is captioned 'A boy of the Central Marshes'. However, in both cases the photo is so dark that the boy's genitals cannot be seen. I suspect that the publisher purposely had the prints darkened and the genitalia obscured. There are other nude photos in The Marsh Arabs, but none of them shows genitals.

There are several mentions of circumcision in Thesiger's first book Arabian Sands. For instance, on p 64 and Plate 17, there is fifteen year old Bin Anauf "a handsome youth with brooding eyes and a curious cock's-comb of hair, a sign that he was still uncircumcised". Cf The Last Nomad pp 43 and 78. On pp 91 and 92 of Arabian Sands, Thesiger describes an extreme form of circumcision (also described by Sir Richard Burton) in which not only the foreskin but the entire skin of the penis is removed.

In sharp contrast to such travellers as Thesiger, Charles M Doughty and (especially) Burton, T. E. Lawrence (of Arabia) seems to have ignored or sidestepped the topic of circumcision in his writings. I have collected writings by and about Lawrence since 1984, but so far I have found only one reference to circumcision, and it is a figurative and rather playful one. Writing to E. T. Leeds from Carchemish, Syria on 4 April 1914, Lawrence remarked: "Months since I wrote: – and now the circumcised are with us. You, O Leeds, cannot appreciate what a Cowley upon the Euphrates is..."<sup>2</sup>. The reference is to a visit to Carchemish by Sir Arthur Ernest Cowley (1861-1931), sometime Bodley's Librarian at the University of Oxford. The editor, J. M. Wilson, states in a footnote that "Dr Cowley was the world's leading non-Jewish authority on Rabbinic Hebrew Literature". Some have speculated that T. E. Lawrence himself was circumcised. It's certainly possible (he was born in 1888); but I have found no evidence of statements that he was cut or uncut.

Pearly Penile Papules

Pearly penile papules are pinhead-sized outgrowths arranged neatly in rows on the sulcus or corona of the glans penis. Sometimes mistaken for genital warts, they are in fact harmless and do not require treatment. They are not contracted or spread through sexual activity. Almost half of all men may have a few of these but they appear in abundance in perhaps up to 20% of men. Several studies have shown that they are twice as likely to occur in uncircumcised as in circumcised men.

In one study eight hundred and forty consecutive male patients were examined for the presence of pearly penile papules. The age and presence or absence of circumcision were recorded. Two hundred and fifty-three (30.1%) patients had lesions, and there was a significantly increased incidence of pearly penile papules in uncircumcised men. The incidence of papules was greatest in young adults and tended to decrease with increasing age.

Often, lesions cause great anxiety to patients until their benign nature is clarified. Even then, their presence can cause embarrassment since the man fears a negative reaction from potential partners when they are first seen.

One member of Acorn suffers from these papules and writes:

"I have a 'condition' which I have now learned is called Pearly Penile Papules. These white spots on the corona of my penis caused me such sexual anxieties as a young man that I elected to live a very sexually inactive youth. I saw a doctor about them years ago and he assured me they were 'normal' and harmless but to me they were a great source of embarrassment. I have now learnt not to let them be a reason for sexual inactivity. To be honest, few people have ever taken notice of them, or should I say have ever chosen to comment about them. In fact, there has been only one occasion when someone commented adversely about them in a sexual situation.

"At the moment, they are covered by my foreskin, and when I am erect, my foreskin sits neatly behind the corona, thus (sort of) hiding the little blighters. But if I were to be circumcised, they would be out there all the time! Without my foreskin there would be no hiding them! For me, their removal is a priority over circumcision. I know (because I have encountered these papules on two former partners) that during oral sex they can be felt by the tongue. I have three very prominent ones around the area of my frenulum and they can feel like grains of sand. All in all, this does not lead to great sexual confidence.

"I would so desperately like to be rid of these 'things' so that I have no fear of embarrassment over my penis. My research on the Internet has led me to believe from American websites that these papules can be removed successfully with the use of cryotherapy (sounds risky and painful) or laser therapy, but I cannot find an organisation that seems to offer these procedures in this country. Do you have any information about this that may be of assistance to me? Amongst your members, so to speak, is there anyone who had the same problem and has had a successful treatment?"

A Thirty Year Wait

As a new member, I do appreciate your forum on the subject of circumcision, especially as it affects one personally. Here in the USA, as I grew up, almost all my school mates were circumcised. My father thought it was some scheme to enrich the physicians. In the 1930's, people were out of work and not ordering babies. So my father argued that they were adding $50 circumcision fee to every boy baby to make up for the fewer births. He didn't think very globally. So while my older brother was circumcised, my younger brother and I were not. To make matters worse, my mother laughed about it a lot, calling this lone red-head her 'different' son.

I didn't have to be at Kindergarten long to have someone tell me my penis was funny looking as I stood at a urinal. Mom's solution was to hide. I found a way to go to schools that didn't have but one year of gym class instead of six and I paid my own way for this private education to avoid the embarrassments. I was a very handsome young man and everyone seemed to be looking for that defect in me.

Now, some are issued with foreskins that fit and some get extra, extra large that are unattractive even in Europe and the UK, I'm sure. In America, they are freakish! In the US army, at age 22, I had another soldier totally embarrass me in the shower room in front of about 20 other naked circumcised guys, asking about my 'stump'. Poor fool apologised profusely when he found out I was the C.O's clerk. I did find a time later at night to take my shower with fewer people. I remember being checked out of the US army with a large group of black men and in this circle, there was I, the only foreskin. It is not fun to look unusual there. All during this time I wanted to be circumcised but couldn't figure out how to get it done.

After my first son was born and circumcised, I showed up at a physician's office and asked about it. He treated me like I was truly weird and actually told me it was an issue that I would never get over. Perhaps he was prophetic. He sent me to a urologist who kept me overnight in hospital and did it under general anaesthetic. He left it with more skin on one side so it could be 'winking'. He also left a stitch that appeared as a bump for about 20 years before I had it removed by another surgeon. Should have had it all straightened out that day.

One of my swim chums actually called my asymmetry to my attention one day although he still has all of his foreskin. As a daily swimmer, I still see men who have their foreskins who are very careful to dress as privately as possible. I know that they were affected as I was as the odd man in so many situations. It is a selfish parent that does not think of the community that a boy will grow up in. My father supposedly said: 'Let them wear it off as I did.'

I have two grandsons. Only one is circumcised as the Mom couldn't bear to see the other done. Of course, she didn't grow up in a boys' locker room. In the US, women get a lot of privacy and expect that men get the same. I'm still working on that case lest he feel he's the odd man somewhere. Of course, in the US, there's a move to circumcise less, promoted by health insurers and some liability cases such as my daughter-in-law reported about a micro-penis accidentally circumcised causing a big problem for an already big problem. I wish that I had never had to give it a second thought. I do know that I have had 30 years of much better sex after 30 years of tearing of foreskin and pain at every intercourse. Yes, I really was a good candidate for circumcision and you can't wear it off, dad.

I encourage any man who wants to have this minor operation to go for it. You have nothing to lose but a piece of skin which often causes problems. You'll look better and feel better about yourself. Find a doctor that does it often!

Synechotomy – An Alternative To Circumcision?

Synechotomy, Yes; Circumcision, No. That's the message of the distinguished Mexican physician, Professor Straffon. He is a paediatric surgeon who has spent much of his working life studying the male prepuce. His conclusion is that circumcision is not only unnecessary, it is positively damaging. He believes that the foreskin has multiple protective functions – from embryo through to old age – and that it plays an important role in sexual reproductive activity.

However, Professor Straffon does support the practice of synechotomy and he has been promoting this for over forty years. The purpose of synechotomy is to free the adhesions between the foreskin and the glans and then to stretch and retract the foreskin so that the glans can be fully exposed. This should be done at about the age of three months. Adhesions, Professor Straffon believes, are used by medical practitioners as an indication for circumcision, especially in the United States. Removing adhesions cures the problem whilst preserving the foreskin.

Professor Straffon advocates performing the procedure in a single operation, always using synechotomy forceps. These enable the adhesions to be separated, the opening of the prepuce to be expanded with gentle dilation and the foreskin to be fully retracted back from the glans. There are no probes, nor rough or repeated manual handling. The process is easy, quick (10-20 seconds), undamaging, non-mutilating, and almost painless. After the operation, a cream or ointment containing a powerful anaesthetic, a non inflammatory steroid, and an antiseptic should be applied to the area for a period of at least 10 days.

Synechotomy is important not only in preserving the prepuce, but also in the provision of hygiene in the uncircumcised. Retracting and stretching the prepuce while urinating and during bathing – even in pre-school children – to expose the glans of the penis helps produce early a lifetime habit of genital hygiene. Professor Straffon likens synechotomy to vaccination or immunisation as a measure to prevent future illness. Synechotomy avoids problems such as balanitis, phimosis, smegma, cysts and paraphimosis. It has the same prophylactic advantages as circumcision without the mutilation caused by that operation.

By means of synechotomy, many Mexican and Latin American little boys have been spared prepuce excision, and have been able to learn correct early genital hygiene that was previously unknown in uncircumcised children. Professor Straffon insists that presently there is no scientific evidence to circumcise a child or adolescent, if such boys have been taught early genital hygiene after synechotomy.

Of course, synechotomy goes against the current received wisdom that adhesions should not be forcibly broken but that the foreskin should be allowed to develop naturally, at least over the first five or six years of life, by which time, in most cases, it will be fully retractable. However, the operation does hark back to an earlier era. In those days, if a baby boy had not been circumcised, the mother was encouraged to ease back the foreskin gently and gradually at each bath time. But if sufficient progress had not been made over the first few weeks of life, the doctor or clinic nurse would then separate the adhesions by forcibly pulling back the foreskin, often to the severe discomfort of the baby.

It is unclear whether Professor Straffon advocates permanent retraction of the foreskin where this can be achieved. If the foreskin is permanently retracted from an early age, its full development may well be inhibited, resulting in a short foreskin. Many would see this as the ideal solution – a permanently exposed glans but with a residual foreskin retained to add sensitivity during sexual activity.

On one of the fathering internet discussion boards, a father strongly recommended the procedure:

“I advise parents of boys with unretractable foreskins to submit them to synechotomy, as an alternative to circumcision. My sons were treated with synechotomy at the age of six months and they have been taught since early childhood to wear their prepuces retracted. They have never had smegma nor a sensitive head. This practice is very healthy and aids the correct growth of the penis and the glans in puberty. The constant push of the rolled skin behind the head makes the edge of the glans more prominent, which then impedes the prepuce from going forward. However, if after puberty, the foreskin is too long for it to remain retracted, I then recommend circumcision.”

Foreskin Covering

More on Jewish Circumcision

Anthony in his piece ‘No Taking The Michael’ (issue 6/2003) claims that in Biblical times, Jewish circumcision consisted of the excision of just the protruding tip of the foreskin. With all due respect, I believe that even before the times of Judas Maccabees (at around 140 BC) circumcision almost certainly resulted in a completely exposed glans. While it is well known that circumcision methods changed at that time, and the tearing of the remainder of the inner foreskin was introduced, it is also well known that this change was introduced to make ‘foreskin restoration’ impossible, which was attempted by many Jews in order to fit into the non-circumcising Hellenistic environment, for example at the public baths or the gymnasia. If the ancient method of circumcision had not resulted in an exposed glans, which made the Jews when naked unmistakably recognisable, the Jews would not have wanted to hide their circumcision before the Greeks, and the whole problem would not have existed.

I have one more argument proving that the ‘original’ method of Jewish circumcision had indeed resulted in a completely denuded glans.

Circumcision (or the equivalent surgery of the penis) evolved separately in most hot climate areas of the world. The motivation behind it was, most probably, a mixture of practical observation and spiritual beliefs. A tight and unretractable foreskin carries the risk of serious infections and inflammation, especially in a hot climate, and especially if the foreskin is very long. In addition, a too long and tight foreskin would hamper proper intercourse and thus procreation, which would result also in a deadly danger, the ending of the community. The bare glans is also a symbol of manliness and genital power, which is why circumcision is often a rite marking the passage to manhood.

Consequently, the denuding of the glans was introduced in all communities which lived in hot climates. The process was most often the removal of the foreskin, but sometimes it was made by a long dorsal slit of the foreskin, which also resulted in a bare glans, with the remains of the split foreskin hanging down on either side. (The most unusual way of denuding the glans is the buttonhole technique, used by the Masai in Kenya, whereby they make a vertical slit in the foreskin, like a buttonhole, then pull the glans through it.)

In contrast, circumcision was not introduced in communities in cool climates (most of continental Europe and Asia), among people which had quite short foreskins (in South East Asia), or had constant problems with overpopulation, such as the Greek communities of the Eastern Mediterranean. Men of oriental races (Japanese, Chinese, Viet, etc.) grow quite short foreskins, and they are expected to keep the foreskin pulled back behind the glans after puberty, so they do have a bare glans. (A short foreskin held pulled back is almost indistinguishable from a loose circumcision!) It is well-known that the ancient Greek cities had a constant problem of overpopulation, due to the lack of space and the lack of enough food. (You just have to look at the map of Greece and the Greek archipelago: high mountains, few arable lands and the sea all around the place.) Birth control was a great problem then, and it resulted in a rule requiring men not getting married before turning 30. I suspect that the institutional pederasty (in its original meaning, sexual encounter or at a least petting-type of thing between mature men and juveniles) was also part of the birth control rules, as was 'infibulation', the use of a leather strap to keep the foreskin long and tight (as it very clearly appears on Greek sculptures, vases etc.)

The Israelites (the people of Abraham) were one of the nomadic peoples of the Middle East, along with the Arabs (more precisely, their ancestors), living in a hot climate, with a constant problem of not enough people at hand. Circumcision there was introduced probably ten thousand years ago, and to serve its purpose, it must have involved the complete denuding of the glans, as it is the essence of the process. The ancient method, applied also by the Israelites (Jews), must have been the pulling ahead of the skin, as far as possible, and cutting it right before the glans. Naturally, the glans was protected with some device, such as a piece of wood. After the cut, the remaining skin was pushed back and the wound bandaged. The result is a 'high' circumcision, which can be loose or tight, depending on the amount of skin cut off, but the glans is bare, with more or less skin bunching up behind it.

In the past centuries, circumcision was introduced in several regions in which the climate and other circumstances would not have made it inevitable. The spread of Islam is one of the major factors, but I suspect that in most areas where Islam has become the main religion (Middle-East, parts of Africa) circumcision was already practised. In Western Civilisation, most notably, in the English-speaking parts of it, circumcision was introduced mainly on preventative medical grounds, which are now receiving more and more support from medical research projects.

Editorial

This is an issue of contrasts. We start by looking at those guys amongst us who are so committed to being fully circumcised that they have undergone a second cut. And there is another group of members queuing up behind them to travel down the same route. At the other end of the spectrum, Smurf tells us how he tended Ashley's phimotic foreskin, originally destined for the surgeon's scalpel but now in full working order.

We go to Scotland to hear JT's story – he had to come south to get his circumcision. Does anyone know whether elective circumcisions are available north of the Border? And then to Hungary where Andras tells us that circumcision is becoming increasingly popular, so much so that Andras runs a Hungarian equivalent of the UK Circlist mailing list.

And as ever there is a note about celebrity status. David Beckham's status remains elusive even after the allegations of his affairs and his triumphs and disasters in Euro 2004. However, perhaps the attention has now shifted to Wayne Rooney. But with his background he can't be anything but uncut...can he? Next issue it will be the artist Damien Hurst who is uncovered.

Second Time Around

Most uncut men blanch at the thought of undergoing circumcision. How is it then that there a number of men who line up to be circumcised not once, but twice, or even more? Out of the current subscribers to Acorn, 84 are circumcised and, of those, 20 have undergone at least one revision circ. It's obviously a matter of interest as to why these guys underwent the knife a second time and I therefore invited members who had had a revision operation, or who were considering one, to complete a questionnaire. Thirteen questionnaires were completed, seven by guys who had already undergone revision, six by guys who were seriously considering it.

First interesting fact. Of the thirteen in the sample, twelve were circumcised as adults. Is it perhaps that when one is cut as an adult, one has expectations as to what the results will be, whereas if one is circumcised in infancy or childhood, one accepts the penis as you have always known it? Three of the first circumcisions were carried out for medical reasons – phimosis, balanitis, very sore foreskin. A further three were carried out for medical reasons but there were also aesthetic motives. Perhaps the medical conditions were used as an excuse to fulfil a wish to be circumcised? The remainder were all elective – for aesthetic or other reasons.

First circumcisions usually resulted in the glans being exposed in a flaccid state but with some foreskin remnant bunched behind the glans. In two cases the glans was still partially covered. On erection, in three cases there was still bunching behind the glans; in the remainder, the glans was fully exposed but there was slack in the shaft skin. The frenulum was left untouched in all but two cases. The style of cut varied: 50% high, 50% low (where high is arbitrarily defined as having at least one inch of inner foreskin left).

The guys who have had a second cut must obviously have been dissatisfied with their first circumcision. Why? One member put it very succinctly: "I wanted the glans completely exposed." This seems to sum it up for most of the others although they were more explicit about the finish achieved: "Skin bunching"; "Too much shaft skin left"; "Sometimes loose skin would almost half cover the glans"; "Too much foreskin left on". Even though only one out of seven had the frenulum removed on the first cut, none of the other second timers quoted the retention of the frenulum as a defect of the first circumcision. Nevertheless, three had it totally removed on the second cut, and one partially. Perhaps the frustration after the first cut of not having the glans exposed subsumed disappointment that the frenulum remained. As one guy said: "Having seen photos where the glans rim was fully exposed, I decided to have a radical revision performed to ensure that the glans rim and groove would be exposed even when completely flaccid." Such aspirations were only likely to be achieved with a complete frenulectomy.

The second cuts all resulted in low cuts – one guy was left with  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch of inner foreskin, everyone else with much less. High and tight was obviously just a dream for these guys – but perhaps too much inner foreskin had been removed first time to allow a high finish. So, did they at least get the tight finish they craved? Not completely by any means. Four guys now have a drum tight shaft skin when erect, with three of them fully exposed when flaccid with no bunching. Of the other three, the glans is fully exposed when erect although there is still some slack in the skin; when flaccid, there is still a foreskin remnant bunched behind the glans. Tightness of finish did not appear to be related to growth on erection. Of the drum tight, no bunching group, expansion on erection varied from 50% to 75%; of the others, expansion varied from 42% to 66%.

So how did these seven stalwarts feel about their revision after the event? The picture is very positive. Six out of seven agreed or strongly agreed that the appearance of their penis had been improved when flaccid, and all seven agreed, five strongly, that the erect penis also looked better. For two guys, sensitivity of the glans had increased, one was neutral and in the other four sensitivity had decreased, although for at least one, beneficially so. Masturbation was more pleasurable for virtually everyone. There was even stronger agreement that oral sex and sexual intercourse were more pleasurable.

Psychologically, the revision had also had an effect. Everyone agreed that they were more confident as a person after the revision, two very much more so, whilst everyone was more willing to appear naked before men. The response about being naked before women was more equivocal, possibly because several of the respondents were gay! And most would be willing to undergo the knife again if necessary. Two are actively considering this – to tighten up the shaft skin and to remove any remnants of frenulum. As one said: “If needed, I would love to have it done again. It was great and no pain at all.”

So it appears that the revision operations were a great success, the only complaints being where the cut was not sufficiently radical. One member summed up his feelings: “I love the fact that my glans is totally exposed even when flaccid; and the exposure of the groove where the frenulum was has really increased sensitivity there. I just like the fact that anyone who sees me naked, knows immediately that I’ve been circumcised, there is no way that I can hide the fact or change the fact, and there is no way that I would want to.”

For those considering a second cut, they are largely seeking a final result where, flaccid, the glans is fully exposed with no bunching behind the corona; erect the majority are looking for a drum tight finish although two wish to retain some slack in the shaft skin. One guy is nervous about being cut too tight: “I once saw a man who had an extreme cut, which was so tight the head had lost most of its shape due to stretching and it looked and felt awful.”

After 1st Circ.

1 Mo After Re-circ

Most received a low cut on their first circumcision so do not have a lot of inner foreskin to lose second time around – but this does not seem to be a matter of concern. But where the frenulum still exists, all want it to go.

If they get the cut they want, all agree, most of them strongly, that the appearance of their penis will be improved both when flaccid and when erect. They don't really expect any change in the sensitivity of their glans but they believe in general that masturbation, oral sex and intercourse will all be more enjoyable, though a minority expect no change. Half the guys expect the operation to increase their confidence as a person and make them more willing to appear naked in front of other men.

From the experience of those who have already had a revision, the expectations of this second group are entirely reasonable and they should feel able to go ahead with confidence. How likely in fact are they to proceed? One person is looking to have it done immediately, four others within five years and the last sometime in the future. What is inhibiting them from going ahead? Cost appears to be the main problem, coupled with the difficulty of finding a surgeon and the fear of poor results. Value for money is always relative. But with people like Dr Zarifa openly advertising revision circumcisions on his web site and with excellent reports from many pleased customers, anyone who can rustle up £700 and can get to London is likely to achieve their wishes. As one satisfied customer wrote: "I am writing to thank you for the re-circumcision you performed on me just over three weeks ago. Everything has healed perfectly and I must say I can now appreciate what an excellent job you did."

For most men, once is enough (for some, more than enough). But for those who feel dissatisfied with the appearance of their circumcised penis, revision is an option that appears to work on all fronts. Obviously the message is: "Go for it!"

Resignation

After much thought, and a degree of sadness, I have decided to resign from Acorn and will therefore not be renewing my membership for the coming year.

There are a number of reasons for this but the main one is that I am very pro-circumcision and feel that Acorn is no longer for me while it represents men who wish to retain their foreskins as well as those who do not. If in the future, Acorn decides to be a pro-circumcision group, I would most certainly be interested in rejoining. There really are far too many 'NORM' type organisations around these days and the pro-circ lobby should, in my view, be better represented – a position Acorn could and should ideally fill. In my view, especially with a huge majority of members according to your survey being cut, it is time for Acorn to come off the fence.

After some ten years of membership, I feel that the articles are these days rather similar in content to those of the past – and some a complete turnoff for me when they discuss in detail what I consider to be a useless piece of flesh!

Ashley – A True Story!

It was early summer, about two years ago (2002), when I met Ashley for the first time. He was just seventeen but, due to an under-active thyroid gland, he looked to be about twelve, and was actually shorter than me! Being only five foot five myself, this made him just a tad over five feet tall. He was introduced to me via a 'text message' by a friend of mine who also knew him. I was told that he was probably gay, but had trouble making friends due to his unusually small stature and slightly effeminate ways. At the time, it was intended that I just became his friend, being that there was a considerable number of years between us and he understandably seemed to be looking for someone around his own age. I accepted this fact without question, happy to have a new friend locally who shared the ridicule I had suffered due to my distinct lack of height!

After a quite lengthy session of 'texting' each other, we finally arranged to meet up that evening. I offered to take him for a drive out to Herne Bay as I knew of a nice place to buy a takeaway there and we could sit on the beach to enjoy a good chat. It was during our little moonlit snack that I happened to mention a caravan which I owned. He showed great interest as I explained how well stocked up and equipped it was, including electricity etc.

"So how far is it from home?" he inquired.

"Not that far at all actually. About ten miles or so." I told him.

"Maybe if it's not too late, and if you don't mind, we can pop by there on the way back?" he asked enthusiastically.

"Sure! If you really want to see it then I would be only too pleased to show you around," I happily agreed. So there it was, my first real indication that he genuinely liked, and clearly trusted, me. After all, you wouldn't ask to be taken somewhere private like that unless you did trust the person you were with. I still knew that he was really after someone his own age and figured I would just take things as they came, not wanting to spoil a possible friendship by appearing at all forward. We eventually finished our food, then I drove us back to the yard where my caravan was sited.

The drive there was a strange thrill in itself, with me frequently noticing the subtle and flirtatious glances I was getting from Ashley as we drove along listening to the car stereo. Not a word had been spoken about relationships or sex, but the whole journey seemed full of that unexplainable feeling that things were going exceptionally well.

When we arrived at the caravan I gave him the 'Grand tour' of the site, thoroughly explaining what, and where, everything was. Before long we were both sat comfortably inside and an even stronger sense of undeniable mutual attraction flooded over me. I suddenly felt a little awkward and didn't know quite what to say or do next.

"Drink?" I casually asked, with an obvious hint of embarrassment.

"No thanks, I'm just fine as I am," he answered, smiling nervously and looking straight into my eyes. I hardly noticed his actual answer as his young eyes seemed to pierce right through mine and reach inside me. This was the look which confirmed all my feelings thus far, as now I was certain that our relationship was to be something considerably more than 'just good friends'.

Well I am sure that you have now guessed that the inevitable did, indeed, transpire that night. Interestingly, however, it was during those first intimate moments together that I discovered something about Ash that would ultimately bring us even closer. The knowing looks led to him resting his head on my shoulder.

"I like it here. Can we stay a bit longer?" he asked.

"Certainly! We can stay as long as you like Ash," I told him. I rested my head gently on his and I felt his hand go around my back to pull me closer. One thing instinctively led to another and soon we were hugging and kissing each other quite passionately.

We soon found ourselves stripped off, totally naked, and in each other's arms kissing again. As the impulsive situation naturally progressed, our busy hands explored each other's naked bodies and inevitably ended up with some intimate fondling. His penis, as you might expect with his thyroid problem, was notably small and modest looking. However, he quite clearly knew what it was for and had no problem in making it stand rigidly to attention, long before we even got undressed as I recall! It wasn't until I attempted to gently retract his foreskin that I realised there was a slight problem.

"Mine won't do that," he said, disappointedly.

"Yes, I can see that!" I replied, noticing how incredibly small and tight the opening was.

"My mother has told me it needs to be circumstised," he went on.

"You mean circumcised? For a little bit of phimosis?" I said with horror.

"Yes, that's it. I will have to go into hospital and have it done," he calmly explained. My mind filled with thoughts of pure repulsion at the very thought of mutilating such a beautiful and natural looking appendage.

"But there's no need to have it all chopped off, just because it's a little bit tight! Do you realise that you will be losing the most sensitive piece of skin on your whole body, and the normal mechanics of your cock will never again be possible, like, for ever!?" I exclaimed. He looked a little shocked at my adverse reaction to his statement but seemed quite intrigued by my knowledge in this area.

"No!" he said, "I had no idea it was that important. But that's the only way to cure it," he added.

"No it isn't the only way, in fact, it's almost never necessary to remove any skin at all! At worst you only need a small cut here." I said, pointing to where a small dorsal cut may, in a few extreme cases, be necessary.

"So what else can be done then? I've never been able to pull it back at all."

"Not even in the bath, when it's completely soft?" I quizzed.

"No, not really. Well, maybe a tiny bit, but not like you can with yours," he said as he inquisitively pulled my foreskin right back behind the flange and stared admiringly at my exposed and shiny glans.

"But Ashley, mine was like yours once, and the doctor advised my mother to have me circumcised. But she wouldn't allow it to go ahead. So, the doctor advised her how best to try and alleviate the problem more naturally," I explained.

"Go on, what did you have to do then?" he asked enthusiastically. I could tell that he didn't really want to be circumcised at all and had only adopted such a casual attitude in the belief that it was the only option. Now I had given him hope of a possible alternative and his hunger for that knowledge was plainly evident. I started to explain what had been told to my mother, which she, in turn, had told to me.

"First of all I need you to clearly understand the difference between 'discomfort' and 'pain'," I started to explain to him. "Then you must accept the fact that there will need to be a great deal of 'discomfort' involved in remedying your problem, but never should there be any real 'pain'. This will only be for brief, but regular, periods of time and eventually you should be cured for ever and still have your totally natural dick intact," I told him.

"Well can you show me what to do and how to do it then?" he asked, anxiously.

"Of course Ashley, I would be happy to," I said, and before I knew it I was 'Doctor Dave' as far as Ash was concerned. I liberally applied my preferred lube all around the tip of his erect penis, a physical state which was more common than the flaccid state in the case of young Ashley! My own treatment, initially carried out by my mother many years ago, used Vaseline to soften and lubricate the skin. But I was not keen on it being so greasy and messy, so I chose to stick with the much favoured water soluble varieties. I only use 'Sensilube' by Durex for my slippery needs, not KY jelly as many of you might expect. It has a consistency extremely close to natural precum and does not dry into unpleasant lumps and flakes like KY often does. That said, it is the perfect lube for me and, along with the occasional use of fresh cum, both were to prove invaluable in Ash's 'home treatment' course.

I showed Ashley how to carefully tease back his tight foreskin to the point where great discomfort bordered with the beginnings of pain. This was hardly any distance at all to begin with and the urethral opening, or meatus, was about all he could reveal before the pain started. The positioning for these subtle differences of physical sensation was achievable by the tiniest of movements and he seemed to grasp the concept of this very quickly indeed. By using plenty of lube, whilst stretching and holding the preputial opening to this newly discovered threshold for a few moments, it very quickly became evident that this procedure was really working. He also realised that any discomfort experienced during this stretching action completely disappeared as soon as the foreskin was released and allowed to return to its natural resting position. In fact, he told me that it actually had a very pleasant tingly sensation for several minutes after each session and there was no pain or discomfort whatsoever! I was obviously very keen for this to be a great success, but never allowed things to go too quickly and risk his tight foreskin becoming dangerously stuck behind the flange of his glans, or 'paraphimosis'.

Over the next few days we developed a kind of routine, which involved a little bit of stretching, followed by wonderful sex and a little more stretching after that. The second sessions of stretching were always the most productive as I would often substitute some lube with our fresh cum. (An advantage of this was that the sperm and semen mixture actually helps to soften and relax the skin. These useful properties are quite well known and documented, not to mention the obvious erotic benefits!) This went on, sometimes several times, for about three or four weeks until we suddenly had a wonderful surprise.

It was evening time and we had taken an early night to listen to music and, well, you know what else! Having stuck to our little 'routine' we had enjoyed sex and I was embarking on the second session of stretching. He had now learnt how to perceive the various levels of discomfort, and how to convey them accurately to me as I worked on his phimosed foreskin. Admittedly, it did feel particularly soft and supple that night and things seemed to be going very well indeed. I managed to retract it to the furthest point achieved so far without any problem or report of discomfort. As this was almost all the way back already, there was not much more required to actually breach the glans completely and achieve full retraction. I applied a little more 'natural' lube and continued to gently draw it back whilst being personally guided by Ash's prompts. Suddenly, his foreskin slipped behind the flange of his engorged glans and I looked to see his reaction.

"Does that not hurt?" I asked him, somewhat anxiously.

"No, not at all. How far is it back now?" he enquired.

"Err, all the way back Ash!" I told him.

"No! Not yet surely?" he exclaimed, looking down at my proud achievement.

"Yup, all the way back mate. How does it feel?"

"Fine, totally fine considering this is the first time in my life that I have ever actually seen that part of my own dick!" he said, ecstatically.

“Well there it is mate, in all its natural glory!” I proudly announced. And yes, there were a few minor deposits harbouring unpleasantly beneath, but these were easily removed and his newly exposed penis tip keenly experienced its first human cleaning action, namely by me!

After that, I was a little worried that we may have trouble returning his foreskin, but with another liberal dousing of lube, and a little persuasion, it suddenly slipped back over the glans with no problem. From then on it got easier and easier to fully retract his foreskin and eventually it was performing perfectly normally. Ashley could now experience penile pleasures which, hitherto, he had not even known were possible.

We stayed together for a few months and his problem never came back. Eventually, with my busy and antisocial work life, we stopped seeing each other and he did find somebody of around his own age. We parted on good terms, both wanting to remain friends and, two years on, his doctor has agreed that there is no longer any need for the operation. It's a great pity that he, and countless other medical practitioners, did not suggest this kind of treatment first, instead of just saying “chop it off”. Surely a few days, weeks or even months, of this self treatment are infinitely better than just having it removed!? I understand that in certain cases, such as extreme paraphimosis or recurring balanitis, part, or even full, circumcision may be the only answer. But these instances are incredibly few and far between, which means a great number of these operations are not necessary at all. So the old saying of “No pain, no gain!” rings true once again and I feel proud to have saved this most wonderful piece of skin from the surgeon's knife.

I am sure you have now worked out that I am most definitely against cutting. So here are my personal, and quite sensible I hope, reasons for my particular way of thinking.

Routinely circumcising babies at birth is, in my view, a wholly barbaric and unnecessary abuse of their human rights, and I only wish that this would stop, immediately! I know the argument of not experiencing pain at that age, and less trauma with better healing, but why do it in the first place!? The greater bulk of the world (excluding religious reasons) don't do it and manage perfectly well, and have done for millions of years! So why do it when there is no real need to (apart from selling the removed foreskins to American pharmaceutical and cosmetic companies for product testing! – Yes, that does happen!)? So, why not cut a baby's fingers off at the same time? That way they could never get them burnt or injured. Oh, and remove the whole penis and testicles, just in case they get infections or cancer! It's a stupid argument in my view and, having delved deeply into both sides, I still cannot justify it in my mind, or in my heart. The main point is that it can be done later in life if required, despite the loss of slight healing advantages described earlier. But, and most importantly, it cannot be put back if the person grows up and decides that they do want a foreskin. Somebody else, for whatever reason, has taken that choice away from them, and that is fundamentally wrong in my eyes.

Ok, so a cut cock is supposed to be cleaner and more hygienic. Don't pro-cutting people ever wash their dicks then!? All it takes is a quick rinse with clean water and the body's natural cleansing mechanism will take care of it perfectly well in between times. Smegma, far from being a dirty and smelly secretion, is now recognised as being one of the cleanest and most biologically beneficial substances known to man! Its natural ability to fight off germs and many infections, whilst simultaneously moisturising and protecting the inner foreskin and sensitive glans, is second to none. The only time that it becomes a little unpleasant or objectionable is when the owner does not wash regularly, thus allowing it to build up and start to smell. So getting cut for that reason is just plain lazy if you ask me! The aforementioned glans are not supposed to be exposed to the elements in any case and they suffer major keratinisation and great loss of sensitivity as a result. The complete loss of the natural mechanics of an intact penis is another thing I could never accept. I appreciate that not every intact male experiences this sensual marvel of natural movement but, for those that do, it is truly a wonderful sensation that virtually eliminates the unpleasant 'friction' problems that both men and women suffer during sex with a cut guy. If a good reason to get cut is to deliberately reduce sensitivity and prolong your performance as a result, then shame on you! Personally, I would rather train myself to last longer, which I have done with great success, and learn how to do it more than once!

I am aware of the HIV/AIDS argument too, where the inner foreskin has been proved to increase the chances of infection, and circumcision undeniably reduces that risk. But using that to justify getting cut can lead to a degree of complacency, and thus, increased exposure, which ultimately raises the risk of possible infection again. It will not stop you catching HIV, and most certainly will not stop you passing it on to a sexual partner. So you still need to wear protection, which makes you no better off than a guy who is uncut!

Also, of course, there is the element of 'personal choice' and, although I cannot imagine why anyone would actually choose to be cut, I firmly believe that it is everyone's right to make that choice. Although I do believe that before deciding they should be fully in possession of all the 'for' and 'against' facts on both sides so that they can best make that judgement themselves.

Well that's my little story, which I assure you did happen, along with some of my personal views and opinions on this very emotive subject. Of course, I do not intend to offend or upset any of you 'pro-cut' readers, but I think it's good to hear opinions from 'the other side' occasionally, and I am sure that much of what I say does make sense. I trust this is of interest to the 'like-minded' readers also, and look forward to any comments from both sides of the fence. At the end of the day, I wish everyone good health and happiness, hoping you accept that this is just my personal view and respecting the fact that I have chosen to share it with you all.

A Scottish Story

I was born in Edinburgh in 1953. I would describe myself as bi-sexual but I have never had penetrative sex with a male. I have however enjoyed the company of many young men over the past half century and have enjoyed mutual masturbation with them. I view the male body as a thing of great beauty which can be improved in only one way – by circumcision.

I was not circumcised at birth but my interest in the subject began when I was about six. I was staying with my grandmother – it must have been about 1960. Her sister, my great-aunt, who lived in Canada, was visiting and many members of the extended family came to visit during her stay. One of them had recently had a son and during her visit to my grandmother's house his nappy had to be changed. My great-aunt watched and when the soiled nappy was removed, she turned to my grandmother and said: "Don't you circumcise them here?" My grandmother replied: "No – do you?" "Oh yes," replied my great-aunt. My interest was aroused.

By coincidence a near neighbour of my grandmother had her fourth child (her second son) a few weeks later. I knew the family well – I was friends with her existing family who were of a similar age to me so I was invited in to see the new baby about a week after mother and child got home from hospital. The baby was lying naked in front of the fire while his mother changed his nappy and I immediately noticed that Robert's penis was different from mine. There was no skin on his and my mind went back to the conversation between my grandmother and my great-aunt. "Was this circumcision?" I asked myself. Indeed it was and I subsequently discovered that Robert's elder brother was circumcised as well.

My first three years of education were spent at a local authority school. There was a gym but no swimming pool or showers, so I never had the opportunity to see other boys naked. I have a dim memory of a medical examination conducted by a nurse. I had to drop my pants but she only looked at my genitals – she did not touch them.

When I was eight, my parents sent me to a boys only college in Edinburgh. It was quite a culture shock for me. Pupils were addressed by surname and discipline was severe – the tawse was put to good use and teachers were addressed as "Sir". What struck me most however was the acceptance of communal nudity. I rapidly overcame my initial shyness and seized the opportunity to indulge my interest in the subject of circumcision.

On my second day we had swimming in the school PE department. After our swim we had to remove our trunks and put them through a mangle before returning to the changing area. A member of staff was on hand to ensure this rule was obeyed. Obviously no boy had any secrets when naked and I was amazed at the number of circumcised penises I saw that day. Out of a class of thirty boys, twelve were circumcised. Throughout my schooldays I would estimate that 25% to 30% of boys were circumcised.

As was usual during my school days, we were medically examined at 8, 13 and 16 years old, and after each examination two or three boys in my class would be absent for a week or reappear in the showers after the holidays minus their foreskins. I always took a careful note of such things. You may think that I am digressing from the subject but I wish to describe medical inspection procedures at the time as I believe that many boys nowadays are not examined as thoroughly.

At the appointed time I put my hand up in class and told my teacher I had an appointment with the school doctor. I left the classroom and went to the medical inspection room. I knocked on the door and, when I went in, the doctor pointed to some chairs, told me to strip and wait. As I was undressing, there was a boy getting dressed after being examined and another boy (Blair his name was) naked in front of the doctor being examined.

The room was Spartan with no screens and as I waited my turn, I watched Blair's examination. Blair was circumcised and I saw the doctor squeeze and pull his penis while pressing the area behind his scrotum. This manipulation resulted in an erection and when the doctor had finished, Blair walked towards the chairs, his face beetroot red. Then it was my turn.

My height, weight and eyesight were checked and the doctor spent a minute or so with his stethoscope checking my heart and lungs. I was then ordered to stand, legs apart, in front of the doctor. He held my testicles firmly and asked me to cough. He took hold of my penis and pushed the foreskin back, examined the glans, squeezed my penis and drew my foreskin forward again. He then pressed the area behind my scrotum two or three times, squeezed and pulled my penis again and retracted my foreskin again. While, unlike Blair, I did not get a full erection, the examination did result in tumescence of my penis. As I was getting dressed, Callum was being examined. I discovered later that the doctor was not satisfied with the retractability of his foreskin and he was circumcised during the Easter holidays.

I mention my experience of school medical examinations because, as will be apparent to the reader, in my younger days, no boy would have left school uncircumcised if he had a tight foreskin. My experience over the past twenty years leads me to believe this is no longer the case and I think this stems from a decision made by Kenneth Clarke (then Minister of Health) that school pupils would no longer be examined by a doctor but be 'checked over' by the school nurse. This was to save money. While I have met many young men (from Inverness to London) who have been examined as thoroughly as I was by school nurses, I have met many more who have been failed by school health services. Some only had to strip to the waist. In other cases, testicles were examined and the penis ignored. In a few cases the 'examination' was a fully clothed chat across a table during which the boy was asked if both testicles had descended!

There are exceptions. Six months ago I met a Welsh guy in Amsterdam. He was eighteen and he told me about his medical examination at a comprehensive school in Flint four years before. The boys had to report to the sports hall, strip and stand in a row. The doctor (not nurse) accompanied by a member of the school staff walked down the line checking testicles and foreskins. David told me that at that inspection, four out of fourteen boys were circumcised and that to his knowledge, no boys were circumcised as a result of the inspection. Catholic colleges in Hull and Yorkshire are again (according to my informants) places where boys are examined with circumcision in mind.

When I left school, I moved to London in 1972 to work in the Civil Service (my interest in circumcision undiminished) and joined the local football team. (There is no better way to see naked men than in a communal shower.) I was again amazed at the number of circumcised penises I saw there. They were all young men (20-22) and came from all parts of the UK – from Glasgow, Liverpool, Sunderland, Inverness, Coventry. I would estimate that, as at school, about 30% of my peers were circumcised.

Until my move to London, I had never discussed circumcision with anyone. I have mentioned my bi-sexuality – I have sex with women and admire and masturbate men. London was an eye-opener for me. It was (and is) possible to meet men from all over the world and I did. I met many Americans (but only two uncut), Australians (all cut), Kiwis (50% cut), Arabs and Malaysians (100% cut), South Africans (40-50% cut) and discussed circumcision with them all. I never met any man who regretted his circumcision (despite the pain involved for Turks and Muslims who did not benefit from pain relief). Nor did I meet a woman who did not prefer her lover to have a circumcised penis. And so I decided that it was time for me and my foreskin to part company.

In October 2002 I flew to Luton from Edinburgh. I arrived at the surgery to find a fellow Scotsman in the waiting room. I went into the surgery, removed my trousers and pants and lay on the couch. The doctor injected me, cut me, stitched me, bandaged me and that was it. I was done, circumcised, cut. Pain was minimal (no worse than the dentist). But the end result was not as tight as I would have wished, so I'll need to have another operation to get more skin removed.

My interest in circumcision is undiminished. It is, I think, a procedure that should be promoted on the grounds of public health – a reduced incidence of venereal disease, AIDS, cervical cancer, penile cancer, prostate problems. In addition, the penis looks better and doesn't smell – and women love it. If I had my way, all boys would be cut at birth. But if any members are still in any doubt, my advice would be to take the plunge and get it done. You will not regret it and the pain is worth it.

The Meatus

Recently there have been a couple of comments on the state of the piss-slit (meatus). Jack (Issue 1/2003) referred to one that had pouting edges and the slit appeared to be open. I suppose that as in all other aspects of circumcision, there is as much variety in the state of the slit as in the scar and shape of the knob. It would be good to see some reference to the state of the slit and individual preferences from other members.

Circumcision Is Becoming Popular In Hungary

Misi (26), an outspoken young man living in a small town 20 kilometres from Budapest, Hungary says "Every male should be circumcised". He got circumcised four months ago, because his foreskin became very tight in the past two years.

Fifteen years ago, Hungary was a non-circumcising society, in which circumcision had been only performed in the small observant Jewish community or for medical reasons, as a treatment of certain penile illnesses. In the mid-sixties, only the Hungarian translations made from Dr. Spock's best-sellers, Baby and Child Care and Teenagers' Book mentioned infant circumcision as a social custom in the U.S. The translation was very much softening the (then) strong pro-circ attitude of the author. The other available sources on children's health and nursing were in favour of the conservative methods of treating a tight foreskin, such as forced retraction of the foreskin to tear the adhesions. Generally, most people knew that circumcision was something that Jews were doing with the penis of young boys, but what it was that was done was not at all clear to everybody. There was also some resistance in gentile families against doing a circumcision, even if it was medically necessary, because it was thought to be a purely Jewish custom.

Most young men and women came across circumcision for the first time when they watched a porn movie or looked at porn magazines, which were smuggled to the country from time to time. Zsolt (32), who chose to get circumcised two years ago, says: "I was at high school when I watched, together with my class-mates, a porn video that was smuggled in by the father of a friend of mine, a lorry driver, who went to the West every month. We all realised that every guy on the film had a cock that was different from ours, with a very clearly defined red glans, with no excess skin. I learnt a few years later that it was because they were all circumcised."

In a lot of families, especially in religious families, everything that has something to do with sex or the genitalia has been taboo until only very recently. Mothers and sometime even the fathers were shy about speaking with their sons about sexual life, and did not find the way to teach the boy how to clean his penis every day. Thus, they also failed to recognise if the boy had a phimosis and needed a circumcision. School physicals were also quite relaxed, and the school physicians (who are very often females) did not always pay attention to genital cleanliness of the boys. Nevertheless, a careful school physician, especially from the 'old school', would look at the boys' penises at the regular annual check-ups and teach them how to keep it clean. Ferenc (39) says he owes a lot to his school physician who taught him (and the other boys as well) how to keep his cock clean, even though he chose to get circumcised earlier this year.

From the mid-1980s, however, as more and more people could travel abroad, new ideas and information reached Hungary. More and more young men and women went to school in the West and elsewhere and young Westerners came to Hungary as tourists or to work here as language teachers, journalists or businessmen, and they brought with them their views, their ideas and their way of living. The world wide web became available in Hungary from the mid-1990s, and you could find in no time any information you wanted.

Most probably, because of this influx of new information, thoughts and ways of life, non-religious and non-medical circumcision may have started to be more and more widely practised in the last ten odd years, as suggested by several sources of information. Nowadays, a lot of families decide to get their sons circumcised as infants or as schoolboys, and teenage boys and young men see the doctor and ask for a non-medical circumcision, very often at the suggestion or request of their girlfriend or wife.

The Hungarian language web is full of discussion threads that deal with the pros and cons of circumcision, and many young men and women give their stories or the stories of their boyfriend's circumcision. Last year two Hungarian language web-sites were opened that deal exclusively with the matter of circumcision, which both provide a lot of information on circumcision, peppered with personal stories. Viktor (25) is a young IT specialist, who volunteered to be the web-master of "Jóvágású fiúk lapja" (the page of clean cut boys, all in Hungarian, see at: www.freeweb.hu/korulmetelve) after he got circumcised a year ago, because of a phimosis. He said he wanted to help those guys who had problems with their foreskin, like he had before, and his own main source of information was the Internet.

Usually, if the father has been circumcised as a child or, very often, as an adult, because of a tight foreskin or some other penile problem, he and his wife will appreciate the benefits of circumcision and get their own offspring circumcised, before starting at school at the latest. Klára, a mother of two boys and a grandmother of three, says: "My husband is circumcised, and we decided to get our two sons circumcised before they went to school. My mother-in-law was a nurse and she also insisted on having her grandsons circumcised. We very much agreed, as we saw enough boys suffering from a tight foreskin and an inflamed glans. The boys are grown-ups now and they are very satisfied with their circumcised organs, as are their wives. I now have three grandsons, and they all got circumcised as infants."

Zoltán (35), is married, and he decided to get circumcised four years ago. "I had no problems with my foreskin, but I wanted to get rid of it since I was 17. To keep my glans dry and clean, I have been keeping my foreskin peeled back for ten years. When I finally made the decision to get circumcised, my wife very much supported me. I was done in December 2000, and I am very satisfied with the result. It is so much better to be circumcised: better health and better sex, you know." Zoltán and his wife have a son aged 7, and they are now thinking of getting the boy cut too. "I still haven't decided it yet. Sometimes I think that he also should have the choice, as I had. On the other hand, as a father I have a duty to do my best for his health and well-being."

Hungarian women are sometimes quite ignorant about circumcision and circumcised partners, but in most cases they are very positive about it. The husband of Livia, a young Hungarian woman, had to be circumcised shortly after their wedding, because he had a severe phimosis and a frenulum breve. She had no sexual contacts with circumcised men before and was a little bit worried about the outcome of the surgery. But after the short healing period, they now have a lot better sex, and she says she is very proud of the circumcised cock of her husband. They agreed they would get their sons circumcised before leaving the hospital.

Rita, a Hungarian girl, has very similar views: "A few years ago, my boyfriend had a very sore cock, because he had a short frenulum and every erection was a nightmare for him, so he had to be operated upon. When he finally decided to get it done, we agreed that he should ask for a full circumcision. Now he has a neatly cut cock, and I am very proud of him and his willy. When we are strolling on the nudist beach, he looks so good and masculine with his nicely circumcised cock."

Naturally, not everybody is enthusiastic about being circumcised. Imre is now in his late 20s and he had to be circumcised at six because of a phimosis. He still feels miserable about it and complains about a numb penis. Imre keeps looking for a way to get a foreskin restoration and contributes a lot to the various discussion forums on the Hungarian web where he tries to dissuade other men wanting to get circumcised.

The Hungarian medical profession is not anti-circ or particularly pro-circ, though a lot of them still would look at circumcision only as a remedy for certain penile illnesses and not as a useful preventive measure. Nevertheless, most doctors in Hungary would be ready to do a circumcision on request, without any apparent medical reason. In theory, social security pays for a circumcision only if it is medically necessary, and a voluntary circumcision would cost about 30-60,000 Forints (U.S. $120-240). The operation is always freehand, as Plastibell and Gomcobell are not known in Hungary, under local anesthesia on an outpatient basis. Dr. Ferenc Fekete (45), a renowned urologist who runs a private clinic for male problems in Budapest, says he is very much in favour of circumcision, and does about fifty operations a year.

Hopefully, circumcised boys and men will soon be a familiar sight in gym locker rooms or pool showers and on the nudist beach in Hungary.

Has Beckham Been Circumcised?

Rebecca Loos, David Beckham's former personal assistant, has claimed to have had an affair with the England captain. Beckham has described the allegations by Ms Loos, first made in the News of the World, as ludicrous, and has instructed lawyers. But in an interview with Sky Television, for which she is understood to have received £150,000, Ms Loos said she had no reason to lie about the alleged affair. Asked if she could prove that the affair took place, Ms Loos said: "There is something I know about him, an intimate part of his body that I think only women who've been in bed with him would know." When asked if the Real Madrid midfielder had been circumcised, Ms Loos said: "I'm not talking about that. If I do ever need to talk about that, it will be in a court, not on television."

Self-circumcision is not usually the subject of prime time TV. But the new Channel 4 programme, Nip/Tuck, broadcast on Wednesday evenings at 10.00 pm, has this topic as a running story, at least in the first three episodes. In episode 1, Matt tells his cosmetic surgeon father that he wishes to be circumcised – and is told that he has psychological problems (ring any bells, anywhere?). In episode 2, he performs a self-circumcision, and in episode 3, it is tidied up. Perhaps the interests of Acorn Society members are a little more main stream than we thought!

On page 8 of this issue, we give details of the next Acorn meeting in November. If you have never attended before, please do consider coming. The atmosphere is warm and friendly, and whether you are roundhead or cavalier, pro-foreskin or pro-circ, you will be very welcome. This issue also sees the revival of Contact Corner. The Acorn Society is a community and one of its functions is to help members to get in touch with each other. So, if any member wishes to make contact with others, perhaps in their area, via the Acorn mailbox, please let me know and I shall be happy to insert details in the next issue.

Only foreskins need be worn!

This edition will arrive as many of you are watching the Olympic Games. Imagine, however, an athlete from the first games in 776 BC propelled forward to the modern Olympiad. Little would be familiar other than the Greek landscape. Certainly he would be surprised at the athletes' shorts and singlets. He had competed in the nude. No doubt about his status!

Not that there would have been such doubt anyway since in those days the foreskin was de rigueur and the exposed glans was frowned upon. It was taken as an indication of sexual arousal and was therefore considered to be indecent. To ensure that the foreskin did not inadvertently retract during their exertions, the athletes bound the end of the foreskin, making retraction impossible. To prevent their genitals from flapping around and reduce risk of chafing and tearing, the athletes used a kynodesme (literally a 'dog leash'). This was a thin leather thong wound around the akroposthion (the extremity of the foreskin) that pulled the penis upward and was tied in a bow around the waist, or secured by some other means. Vase paintings and statues frequently portray nude athletes wearing the kynodesme. One of the most informative iconographic representations is found on an Attic red-figure calyx-krater painted by Euphronios, dating from 520-510 BC which shows a young athlete in the process of grasping the lips of his akroposthion with the fingers of his left hand and pulling the prepuce taut while his right hand is poised ready to loop the kynodesme around the neck of the akroposthion.

In fact, the device served a dual purpose since it was worn from early in training onwards. The idea was that it should inhibit erections and thus make intercourse or masturbation difficult if not impossible – an early and primitive form of chastity belt. Many athletes forwent sexual activity during training. Signs of sexual interest during athletics were regarded as laughable. The process of binding the foreskin thus became known by the slang term kunodesme, 'putting the dog on the lead'.

The practice evolved into a permanent form in Rome 200 to 400 A.D. The Romans pierced the prepuce of athletes and slaves with metal rings that they welded shut. The Romans called this device a fibula. Its function was to prevent erections – not for protection but to ensure the athlete didn't break training and the slaves didn't procreate. The theory that orgasm and ejaculation weakens the athlete persisted until recent times – it was an accepted part of, say, a boxer's training that he should desist from sexual activity whilst in training. This idea certainly seems to have gone out of the window of late with wives and girl friends accompanying football and cricket teams on overseas tours. Does this perhaps explain some of our poor performances on the field?

Lack of a foreskin inhibited participation in those early games, which was a barrier particularly to Jews. (At that time, Islam with its similar mandatory circumcision requirements did not exist.) This led to Jews seeking to restore their foreskins in order to cover their glans again and allow them to compete – and this in turn led the mohelim to require a return to a more radical form of circumcision. This in turn has led to a myth that Jewish circumcision consisted originally of just a token removal of the tip of the foreskin. This in fact is unlikely if only because, if it were true, there would have been no need for anyone to undertake restoration as they would still have had a covered glans!

Furthermore, since around 20% of males are born with a short foreskin which, in adulthood at least, doesn't cover the whole glans it would have been impossible to distinguish between the circumcised and those with a short skin. Since the purpose of circumcision was to set a Jew aside from his fellow men it would have made no sense to circumcise in such a way as to be indistinguishable from a large proportion of non-Jews. It is known from Egyptian mummies that the Egyptians practised full circumcision and the Jews are likely to have copied circumcision from the Egyptians, or vice versa. Also all other tribes around the world who practise ritual circumcision ensure that the glans is entirely exposed.

All the evidence thus points to Jewish circumcision always having been aimed at a complete foreskin removal: there is no evidence to the contrary. What we do know though is that by Hellenic times the practice of circumcision had become sloppy (possibly deliberately so in some cases) so that it had become possible for many Jewish athletes to pull the remains of their foreskin forward and tie it to pretend to be uncircumcised and thus be permitted to take part in the games. Just as today we find many doctors incapable of performing a first class circumcision, but nevertheless offering their services as circumcisers, so it is likely that as the Jewish race spread outside of the original Promised Land many of their mohelim were not as skilled as they should have been. Or perhaps, since it was a father's duty to circumcise his own son, many fathers only did a half-hearted job 'just in case the boy might want to compete in the Games when he was older', or simply because of their lack of skill at the job.

Whatever the reason for it, the only evidence we have is that some Jews at that time were able to hide their true status. It was thus decreed that circumcision should henceforth be not only complete (as tradition required) but be shown to be complete and irreversible – thus the required tearing of the inner foreskin. This more radical form of Jewish circumcision persists to the present day.

If uncircumcised uniformity was the norm at those first games, that is unlikely to be the case in Greece today. It is a fair guess that the teams from the Middle East, the USA, Islamic nations in Africa and the Far East, and many other African countries will be almost exclusively circumcised, whilst those from Europe, India and China will be uncut. And no doubt the contingent from Japan will have foreskins retracted in direct opposition to that early tradition. Unfortunately, we shall be unable to monitor the exact proportions from our television couches. Nevertheless, the skin tight lycra shorts favoured by sprinters in particular leaves little to the imagination. I shall be happy to print your speculations next time!

Save That Foreskin!

[In issue 6/2003, Daniel told how his fifteen year old son was keen to be circumcised because he had a rather tight foreskin. I.N. offers some advice.]

I very much hope that Daniel does not get his 15 year old son circumcised because of his tight foreskin since I know of a remedy that works in most cases of phimosis. It is very simple and straightforward. First, anyone who has phimosis must take hold of the foreskin on both sides with the index finger and thumb of each hand and then very gently pull the tip of the foreskin out to both sides with both hands about five or six times and then with the same method pull the foreskin forward the same number of times. This must be done every day until the tightness begins to slacken and must be continued until the foreskin can be drawn back behind the corona thus uncovering the glans completely. Needless to say, erections often occur and if an erection is felt coming on then stop until the penis returns to its flaccid state. Masturbation can help but be careful depending on the tightness of the foreskin since paraphimosis can occur.

I passed this advice to a couple that I was friendly with back home in Scotland. One of their sons, 13 at the time in 1975, had reached puberty the same year and developed phimosis. The lad was the youngest of four sons and at the time his older brothers were 20, 18 and 15. It was the 20 year old that told me about his younger brother having a tight foreskin. He discovered it by accident when he had to answer a call of nature and found his younger brother trying to pull back his foreskin in the toilet. He went in there to masturbate thinking that it would help the phimosis but to no avail. Circumcision was mentioned and the 20 year old knew that I was circumcised because we used to go swimming together in the local swimming baths where we shared a changing cubicle. I was 28 so we were close in age. I went to his house with him when his parents were at home and we spoke with them about their youngest son's phimosis. The father told me that he had discussed circumcision with his wife and they were both in agreement about getting it done as soon as possible. I mentioned about the method that I have just described and both parents were very keen to try it out, the father especially because he had been circumcised due to phimosis in 1945 when he was 15. His circumcision had been very painful with a great deal of discomfort. He didn't want his youngest son to go through what he had. The 13 year old used the method and, to cut a long story short, after a period of time his phimosis disappeared.

Fortunately none of the other sons had tight foreskins. All four sons are now married and have taught their own sons the method and so far there haven't been any cases of tight foreskins amongst the couple's grandsons (seven in number). Over the years sadly I've lost contact with the family except for the youngest son who has two sons 16 and 13 and is a widower. His wife died in childbirth in 1990 when their second son was born. We are close because of what I did for him in 1975 when he was 13 and now that he is 41 he takes an interest in his own sons in case they ever get tight foreskins.

So, Daniel, please do think about what I've mentioned. At least give it a try and you may change your mind. The method doesn't work for everyone but it is worth trying. If your 15 year old son has no success then go ahead and get him circumcised. Most likely he will get teased about being done, more so these days as circumcision is a great deal less common than when I grew up in the 50's and 60's when it was common to see a circumcised male. Even then I was teased from time to time. Some of the remarks weren't nice.

Having said all of that, I am still a strong supporter of circumcision, but only on religious grounds.

Smurf – A Response

I was disturbed to read the story Ashley – A True Story (issue 3/2004) which talked about Ashley, aged 17 but looking 12. I consider this to be verging on 'Kiddie Porn'. I really think the whole story is a fantasy dreamed up by 'Smurf' who is obviously into the younger person.

All this talk about retracting foreskins doesn't really have a place in a pro-circumcision magazine. I know that we have to read both sides of the story but personally I think that a non-circumcised penis is a very ugly thing compared to the beauty of a fully circumcised one. The suggestion that circumcision is the lazy man's way of curing objectionable smells caused by smegma is complete balderdash! Before I was circumcised, I washed my penis, and still do, several times a day but the objectionable smell soon returned. Since circumcision I have not had this problem re-occur.

I do not consider intercourse with an intact penis to be "truly a wonderful sensation". I do however consider that intercourse with a circumcised penis is truly a wonderful sensation! I should know having been circumcised at the age of 40 at my own choice and having experienced both sides of the coin so to speak. I do not think that 'Smurf' being uncircumcised is in a position to comment on the difference between a circumcised and an uncircumcised penis. How can he know if he has only experienced the latter?

All I can say is since my circumcision, which I consider in some ways was the best thing that ever happened to me, everything has been a million times better than with that wretched foreskin!

Liberal Upbringing

There are two schools of thought about sex instruction and children. Firstly there are those who insist that kids should at an early age be given explicit lessons to enable them to avoid pregnancy and disease and those who take the old-fashioned view that children should be protected from sexual knowledge until near maturity. I was lucky enough to come in the first category and am grateful for not having to face the awful inhibitions suffered by those kids whose sexuality is repressed or warped and who so often as a result suffer from neuroses for the rest of their lives.

I was brought up in a sexually-charged atmosphere. My mother walked out on my father in my infancy and we went to live with an old school friend of hers, 'Auntie' Mabel, a bawdy, fun-loving lady who seemed to be obsessed with sex and was utterly without inhibition. Happy-go-lucky boyfriends were constantly coming and going and there were parties, some of them developing into sexual orgies and although I was not allowed to be present, I was always eavesdropping or peeping and saw more than was good for me on many occasions.

At school too, I was privileged to have a circle of friends of both sexes who were committed to the investigation of sexual knowledge. One of my earliest sexual recollections was, at the age of six, being the centre of attention when a young lady called Angela decided to perform her party piece and show off her expertise in the subject of the male anatomy, in particular how to provoke an erection – she had apparently been practising on her two brothers. She took matters into her own hands, literally, by getting it out and showing the others how holding it between finger and thumb and sliding the foreskin to and fro would inevitably lead to a spectacular increase in size and stiffness, making it even more satisfying to handle. To show off her superior knowledge, she induced the other girls in the group to have a go, instructing them in the art of drawing the foreskin right back to reveal the knob and then pulling it forward to its normal position in front of it. I found all this handling terribly exciting and felt all trembly as a succession of soft female fingers handled and rubbed my small but fiercely erect penis. Genital handling became a regular occurrence and certainly destroyed any inhibitions I might have had with the other sex. In later years Angela proved to be a very knowledgeable young lady because she was able to instruct us in the other penile variation, circumcision, explaining how some boys had the skin cut back to uncover the knob, to our disbelief since none of us had heard of such a thing.

Meanwhile back home, I picked up further information about sex when being bathed, since we all took a bath together. I never ceased to find it stimulating to see mature females nude and always developed an erection – Mabel laughed at it and made embarrassing comments about what a fine big dicky I had and how I would make some girl happy one day. Mother just laughed and went on sponging me down, but when it came to my dangly bits, there was always a bit of a production, with Mabel insisting against my mother's wishes, that she should draw my skin back to ensure I hadn't got a tight foreskin. Mother was of the opinion that foreskins should be left alone – they'd come back of their own accord when ready, but under Mabel's insistence she sometimes did draw my skin right back to show my blood-red tip, immediately pulling it forward again while Mabel chuckled her approval. On several occasions Mabel sat on the loo and took a noisy pee, grinning coyly while mother ignored her. I didn't though.

A couple of years later at the age of 13 when getting undressed for bed, I decided to show off my knowledge and asked Mabel what circumcision was. She was curious to know that it was a girlfriend who had raised the matter ('Saucy minx!') but pulling my pyjama pants down, she indicated with her finger nail round where the rim of the glans bulged out under the foreskin, as the site where the cut was made. I asked her why it was done and she said these days it was only for religious reasons. When I said it must look funny to have your knob exposed all the time she made me pull my foreskin right back to show me what it would look like and laughed when I developed a hard-on. She asked me if I ever played with my willy to make it stiff. I said yes and told her what the girls at school had done. She giggled and told me it was not so much fun to play with if you didn't have a long skin to rub up and down. She then said a funny thing – "In the games lovers play, your foreskin is your best friend and don't you forget it!" I didn't.

At about this time, Mabel took it on herself to ensure that I received proper sex lessons since they were not provided at school. She explained one day in the kitchen, as she peeled the potatoes, how the sex act took place and warned of the necessity of safe sex. I was intensely curious about female anatomy and although I had seen both mother and Mabel nude on so many occasions, was only conscious of the long split in the bulge of flesh between a female's legs, knowing nothing about what it hid. Mabel being the lady she was didn't hesitate. She pulled her knickers down and gave me a demonstration, separating her vulva and giving me a Cook's tour of all the bits. I noticed her clitoris was like my penis and, as she pointed out, was fully hooded by a foreskin like mine. In my dismal ignorance, I then asked her if she peed through it. She laughed and pointed out the vent just underneath it, asking me if I'd never seen girls at school take a pee. When I said no, she hesitated, said, "Oh well – why not?", swore me to silence and then laid on an impressive exhibition, releasing a powerful cascade into a bucket! My reaction was like your contributor Steve's, in Acorn 2/99 – I was flabbergasted and horrified!

This was all exiting stuff and I was sexually aroused as never before by her total lack of inhibition. However it is important to state that I only experienced what a boy in one of the less prudish nudist environments would be exposed to – never once did Mabel allow me to touch her private parts and she never touched mine. It was, as she said, purely a matter of instruction and in later years I was grateful for it.

As I reached maturity, I came across the novelty of circumcision when I dated a Jewish girl for several months. She told me her family would have strongly disapproved if they'd known she was having it off with an uncircumcised gentile, but made it clear that when she married she would stick to the faith, so there was no question of a permanent relationship. From her point of view, she wanted to know what sex was like with a foreskin before being married to a circumcised man. She never stated a preference, but her ardent response and clear enjoyment were enough for me. We talked for a long time about circumcision and she made it clear that she had nothing personally against foreskins. They were just incompatible with her all-important religion. There were times when I regretted that I was not circumcised myself to enter this world that was closed to me. It was never a serious proposition though – I was too conscious of the pleasure embodied in my skin pullover – and I now understood what Mabel meant.

After careful thought I have come to the theory that circumcision is probably allied to sexual repression. Although I admire the commitment of Muslims and have absolutely no criticism of the religion itself, all the Islamic countries, where circumcision is universal, strictly ban all forms of pornography and sexual licence, especially as far as Muslim women are concerned. Nudity is treated with revulsion and both men and women are required to be fully covered at all times – no shorts or T shirts. The US as usual is a baffling mixture with the bible belt and deep south embracing circumcision whilst banning pornography and any manifestation of sexuality, whilst in California and New York, where the majority of boy babies are now allowed to remain intact, they permit virtually anything. Meanwhile in uncircumcised Europe, Britain excepted, anything goes. You can buy hard core pornography virtually anywhere and prostitution, whilst often officially prohibited, thrives as battalions of young women ply their trade, including many from the old soviet empire, desperate to give their sexuality free reign and make a few bob into the bargain. In Britain of course, things have to be different – they always have been. Although routine infant circumcision is now never performed, the stifling prudery of the early part of the century when circumcision was at its zenith here, still lingers on – as Steve said in 2/99 – while Jack Straw betrays his liberal conscience and panders to Mary Whitehouse and her doomy acolytes by cracking down on porn. However anyone who watches Channel 4 and 5 will know that things are changing. Programmes like Ibiza Uncovered and Sex and Shopping, with a continual diet of up-front mixed-sex nudity, are a clear indication that, not only are foreskins virtually universal, but the shackles imposed by the old women of both sexes in our society should be treated with contempt.

Zsolt's Story

When I was younger, I did not understand why those men whom I saw in porn films did not show their foreskins. I liked it, though I did not know what it was. Later, at school we spoke about these types of films and I learnt that those guys were all circumcised. Then the whole matter was forgotten. After I had completed my military service in 1991, I started to go to the nudist lakes around Budapest with my then girl friend. These lakes are actually gravel pits, filled with cool, clear water, on which the first nudist beaches were formed in Hungary. Once, we saw a family where the father and his teen-age sons were all foreskin-less. My girlfriend became very excited at the sight of the uncovered glans, and asked me to keep my glans bare, with the foreskin always pulled back. To tell the truth, I liked it too, so I fulfilled her wishes and pulled the skin back, but it soon slipped forward. Then I kept on pulling it back until it stayed that way. Of course, it was not that easy, since when I put on my boxers, it stayed retracted at first, but then rolled back to cover my glans and trapped my pubic hair with it, which was not very pleasurable! Then I found out that if I pulled back my foreskin, as I used to do it, and then rolled it back to the groove behind the glans, the rim would keep it back and I would also look circumcised. In turn, I had to be more careful about keeping it clean.

I lived for eight years with my foreskin always pulled back, and after a while I realised that my foreskin had become a lot shorter. Years ago it had overhung the glans; now it was covering less than half of it.

After having kept my foreskin always pulled back for eight years, I started to gather all possible information about circumcision, how it was done, what the results were and whether or not it was done for adults. I mulled over what to do for a year; I read everything I found on the Internet; I thought about all the stuff that was written in the discussion forums and asked the e-mail Doctor on one of the Hungarian medical advisory sites. He responded very quickly and gave a name and a phone number. After a few days of further chewing it over, I called the doctor, named Dr Ferenc Fekete, who gave me a date. I raised the issue of getting circumcised with my girl friend (this was a new one), and she assured me she would support the idea. I went to see the doctor and after 30 minutes we agreed that I would call if I made up my mind. This was in early February 2000, and after twelve days, I called the Doc to say that I wanted the thing. He gave me a new date, the next Tuesday morning, when I had to go to the Urology Department at the Medical University in Budapest, and explained to me how I could get there. I had a very simple digital camera, and I decided to take shots of my dick before and after. I made a few pix of my uncut dick and waited for the next Tuesday to come.

So Tuesday morning, 29th February 2000, arrived. TOP SECRET. Nobody knew about the whole thing. I took my back-pack and I left home as if I were going to work. The closer I got to the hospital the more troubled I became. The Doc had told me in advance not to eat but to drink more than usual. That I did. I arrived and at the check-in counter some nice-looking girls, 10 years younger than me, were sitting. "This won't be easy," I thought, but then the Doc arrived and said that I had come to see him. He asked me if I still wanted the operation. Then he took me to the 2nd floor where a young nurse of my age (28) took my data; then a young doctor arrived and asked if I were nervous. I said yes, naturally, then he gave me some pills, which I took, and told me to walk around, until I felt the result. In about 20 minutes I became very relaxed and calm, and I only remember that I called the doctor by his first name.

Then Dr Fekete arrived and took me to his office, where he examined my dick and asked how much skin he should cut off. I told him he should cut off the whole foreskin, as I came for a full circumcision and not for just a correction. "OK", he agreed. In a few minutes, another guy arrived who guided me to the surgery room. When I was undressing I thought there was no way back, but the doctor once again asked if I really wanted the operation. Of course I answered yes, and lay down on the operation table. The surgery assistant, a young chap, put a strap on my limbs, to fix me to the table. I asked him to tell me what was what, just to keep me busy, though by then I was not worried at all, as the pill I had taken had made me sort of euphoric. Then a kind elderly lady came and cleaned my prick with a dark red liquid, and then they pulled up the sheet in front of me, so that I saw nothing. There were already four of them occupied with me. The doctor told me that he would inform me of every step they made and that he would then start the operation. I got 3-4 jabs below my glans, but that was the most unpleasant part of the whole surgery, and after it I felt nothing at all. After a few minutes I put my hands behind my head and lay on the table as if I were on the beach, sunbathing, and listened to their chit-chatting. When one of them said something funny, we all laughed. After about 20-25 minutes, we were ready, and they put a bandage on my dick and left. The surgery assistant guy led me back to the place where I started the whole process about half an hour before. Dr Fekete arrived and gave me a few suggestions about the next few days. Then I paid the bill (as I was there on a private basis) and left and went home on foot.

I took the underground, then the train, etc. At home, I was prepared for the worst, that it would hurt like hell. But nothing happened. I called the doc to ask what I should expect, and he assured me that it could not be worse than a slight tooth-ache. "A slight tooth-ache ...", I repeated, but I was not convinced at all. I thought that as the surgery was painless, all the worst things would come after.

But nothing. It was unbelievable, I had no pain, whatsoever. After a few days I went to see the Doctor once more, and I told him that it had not hurt so far, so what should I expect in the following days. He said if it had not hurt in the first 2-3 days, there should be no pain at all. Oh Christ, I thought, I had not had the cut done before because I was scared of the pain. The sutures fell out by themselves and I had to dip my cock into camomile tea to avoid any infection.

After about three weeks my girlfriend could enjoy my newly trimmed cock, and it was so wonderful to be and to make love without a foreskin.

In the years since I have been quite often with my girlfriend to the nudist lakes, and quite a few older women (in their 40s) have asked me about my circumcision. In Hungary not too many men are circumcised, but it is becoming more popular among young men. I do recommend everybody to get circumcised as I feel a lot healthier since I had it done.

Dissimilar Siblings

In issue 6/2003, the issue was raised as to whether, if one brother in a family needed a medical circumcision, any other brothers should also be circumcised. This question was posed in the 'Dear Dr Cath' column in the Sunday Mirror in late February under the title: 'Not to be snipped at'.

Q: Our son has to be circumcised due to a very tight foreskin. Our other boy is fine but we're worried they will notice how different they are. Should we have him circumcised too?

A: This used to be a common operation in young boys but now fewer than one in ten teenagers have had it done.

Circumcision is a painful operation and unless he's a small baby, your son will need a general anaesthetic. It's an extremely safe and routine operation, but all anaesthesia carries a risk and nobody should have an operation without good reason. There is no medical advantage here, so your second son should not have it done.

I know the boys will spot the difference, but you could take this as an opportunity to discuss with them how everybody is individual and that differences are a normal part of life. Your second son will only think he's odd within your family – with most of his friends he'll be quite normal.

Celebrity Status – Damien Hurst

Damien Hurst, the controversial artist, famous for sharks in formaldehyde and cut-up cows, is uncircumcised – and we have the photograph to prove it. The revelation came from the fashion photographer, David Bailey, who is himself circumcised. The two held a joint show, Stations of the Cross, at the Gagosian Gallery in London during May. The show uses the traditional stages of Christ's Passion as the starting point for thirteen huge photographs.

One image is of Simon helping Jesus, with David Bailey as Simon and Damien Hurst as Jesus. Simon is kneeling before a full-frontally naked Jesus. The picture is revealing, with Damien sporting rather a long foreskin. As David says: "He gets the starring part, and I'm just Simple Simon. And I'm circumcised – he's not."

So, after the controversy in recent issues of Acorn about Michelangelo's David depicting an uncircumcised Jew, we now get a totally inauthentic Jesus. But at least we now know the truth about Damien Hurst!

Religious Circumcision and the NHS

Why do health authorities fund religious circumcision?

I was alarmed to read that some NHS health authorities are offering circumcisions to religious minorities (Clinical, October 13). While this may reduce the health risks associated with private procedures, that is no reason for them to get state funding. The state would be unwilling to fund female genital mutilation on the grounds that it is child abuse, so why should it fund what amounts to male child abuse?

In 1989 the United Nations Convention on Human Rights of the Child stated that ritualistic circumcision violated a child's right to bodily integrity. Your article implies that Muslims automatically and unquestioningly circumcise their male children. In fact, many Muslim authorities have great difficulty reconciling this procedure with the child's right to bodily integrity. Jews are also increasingly questioning the wisdom of circumcision.

Circumcision of healthy children amounts to criminal assault since valid consent cannot be obtained from the child and parents have no legal right to consent to non-therapeutic procedures on their child's behalf. It is time we ended the hypocrisy of allowing circumcision while at the same time condemning female genital mutilation.

Further information can be found at www.norm-uk.org

Dr Simon Fisher, Newcastle upon Tyne

Why Muslims opt for circumcision

In his condemnation of routine infant male circumcision, Dr Simon Fisher says those of the Muslim and Jewish faith are beginning to question the wisdom of the procedure. I perform many routine (male) circumcisions and it is my experience that true followers of both these faiths request the operation on their sons for an entirely valid reason – it is part of their cultural heritage.

There is no medical reason why a Jew or Muslim should not, for example, eat pork, but for us to attempt to rationalise this on scientific grounds would be both insensitive and inappropriate.

Dr Fisher refers to an anti-circumcision website. Perhaps I can suggest www.circinfo.com as a site that provides sound and reasoned advice.

Dr M Barrie, Kingston upon Thames

I must take issue with Dr Simon Fisher when he states that many Muslim authorities are questioning circumcision. As a member of a Mosque committee who attends national meetings, I am not aware of any such questions. To be a Muslim a man has to be circumcised. This is usually done at an early age and healing is quicker in younger age groups. Not having a son circumcised is a restriction on religious practice, which is also a fundamental right.

The Marie Stopes Clinic

Several times I have read mention of the Marie Stopes clinic in London and a Dr Hussain. This is where I had my circumcision done a good few years ago. I had originally intended using my local private hospital but they required a letter of referral from my GP, something I was none too keen to try for as he had already thought it necessary to try to stop me being gay!! That same year a friend had been circumcised locally with what I considered an excellent result. It was quite tight with a low cut, the only sign of which was an extremely fine white line close to the rim of his glans. This looked very natural. To my eye, many adult circumcisions with a high cut don't look natural enough. This problem rarely seems to arise with child circumcisions, probably because of growth and time factors.

Anyway, back to the clinic. I arrived and after being asked why I wanted to be circumcised, the job was done without further discussion. Times were different then; the doctor knew best and you were not involved in the process as these days. So I just let him go ahead. There was no discussion about aftercare other than to take the prescribed medication and remove the bandage in a couple of days. The result was a fairly high and uneven cut with suture marks, albeit nice and tight. Quite severe pain went on for several weeks and I had to request a repeat prescription. So I would not recommend the Marie Stopes clinic. But as I said, times have changed.

My friend and I, having experienced as adults both cut and uncut states, are strong advocates of circumcision. We would not want to go back, except in my case I would have gone about it differently. We both feel our parents should have had us circumcised. I think mine considered it but never discussed it with me – there was no medical need but there was the opportunity.

I agree with what J.T. (issue 3/2004) says about medicals. Having worked in schools, the lack of medical examinations is apparent. Parents are not well informed and almost everyone in the current climate is scared witless about going near boys' cocks, let alone examining them. Whilst this situation may be understandable, it can only be to the detriment of some boys.

To Lube Or Not To Lube

I was most surprised to read Jack's remark (issue 2/2003) that, "Like most well circumcised men I can only jack off with lubrication". This has not been my experience. None of the 15 cut guys I've been with have had any problem wanking dry, nor have I since I had mine cut. For myself, and for my circumcised partners, wanking with lubricant is simply a delightful optional extra made easier and better by the absence of a foreskin, but not necessitated by it.

Penis Pain

In The Times each Saturday, the honorary consultant paediatrician at Great Ormond Street hospital answers parents' queries. The following exchange took place in August.

Q: Our oldest son is  $8\frac{1}{2}$  years old. We have been encouraging him to start pulling back his foreskin but he says it hurts, and some of the foreskin seems to be stuck to the top of his penis. Should the skin just peel away over time or is it more serious?

A: Some boys still have a tight foreskin at the age of eight, but in most cases it is beginning to show signs of retracting of its own accord by then. If the problem isn't treated, there won't be any immediate problem but your son could experience difficulties later in life.

It would be a good idea to see your GP, who may suggest referring him to a surgeon who would be able to review the situation. If he does need treatment, there are several options. A simple circumcision is one. The foreskin can also be stretched under general anaesthetic. If there is a particular desire to preserve the foreskin, a procedure known as preputioplasty, which involves making an incision in the foreskin, is a third option.

The Economics of Circumcision

Our cash strapped NHS probably de-listed 'Circumcision on Demand' as much on grounds of cost as anything else. Thus the managers and accounts administrators are as blameable as the anti-circ proselytisers for virtually eliminating the procedure as a prophylactic. This smacks of economic as well as medical short sightedness.

Consider the official NHS figure of 30,000 necessary circumcisions per annum. That's the figure banded around in recent times and the nearest estimate which will serve for a little illustration. At a very conservative estimate this is going to rack up a figure of thousands of pounds per circ. If that sounds excessive, let's set out a typical cost scenario for a boy who develops a foreskin problem which results in one of those 30,000 circs.

- 1 Mother takes son for several visits to GP with foreskin problem before losses are cut (so to speak!) and patient is eventually referred for circumcision. It certainly is rarely suggested the first time a patient presents. GP's professional time per hour – say 15 mins per consultation plus admin staff and running expenses of doctor's premises. You are probably looking at £50 per visit if fully costed. Average situation requires a probable total of 4 visits, say £200 in all.
- 2 Cost to NHS of medication; creams, antibiotics etc, subsidised for adults, free to children. Guess at £200.
- 3 Add cost of referral for initial consultation with specialist/surgeon prior to procedure. Not cheap! £250.

4 The event; Surgical day case at hospital: Overheads of light, heat, building maintenance, insurance, admin appointment costs, surgeon and anaesthetist's fees, nursing costs, plus medication and disposables used for each procedure. Perhaps £1,000 all in.

5 Follow up appointment at hospital or doctor's surgery £50

TOTAL for above around £1500 to £2000.

CONTRAST with cost of RIC:

Almost all the costs are already being borne by the maternity unit – the baby is there anyway. So are the staff. A RIC could be included as part of the OB's or midwife's skills – at 'run-on' rate. You could, if necessary, (and a good idea in my humble opinion), train nurse practitioners to carry out circumcision. (They do at Bradford Royal Infirmary.) For infants it is a simple procedure lasting only a few minutes. None of the formidable list of costly provisions for an older child or an adult day case apply. Yes, there might be a slight addition for the training mentioned, insurance, dressings, disposables etc but these would be small in comparison.

Not costed into any of the above are the spin-off savings in respect of recent research findings. Less cervical cancer, and vaginal infections of partners and no time off work for adult patients.

With NHS current policy of only circumcising when it really is medically necessary, we're looking at £1500 x 30,000 circs = £45m, maybe more?

The nanny government and doctors are always exhorting us to lead healthy lifestyles. We are bombarded with advice: Don't smoke, don't drink or eat too much, avoid unhealthy foods. Do attend screening programmes, have cervical smears, and mammograms and have check-ups at 'well person' clinics. Watch your weight, watch your cholesterol, check your blood sugar, check your blood pressure. Do everything you can to avoid illness and accidents. Think of the savings on NHS budgets, resources and ultimately your taxes. Oh, and DO get your children immunised. BUT DON'T CIRCUMCISE THEM!

Does it stack up?

Editorial

Circumcision as a subject is rarely absent from the media. Often there are questions to 'the doctor' from worried men experiencing foreskin problems or perhaps parents with sons suffering from phimosis. Usually such articles are reasonably balanced, even if they reflect the conservative attitude to circumcision adopted by the UK medical profession. But at the end of September, a quite astonishingly biased article appeared in The Independent. This in effect advocated a total ban on male circumcision. Parents would no longer be able to elect to have their sons circumcised whether for social or religious reasons. It was recognised that the religious ban might meet resistance, but if female circumcision has been outlawed, why not male? As for circumcision for medical reasons – that is unnecessary.

Acorn tries to steer a middle course between roundhead and cavalier and normally such an article would have passed without comment. But this seems a bridge too far, and it is worrying to see the more extreme propaganda of Norm-UK being reprinted by a respected broadsheet.

Meanwhile, a new Yahoo internet group, circuk, has arrived – a UK based pro-circumcision group, for all those in favour of circumcision, or those considering it for themselves or their sons. Whilst such information groups are welcome, isn't this yet another case of the pro-circ lobby preaching exclusively to the converted? It could be that, if they don't get out there and start proselytising about circumcision, they will find that Norm-UK has won the day!

Editor's Interview

Military Cuts

Rumours abound about the attitude of the military to circumcision, and how far it is encouraged/required especially for personnel serving overseas. IDK has contributed previously to Acorn and he kindly agreed to be interviewed about his circumcision observations during service in World War II.

Q: Given your age, I am assuming that you saw military service during World War II?

A: A correct assumption! I had nearly six years including France 1940, 8th army, Egypt, Libya and later Palestine.

Q: I know that you were circumcised as a very young boy. What proportion of the men that you served with do you estimate were also cut?

A: 25%-30%, I was surprised to see so many cut. But there were variations and in one unit it was 40%-50%. I have two photos, each of a group of six including me. In one, four were cut; in the other, only one. Broadly speaking, units I served in had many volunteers comprising young qualified professionals (i.e. at least 21 years) with average age 23-27 and several skilled tradesmen of similar age – and each group had equal proportions cut.

Q: I have heard that circumcision was often prescribed for servicemen overseas in Africa or the Far East. Did you ever come across this?

A: I only came across one soldier who had been sent for circumcision prior to a Middle East posting. I noted his circular bright red scar just back of the ridge and he told me about it (noting my cut as we were bathing, as was the custom, nude). Before a unit went overseas, it was mobilised – all stores, equipment, vehicles checked. At the same time, the men's health, teeth and inoculations were all checked and brought up-to-date etc. 'Short arm inspections' or FFI (Free from infection) inspections were routine. But it was unusual for foreign service to automatically require circumcision. I have heard that it was the custom for the East India company to recommend that all new personnel be 'cut'. My younger brother went to Burma and never had any suggestion that he should be cut.

After the war, in our prefabs, my next door neighbour had served in the Navy, mostly Mediterranean. He was in a motor torpedo boat based at Alexandria with sorties to various Greek Islands where they would hide and rush out on raids. This gave much spare time for sun and sea bathing, as ever, nude. Of the eight or nine crew on his boat, all had been circumcised (including himself) except one – and on returning to Alexandria, he duly went into hospital to be cut. From this my neighbour took it for granted (erroneously) that to be A1 and serve overseas in the Navy, you had to be circumcised. He was generalising from one instance. My brother-in-law was Navy, uncut, A1 and served all round the world!

I can only recall one other case of a man needing circumcision. This was the transport corporal, by his own account a womaniser, 'very active' with his girlfriend. We were mobilised and were going overseas and there was a strong suspicion once we were en route to the Middle East that the girlfriend was pregnant. He even looked into the question of marriage by proxy and all the way out to Cape Town he was worried and agitated. Somehow during our four days there he got word that all was clear and that he was not going to be a father. We duly landed in Egypt and he left the unit to go into hospital to be circumcised. For what reason we knew not – but it could not have been a tight foreskin!

Q: I've also heard that circumcision was routine for anyone treated for VD. Did you come across this happening?

A: There may be some confusion here since often foreskin and genital problems were dealt with in the VD unit. For instance – consider these cases. There was a Batman who, though married, was a bit of a womaniser. Word came through that he was to be released and sent home, being a skilled shipyard worker. He was uncut and found to have some foreskin irritation – so he was sent to the VD department of Aldershot hospital where it was quickly cleared and he was pronounced OK. Another uncut and respectable married man had similar irritation and we all regarded him as honest and decent. The army did not supply sheets or pyjamas – you slept in your shirt – and his problem was caused by blankets! In the Middle East we had mosquito nets etc but rarely used them and we would sleep naked in bed. My great pal (uncut) was asleep, his loose foreskin retracted and a mosquito 'got' him on his glans. He went for necessary treatment at the one and only centre i.e. the VD wing of the hospital.

One young soldier in a unit in the desert requested circumcision and was told it could be done. He was exceedingly modest and bashful. His doctor realised this and told him not to worry – he would be treated in the VD ward because there the orderlies/nurses were all male and there would be no embarrassment!

Although propaganda and statistics up the desert gave very long odds against being killed, the most likely causes of being sent back to the base hospital were burns (petrol) and dysentery. But there was a strong belief that some men achieved base by rubbing sand into their glans and foreskin. Common in the desert were desert sores – any slight cut or abrasion could 'go wrong' and one had to report sick even though the incident was slight. Imagine how quickly a sandy balanitis got one sent down to base! It was said that the hospital at Alexandria had one ward devoted exclusively to doing circumcisions.

So I can't confirm circumcision being a treatment for VD. I suppose only a visit to public records at Kew could give figures and data on circumcisions up the desert.

Interestingly the Health Museum in Cairo had one small room where the walls were 'decorated' with wax(?) models of penises in various states of disease/VD/decay etc – there must have been at least 100 models and all were circumcised.

The army system anti VD was the ET packet – ET being 'early treatment' – these were available in the guard room and anyone going out for an evening's fun was required to collect and as necessary use the contents. These were: cotton wool, soft soap and a tube of mercuric oxide(?), a strong germicide. Before sex, the instructions were to liberally smear "the knob, the ring and the bridle string with mercury ointment and inject some 'up the pipe' before indulging". Just what the female was supposed to do whilst this performance went on beggars belief. Afterwards the organ was to be washed. Condoms, then called French Letters, were not supplied and were seen as good for birth control rather than disease prevention. Interestingly, though, French letters were supplied to both German and Italian troops and we often found them. One war time tale was that among wrecked ships in Tobrook harbour was one containing bodies of prostitutes sent out for the Italian soldiers' comfort.

There was a tale that there was a sadistic NCO orderly at the VD Centre and his delight was to do treatment with an 'umbrella' catheter. This was inserted, opened and excruciatingly pulled out, preferably with a spiral action. The unhappy patient then visited the urinal for relief but the pain was so great that the flush pipes which they gripped were bent and distorted! Obviously fairy tales, but clever propaganda to keep the lads pure!

Q: Did you ever come across any regiments where circumcision was the tradition?

A: At Tobrook in early 1943 I did come across a unit where they all were circumcised. But the reason was that we did recruit and take into the army Jewish and Arab boys/youths and this unit was an Artisan Company (probably similar to the Pioneer Corps) and was Jewish – hence lack of foreskins. But I did find elsewhere a Jewish boy – saved from Vienna just prior to the war – and he had NOT been circumcised. Apparently there are strict rules about the health of the infant and if they are not well they cannot be circumcised on the 8th day – obviously he was a sickly infant and was subsequently overlooked.

Q: Thanks very much for your full answers. Just one last question. Do you think that being circumcised was an advantage to you in the places that you served – and, bearing in mind the current war in Iraq, do you think that there would be advantages in any soldiers due for posting to the Middle East to be circumcised before they go as part of mobilisation?

A: This is a tricky one. I must say Yes to being circumcised being an advantage for me; but I had little experience of foreskins being a disadvantage to those soldiers who still had them. This may have been due to the fact that I was in the RAMC and all service was in Field Hygiene Sections, so knowledge of the sick was virtually nil apart from unit contacts.

As circumcision is not as widely practised as it once was, I have no doubt that it would not be practicable to include it when mobilising troops for Iraq. Further, there would be some who would be strongly opposed to losing their foreskin.

Additionally, it is unlikely that such action would be endorsed by the medical profession – so I'm afraid that circumcising troops en route for Iraq is just a pipe dream.

Through Female Eyes

Many members are interested in the female viewpoint about circumcision. Andras, our Hungarian member, has provided the following translations from a Hungarian language web site of the thoughts of girlfriends, wives and mothers on circumcision.

From a young mother

My good husband is circumcised – he had a tight foreskin, so he was done for medical reasons. Now we must decide whether or not we should get our little boy circumcised. The paediatrician is absolutely for it, so is my husband, and I just cannot decide. They say that a phimosis might develop later, so a boy is not necessarily born with it. (When my husband was operated upon, an old chap in his 70s was also there, and he felt so ashamed to be undergoing circumcision. He said he had never had any problems with it before.)

I have to fight with our son every evening when I want to pull back his skin. Whether it hurts him or he just hates it, I don't know. Anyhow, we still wait a bit.

Anna

In Hungary circumcision is done, unfortunately, only when it is already unavoidable, while in other parts of the world, this little surgery has a prophylactic role. I think a circumcised penis is so different, it is so much more 'masculine' and 'aesthetic' than the other form. This is just my personal opinion, but I am very much for it. I realize that it is becoming popular in Hungary, and not only among neonates and kids, but more and more young men decide to get rid of the foreskin, very often on the advice of their girlfriends or wives.

Nelli

My husband had a short frenulum problem, but no tight foreskin. Nevertheless, the specialist suggested that the whole foreskin be removed, not just a cut through the frenulum. We had our son circumcised at four. His foreskin was stuck to the glans and so tight that he could hardly pee, but we did not try to force it back. Fortunately, he had no serious irritation, just the end of it was a little red. The paediatrician referred us to a doctor at the Children's Hospital in Budapest. Our boy was done on an outpatient basis. He received a general anaesthetic, and we were able to go home the same day. So we had both 'done', and I am very proud of their willies. I think it is just a matter of decision, takes some courage, but once you are over it, then it is fine.

A wife and mother

My husband realised that he had a problem with his equipment only when we started to sleep together. He admitted that he had a tight foreskin when he was a boy. He could hardly pull it back – he could only uncover about one third of the glans.

The specialist offered the simplest solutions: a dorsal slit, cutting through the frenulum, or a partial removal, but he added that if we wanted a complete removal, that would also be very simple and deliver the best results. Naturally, we chose a full circumcision.

We had our two sons fully circumcised at ages of 4 and 5.5 without any hesitation, even though only one of them had a tight foreskin. They have never had any problem with their circumcised organ, nor have they been teased by the others. Moreover, the kindergarten teacher said she was very much in favour of circumcision, when we talked to her about what had happened to our boys.

Livia

When we started dating, three years ago, I realised that my (now) husband had a very serious phimosis. He could hardly pull back the foreskin and it was also difficult to keep it clean. We tried to use lubes and to 'exercise' it, but with very little success. Then after about a year, a friend of ours referred him to a specialist, who suggested a circumcision without delay. He was very helpful and explained the surgery in detail, and offered a choice for the style, whether loose or tight, or high or low. Finally we opted for a tight and high circumcision, with the inner foreskin tightly pulled over the penis shaft.

The operation was done under local anaesthetic and it took about 45 minutes. After a week the sutures were removed and we could try it out a month after the circumcision. The end result: when the penis is flaccid, the skin has some movement, but it is absolutely stretched when he becomes erect; the colour changes at about 4 centimetres below the glans and reveals proudly that he is circumcised. My husband suffered a bit because of the sensitive glans touching his briefs directly, and he very often got an erection, but after about a few weeks, the glans became coarser and all discomfort was gone.

I have never had a circumcised man before, and I can surely say that our sex life has improved so much. First, because we can freely enjoy our bodies; second, because of the circumcision, my husband lasts longer and making love is a lot stronger sensation for me too. On top of all this, a fully circumcised penis looks unbelievably erotic for me. I am very proud of the circumcised prick of my husband.

I fully support the full circumcision of men, and I am sure I can say so on behalf of most women. I have agreed with my husband that we will have our future sons circumcised before we leave the hospital.

Meli

My husband is Nigerian and he got circumcised as a baby. They do the operation because they want to save the child from infections which may evolve under the foreskin, if it remains uncleaned for a few days, and we all know that a lot of boys and men tend to forget to clean themselves down there. If a man is circumcised, then no special care is needed, as it gets clean anyhow at every bathing or showering.

We are expecting a baby now, and if it is a boy, we will get him circumcised before leaving the hospital, and won't wait until he grows up. It will not be painful at all, as it is just a tiny piece of skin, and he won't remember it, like my husband. So anyone who has a son born should do it immediately, but if the kid is older and has not been done yet, it is never too late.

I got circumcised at 20. My then girlfriend (who is now my wife) persuaded me to get it done, and I am still grateful for it. The operation was done at the Urology Department of a Medical School in South Hungary. I had to sign a form, stating that it was solely on my wish and at my risk, etc. They must have been doing a lot of voluntary circumcisions because they had a printed consent form for it. The operation itself lasted for about 45 minutes, and I had no problems whatsoever with it.

A girl

Unfortunately, circumcision is not customary in Hungary, but I am very much for it. I had my first and so far only cut boyfriend in England, and it was so wonderful. Now I do envy the Jewish girls.

I was au pair at a family where they had their two sons circumcised at 4, even though they were both healthy (meaning that they had no problems with their wee-wees). It was very interesting, as I had not seen such a thing before.

The Cruellest Cut Of All

An article by Jerome Burne from *The Independent

Every day for the past six months, John has been wearing two 6oz metal ball-bearings attached by straps to the end of his penis. He's not a fetishist; he's on a course of DIY plastic surgery to correct what was, in his view, a terrible wrong inflicted on him when he was a baby. John was circumcised and he wants his foreskin back.

Your first reaction might be that John is the sort of chap who could have featured in one of Graham Norton's trawls through the wackier shores of the web. But the organisation he belongs to, known as Norm-UK, boasts the art critic Brian Sewell as its patron and features a number of doctors on its board. Largely unnoticed by the wider public, the once uncontroversial topic of male circumcision has become hot. One campaigner claims that it violates at least seven human rights.

Forty or 50 years ago, circumcision was unremarkable – as many as half of newborn male babies in the UK were circumcised on the grounds that it was more hygienic and could protect them against conditions such as penile and prostate cancer as well as urinary tract infections. Such claims proved to be unfounded, and the number of circumcisions has plunged to between four and six per cent, most of which are said to be done for therapeutic reasons. (Figures are hard to come by, as records are based on medical, not religious, circumcisions.) Recent guidelines issued by Canadian surgeons declare that “circumcision performed on a healthy infant is now considered a non-therapeutic and medically unnecessary intervention”, and UK doctors’ associations agree.

The change is a triumph for evidence-based medicine, but it raises some tricky questions. If circumcision is medically unnecessary, is it right to subject small babies to it? At the moment, parents who want to have their child circumcised on the grounds of personal choice only need to find a doctor who is willing to do it privately. The aim of Norm-UK – which takes its name from the American National Organisation for Restoring Men – is to make this unacceptable.

A particularly delicate area of this debate is the issue of religious circumcision. Official bodies usually defend it on the grounds of religious freedom and cultural toleration, but some of the more hardline Norm members point out that such sensibilities have not prevented governments outlawing so-called female circumcision. “Circumcision is one of the very few non-therapeutic operations that can be done without the consent of the person being operated on”, says David Smith, the manager of Norm-UK. “It’s a scandal that young boys are mutilated unnecessarily.”

But if most of the operations are done to cure a medical condition, what is wrong with that? The main reason for a therapeutic circumcision is to treat a condition called phimosis – a tight foreskin that won’t retract. “Parents get worried and want something done even if it is not causing any problem”, says Dr John Warren, a consultant physician at Princess Alexandra Hospital in Harlow, and founder of Norm-UK. “But research published as long ago as 1968 found that 90 per cent of tight foreskins resolved themselves by the age of four and 99 per cent were normal by 17.” The charity also claims it is possible to treat most cases non-surgically.

Last month, Norm-UK delivered a letter to the British Association of Paediatric Surgeons (BAPS) declaring that “most therapeutic circumcisions performed by the NHS are unnecessary” and backed it up with 109 journal references. BAPS 2001 guidelines say: “...there is rarely a clinical indication for circumcision... Doctors should be aware of this and reassure parents accordingly.”

The official position of the British Medical Association – “It is unethical to circumcise if research shows that less invasive techniques are available” – is equally general. It is dismissed as “meaningless” by Smith. “If you take your child to the GP and say you are worried about his non-retracting foreskin, the only solution you are likely to be offered is circumcision.”

But debates about individual rights and medical judgements miss what is for many the central objection to circumcision – that it is an assault on male sexuality. The operation removes the prepuce that covers and protects the head, or glans, of the penis, which is made up of an outer skin and an inner mucosa. “Until the mid-Nineties, it was possible to claim that the foreskin was just a flap of skin”, says Smith. “But then research showed that the inner mucosa contains up to 40,000 nerve endings that make a man more sensitive during sex.”

For many circumcised men this is not a problem. Some even claim decreased sensitivity is a bonus because it allows them to ‘keep going’ for longer. But Norm-UK claims that men experience a variety of negative feelings as a result of losing their foreskins, including “low self-esteem over body image”, “a sense of betrayal by parents, especially the mother” and “anger and hostility towards doctors”.

The process of restoration can help resolve these problems. Although you can’t re-create those lost nerve endings, you can recover the uncircumcised look and provide a covering for your glans which, ideally, responds by becoming thinner-skinned and more sensitive. All it takes is some straps, tapes and weights, and about three years.

There is no shortage of devices for sale on the internet with names like Pul-Man, TLC Tugger, Foreballs and Tug Ahoy. Foreballs, for instance, is a stainless steel barbell weighing up to 12oz and costing $130 (£72). You attach it with tape and let it hang. “Some men have got their foreskin back in six months”, says Wayne Griffiths, founder of the American Norm. “But usually you have to wear something for two years.”

One happy restorer is the Norm-UK member Alan Wood. “After years of dedicated stretching, taping and tugging”, he exults, “I am finally released from the shackles of inhibition.” His glans, he reports, is more moist and much more sensitive, while masturbating has new dimensions.

Sewell is listed as the patron of Norm-UK, but he is not the most wholehearted of supporters nor, he says, is he in need of restoration. Where Sewell does show solidarity with the organisation is on the human rights issue. “I do think it is something that people should be allowed to choose”, he agrees. “Doctors are very lazy about such matters and far too likely to take a thoughtless snip.”

Foreskins: The Facts

Doctors began to promote circumcision in the 1850s as a cure for masturbation, then seen as a cause of insanity, epilepsy, hysteria, tuberculosis, short-sightedness and death.

In Finland, where no one is circumcised at birth, only one man in 16,667 has it done subsequently.

Foreskins removed from babies are in great demand by biomedical companies who use them in the manufacture of insulin and for producing artificial skin. A single foreskin is said to be able to grow 250,000 square feet of skin.

Last year, during the ‘circumcision season’ in South Africa, when manhood rituals take place, there were five penis amputations and 12 deaths due to botched ceremonies.

In May this year David Reimer committed suicide aged 38. He first became famous as living proof that gender is decided socially. He was castrated very young after a circumcision went wrong and destroyed his penis. He was given hormone treatment and 'successfully' bought up as a girl, Brenda. Later he rebelled and insisted on recovering his male identity.

There are websites devoted to what is known as 'recreational or fetish circumcision'. These contain erotic fantasies about forcefully circumcising a man and collecting foreskins. Members 'share stories and pictures of circumcision'. A woman who is only sexually aroused by circumcised males is called an 'acuculophile'.

Freelance circumciser Omunnakwe Amechi was charged last year in a London court with wounding two boys aged 14 and 19 months when he operated on them in their front rooms. The boys had to go to hospital and needed transfusions and corrective surgery. Amechi declared that he had been circumcising since 1995. He was acquitted.

Helmets

Many years ago, while living in the USA, I bought a paperback book entitled Man's Body in which a small paragraph was devoted to circumcision and a much larger article on the sizes and shapes of helmets. There were three line drawings showing basic helmet shapes i.e. bottle, bulbous and prow (pointed) shaped, together with some statistics on the most common types. I believe that bulbous was followed by bottle and prow.

Is any Acorn member aware of any such grading appearing in any other articles? I submitted a letter on this topic to Acorn many years ago and I sent the three line drawings with the letter, not keeping a copy. The letter was never published.

The publisher is Bantam Books ISBN 0-553-10928-6, published 1977.

Mission Accomplished

I was fascinated by circumcised penises from my earliest memories. I remember playing with the boy next door at about 3 years old and we played with each other's cocks. He was like all the local boys, neatly cut, although in his case radically circumcised. I seemed to be the only boy who was different and I hated my cock with its knob covered by a sleeve of skin. I kept wondering why I was different. When I was five I went to school and discovered there were a few boys like me. How ugly they looked compared to those with exposed knobs. Then one day one boy had to go to hospital and when he came back I discovered he had a rather sore willy but that he had somehow lost that loose skin. On questioning him, he explained that he hadn't been able to pull the skin back (as I could) and so they had cut it off. He said it was called circumcision. All was now clear to me.

As I grew older and changed schools, I kept a careful survey of the status of boys when we were in the changing rooms. Around half the boys were like me and the others all had bare knobs. Some I noticed had skin bunched against the knob and a couple of boys had skin covering half the knob – a very slack cut. But the majority had a beautifully exposed knob, and a smooth shaft with no wrinkles at all. One particular friend and I often examined each other minutely and I remember him saying he was glad he didn't have all the loose skin that was on my cock. He had been radically cut and inner skin seemed to cover the whole of his shaft with no trace of a scar. I was absolutely green with envy and vowed that one day I would have a cock like his.

When I was eighteen I had my first girlfriend and eventually my first sexual encounter which wasn't a great success.

She had never seen a foreskin before as a previous boyfriend and her brother had been cut but on seeing me she was not over impressed. This made me even more determined to get rid of that horrid foreskin. All through my school days I had tried to keep the skin back using rubber bands, tape, glue – all to no avail. The trouble was the knob was so sensitive that I would get randier and randier until I would have to have a wank, and then I would have to rehood the knob to cool down. The longest I ever went bare was three days.

I went to the doctor and said that I was having trouble with my foreskin but of course he could find nothing wrong and, to my embarrassment, sent me away. In the 1950's there were no clinics and I could not return to the doctor so I had to cut off the skin myself. I decided as a start only to remove half the skin and to do the job in stages. One day I was feeling exceptionally randy, and got scissors and bandages and savlon cream and pulled on the foreskin and snipped towards the corona. I was so excited by what I was doing that I was oblivious to any pain and I cut almost up to the corona before cutting right and left. I then ended with a huge bunch of skin hanging from the frenum which I did find painful to remove. Inadvertently I had taken off more skin than I had intended and had achieved a slack circumcision. Very little bleeding occurred and I pushed back the remaining inner skin to join the severed outer, then smeared savlon over a gauze bandage and wrapped up my bruised cock, now feeling drained and exhausted. Healing was rapid, and I had a wank four days later and left off the bandage after a fortnight. Those first days of bareness were incredible – I kept thinking the thing had come out of my pants. I just couldn't believe it – I was circumcised. After all those years of longing, I was now one of the others – circumcised.

It was quite amazing what a boost it was to my confidence to be cut like my friends. It had always seemed that the cut boys were the successful ones in class and sport, and in the changing rooms always strutted around proudly showing off their circumcised status for all to see, unlike the uncut ones who tended to be retiring and covered themselves up in the changing rooms.

Girl friends always enjoyed touching me unlike that first occasion and sex was wonderful. However, after a year or two, I started to wish I didn't have the spare skin bunched behind the glans. So one day I decided to have another go to tighten it up. This time it was easy as I decided to leave the ventral side alone and cut away about one inch of inner skin from the top and sides. Again I felt very little pain and there was no bleeding to speak of. The cutting only took about a minute and then I wrapped a thin gauze with savlon on it around the cut area. As before, I didn't attempt to use stitches (much too painful) so as there was effectively no slackness in the shaft skin now I stuck lengthways along the shaft strips of tape to the glans pulling the shaft skin down to ensure there was no tension on the cut. This again worked very successfully although healing took a bit longer. When it was fully healed, I had achieved my ultimate ambition – I was radically circumcised with virtually no scar. In hindsight I would have preferred to have removed shaft skin instead of inner skin and also there is a bit more tissue on the ventral side around the frenulum than I would ideally like. However, I am delighted with what I have achieved and still get a thrill when I see my beautiful circumcised cock.

Some years later, a friend of long standing commented on my change and asked me where it had been done. I told him it was a DIY job and he was most impressed.

A day or two later he asked me if I could do the same for him as he had long wanted to be circumcised. He told me that he knew about an anaesthetising cream to deaden the pain so we discussed how he wanted it done: maximum inner skin left. We arranged a day and I got to work using the same technique I had used on myself. I am glad to say the result was excellent and I was a trifle jealous that it was better than my own job. Sadly, work took him away and I haven't seen him now for some while.

Penny Drops For Private Insurer

Readers may remember my article in issue 4/2004 The Economics of Circumcision, pointing out the false economy of NHS thinking on Routine Infant Circumcision.

Recently, whilst surfing the web on a US parenting site, I found a thread where expectant moms were discussing the merits of circumcision, and who had or was going to circumcise their sons. RIC is a hot topic on many of these maternity message boards these days.

I quote from one enlightened mother:

“While I do agree it is very personal decision. I have circumcised both my boys and I am very happy that I did for numerous reasons. But I did get a very interesting piece of information the other day. When I got my insurance benefits information from my obstetrician's office, it said they had contacted my insurance and the following was the amounts they would cover: listed in that was circumcision.

I got very curious because it is a ‘cosmetic’ surgery and in this day it seems like you have to fight for coverage. I called my insurance company and they said they started covering circumcision last year because they were finding more people would circumcise if covered and they were having a major increase in circumcisions in older children where they then had to pay for the circumcision, general anaesthesia, and other expenses associated with surgery. They found by covering infant circumcisions it was reducing the medically needed expensive circumcisions later.” (Chelsea)

Now I've frequently read of US opponents of circumcision crowing about US insurance companies' dropping of this cover and thus proving it is ‘unnecessary cosmetic surgery’. When you remember that insurance companies employ people who do nothing else but pore over figures all day, to calculate premiums and cover, so they don't lose out, this has to be a pretty significant piece of news!

Foreskin problems are not rare at all. Most men will experience some trouble at some stage in their lives. Not all will end in circumcision, but enough obviously do to persuade this insurance company to change its rules.

I'm not sure what view the UK Health Insurers take of elective circumcision, but I know they used to cover it. We had friends who circumcised their son when father changed jobs and acquired private health insurance as part of his package. The son didn't need circumcising but mother wanted him done to match father who was cut shortly after their wedding. From her side of the conversation it was clear she was very pro circumcision.

Last time I looked, BUPA seemed to be covering circumcision in their maternity package. Perhaps others with PHI can check on their cover and report? Considering how the cost escalates as a child grows older, and reaches £1000+ by adulthood, it seems the actuaries of the insurance companies are canny enough to appreciate what the blinkered bean counters of the NHS can't.

Marlon Brando RIP

Marlon Brando died on 2nd July this year. In his autobiography Songs my mother taught me, he recounts his interest in meditation and how he used it for pain control – even to the point of seeking to be circumcised without anaesthetic.

“The more I have meditated, the more I have been able to control not only stress in my life, but pain. If I have a headache or stub my toe, I'm often able to locate the pain in my mind and will it away. So confident am I of this ability that when I decided a few years ago to be circumcised, I asked the doctor to do it without a pain-killer. I assured him that I could eliminate the pain using mind control during the operation. He was sceptical but said it would be an interesting medical experience and he scheduled the operation. But when I arrived at the hospital, what seemed like its entire medical staff was waiting to witness the event. The prospect of seeing a movie star circumcised without anaesthesia must have been a hot topic of discussion in the doctors' lounge. I didn't welcome the presence of uninvited guests, and since I go by instinct, I went home.

“Later a different doctor agreed to do the operation without pain-killers, but he became frightened and an anaesthetist was waiting for me when I kept my appointment. He said that because of medical ethics he couldn’t circumcise me without using a pain-killer. Disappointed and angry but tired of the delays, I let the anaesthetist give me a shot in the back. To this day, I’m sure that if they hadn’t given me the shot, I would have felt no pain.”

Beckham – The Truth At Last

The Sunday Mirror for 10th October contains an interview with Danielle Heath, the beauty therapist who is the latest to claim a liaison with David Beckham. And this is what she has to say about his equipment:

“I played with him a bit but was surprised to find he had no hair on his balls. His willy is big though – a good eight inches. And for the record, he is not circumcised.”

So now we know ... don't we?

Muslim Circumcision

I am a very strong supporter of circumcision and always have been. However, in my opinion, circumcision should only be carried out on religious grounds. The only exception is in cases of paraphimosis where the foreskin is unable to be made loose by pulling and stretching as I described in my article Save that foreskin (issue 4/2004). It is a great deal easier to treat cases of phimosis where virtually almost all cases can be cured. This I know to be true after reading a book that mentioned a doctor in France who over several years worked with and treated a large number of boys who had tight foreskins and not once did he send any of the boys to get circumcised. He also encouraged all of the boys to masturbate as masturbation helps to keep the foreskin in its loose, natural state. From an Islamic point of view, masturbation is neither approved or disapproved. It is better than having sexual intercourse outside marriage but it is expected that self control will be put into practice at all times.

I am a convert to Islam but being circumcised had absolutely nothing to do with my conversion. That took place in 1965 at the age of 18 but I was circumcised when I was a year old. This was on medical grounds – I had paraphimosis which caused me a great deal of pain and discomfort especially during urination. This is what my parents told me; personally I can’t remember any of it or being circumcised.

Circumcision is part of Islam. It isn’t mentioned anywhere in the Quran but it is Sunnah (Way of the Prophet P.B.U.H.) Muslims believe that the Prophet (P.B.U.H.) was born circumcised and that he was the only perfect human being to have lived. After he died he left the Quran and the Sunnah as a guide to follow and also his Haddith (sayings of the Prophet P.B.U.H.), and it is compulsory for all males born in Islam to undergo circumcision. As in Judaism, the glans should be completely uncovered. Most circumcisions on Muslim boys are carried out in hospitals with the remainder taking place in mosques and elsewhere. The age is normally under one year, but amongst the Turkish community it is older, between the ages of three and seven or eight.

With regard to male converts there are two schools of thought. One says that male converts must be circumcised, the other says that they need not be. The older and more conservative generation describe a male born as a Muslim who remains uncircumcised as being in a state of filth. This description applies only to Muslims who are uncircumcised. I wrote a letter about this to Acorn in 1994 or thereabouts after I read a letter about a Muslim member who like myself was a member of Acorn. My letter I felt was grossly misunderstood by a number of members who wrote in stating that they weren't in "a state of filth" having a foreskin. My comments weren't a personal attack on any of the uncircumcised non-Muslim members. I was merely encouraging the Muslim brother to get circumcised and also his young sons who were also uncircumcised. I hope this time that there won't be any misunderstanding.

I am part Turkish through my great grandmother who was of Scottish and Turkish descent and like me was born and bred in Scotland. One of my Turkish Muslim brothers who lives in London is a medically qualified circumciser and various Mosques and Muslim families contact him to circumcise their sons and also male converts. We are very close friends as well as being Brothers in Islam. During the conflicts in Bosnia and Kosovo, many of the refugees came to London and some of them were placed in a Turkish Mosque. It was discovered that some of the teenage boys and young men were still uncircumcised. (The Communist regime in the former Yugoslavia tried to ban circumcision completely.) My friend was sent for by the Mosque and he circumcised all the teenage boys and most of the young men in their twenties. Whenever I go to London, I always go to that Mosque. It is in North London near the Turkish area. I was with him in the Mosque and he showed me his circumcision medical instruments and later on he went into one of the rooms to start circumcising. By that time all of the teenage boys had been circumcised thus leaving the young men. I spoke to five or six of the Kosovans and that day they weren't ready to be circumcised, but they were done at a later date again at the Mosque. When I spoke to them a few days afterwards, they were all pleased to be circumcised although a few were still in a state of being tender and a bit uncomfortable.

I very much enjoy being a member of Acorn and the newsletters are far better and more interesting with photos of circumcised and uncircumcised penises. I would however like to see more of our uncircumcised brothers-in-Humanity joining and becoming members of Acorn.

A number of times I have read letters written by fellow circumcised members describing the uncircumcised penis as boyish. I find that offensive as only a man can father children and not boys. Personally I find the foreskin on an uncircumcised man very manly and adult looking and not boyish at all. In fact, the longer the foreskin, the better it is. I would like to write to any uncircumcised member of Acorn who like myself is open minded. I would also like to read more letters about masturbation in future newsletters.

Editorial

Christmastide again! There are small (or perhaps not so small) presents for you all on page 10 – but I leave it to each of you to decide how you wish to unwrap the packages!

And now to my list of exhortations:

First: enclosed with this edition is the annual renewal notice. Please make the lives of the Treasurer and myself easier by returning it now with your subscription, rather than waiting for a reminder.

Second: details are also enclosed of the next Acorn meeting in April. A plea from the organiser, Douglas, that you book by the deadline – otherwise this time he really will cancel if enough people have not registered by the due date.

Third: in that quiet period after Christmas when there is little to do but watch old films or videos, why not get out your pen and write something, however short, for the Acorn magazine. As I have said before, the worst an editor can suffer is silence – and there's been a fairly deathly hush from most of you of late.

We shall be back in the New Year with more tales of foreskins and (in some cases) their removal. Happy Hogmanay!

The Solitary Vice

Masturbation. Eighty per cent of men admit to the practice. The other twenty per cent lie – or so it is said.

Masturbation had a bad press in Victorian times. Described as the solitary vice, it was seen as laying the foundations for multiple ailments including epilepsy, consumption, paralysis and heart disease. It weakened the memory, or caused a boy to be careless, negligent, listless or even to lose his mind. Victims when grown to adulthood sometimes committed suicide!

If masturbation was the problem, what was the solution? Chastity belts were certainly one possibility – covering the organs with some form of cage to prevent access from wandering hands. Infibulation was also tried – closing the foreskin opening with some form of piercing, to prevent both access and erections. But by far the most popular solution was circumcision. This had a perfect logic. Masturbation was carried out by drawing the foreskin forwards and back over the glans to provide stimulation and eventual orgasm and ejaculation. If the foreskin was removed by circumcising the boy, preferably as tightly as possible to allow no slack in the skin, the means of stimulating the glans was removed and the hateful practice thus prevented.

Dr. E. J. Spratling, who promoted this surgery in the 1890's, advised that "to obtain the best results one must cut away enough skin and mucous membrane to rather put it on the stretch when erections come later. There must be no play in the skin after the wound has thoroughly healed, but it must fit tightly over the penis, for should there be any play the patient will be found to readily resume his practice not begrudging the time and extra energy required to produce the orgasm... We may not be sure that we have done away with the possibility of masturbation, but we may feel confident that we have limited it to within the danger lines."

There was also a secondary way in which circumcision promoted a cure. Inattention to personal hygiene in the uncircumcised could cause irritation, and the relief of the irritation by rubbing or scratching could lead on to the dreaded masturbation. Remove the prepuce, no irritation, no temptation.

In order that circumcision should be a salutary experience for the boy, it was sometimes performed without anaesthetic. In his 1877 book, Plain facts for old and young, Kellogg, the inventor of the cornflake and a campaigner against the evils of masturbation, wrote: "The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anaesthetic, as the brief pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment, as it may well be in some cases."

The discomfort caused by the operation was also an advantage in Kellogg's eyes: "The soreness which continues for several weeks interrupts the practice, and if it had not previously become too firmly fixed, it may be forgotten."

Circumcision was not just a cure for masturbation – it had a curative effect in a wide range of illnesses. For instance, to quote Kellogg again: “In another case, in which phimosis also existed, there was paralysis of a few of the muscles of the leg, which produced club-foot. Circumcision was also performed in this case, and the child returned in a few weeks completely cured, without any other application, though it had previously been treated in a great variety of ways without success, all the usual remedies for club-foot proving ineffectual.”

That circumcision was widely practised to counter masturbation can be inferred from the article in this edition: A poetic cut. In about 1873, A. E. Housman, the poet, was circumcised at the age of 14 together with his four younger brothers. The reason for this was a mystery to his sister who recorded the event in her diary. But the age of Housman may be a giveaway. Caught in the act of, or confessing to, masturbation brought application of the best remedy known – and at the same time preventative action was taken in respect of the younger brothers who had not yet reached puberty.

But it is a mystery why circumcision as a cure for masturbation survived more than one generation. An uncircumcised father, faced with a masturbating son, might well agree to the cure of circumcision. But when that son himself became a (circumcised) father, surely he would know that the cure had been ineffective. (Can we really believe that circumcision stopped Victorian boys masturbating?) So why did he agree to the circumcision of his sons, and they in turn to the circumcision of their sons down the generations. Perhaps shame or hypocrisy played their parts. For circumcised fathers to state that circumcision was ineffective as a cure for masturbation would be to confess that they were still self polluters. One suspects that the solitary vice in Victorian times was practised covertly and never confessed. Thus the ineffective cure of circumcision could be promoted from generation to generation, with no-one willing to bear witness to its ineffectiveness.

Adult men contemplating circumcision often worry about whether they will still be able to jack off. In fact, research shows that, if anything, circumcised men masturbate more frequently than their uncircumcised counterparts. Why this should be one can only conjecture. The permanent exposure of the glans brought about by circumcision could be one cause. Of course, immediately after circumcision, the newly exposed glans is very sensitive and contact with underclothes etc can be an exquisite form of torture. But even when the glans has settled down (which for RICs is at a few days old!), it is still far more open to stimulation from the movements of everyday life than the glans of the uncut penis, protected as it is by the foreskin. This awareness may well encourage additional stimulation on a more regular basis than where the stimulation is more muted or non existent. It would be ironic indeed if circumcision had the exact contrary effect to that desired by the Victorian moralists.

So how do cut men masturbate? In many and varied ways! The point of course is that masturbation involves stimulation of the glans. For the uncut guy, the foreskin is at hand (literally!) to perform this service. Lack of a foreskin does not prevent stimulation of the glans, it just takes a little more imagination. The mistake that uncut guys often make in trying to masturbate a circumcised partner is to masturbate him as if he were uncut i.e. to try to stimulate the glans by drawing shaft skin up over the glans as if it were a foreskin. If the guy has a very loose cut, this may work. But where the cut is tight and there is no spare skin on the erect shaft, only soreness is likely to result! The answer of course is to use the hand as a surrogate foreskin to stimulate the glans, and many and varied are the grips employed. For a whole website dedicated to pleasuring yourself, go to www.jackinworld.com

But perhaps an exploration of masturbation techniques is a little too off-topic for the Acorn magazine? Why not let me know what you think – and at the same time, let me know about your favourite technique – unless you are one of the 20% who lie!

An Irish Odyssey

I am an only son with four sisters, one of them younger than myself. As there was very little difference between our ages and as it was just after the last war, economy was the order of the day. So all five of us slept in the same room in two beds. We were young and innocent.

I first became aware of my foreskin as a five year old, and was curious about what was inside. After many painful attempts, I was able to pull it back. I was really delighted with my new discovery. I decided to show off my little red knob to my four sisters. Three of them really liked the look of the glans of my penis. The other thought my penis with the foreskin pulled back looked 'horrible'.

Strangely, the sisters who liked me skinned back have all had their sons circumcised, but the one who thought it looked horrible with the skin back had three sons and they were left intact. I never discussed the subject of circumcision with any of them. I got circumcised about 25 years ago – more about that later. Some years ago, we were all assembled at our parents' house. As always, doors were never locked – our house was like a naturist club! Whilst I was drying myself after a bath, one of my sisters came in and saw me naked – the first time in many years. She just passed a comment about how much nicer I looked circumcised. She must have told the others as when I entered the room where they were, they all gave me a little smile.

I never knew anything about circumcision one way or the other until I went to London in the 60's. There used to be a Turkish baths just off the Edgware Road. Out of curiosity I ventured in and enjoyed the experience. In my innocence, I knew nothing about the gay community. They all seemed straight to me. Anyway, that is where I discovered that there was a difference between penises, and that the ones that looked different to mine were more attractive looking. I got some sex educational books and learnt about circumcision. So I set off on a mission that was to last for more than a decade, going to doctors up and down the length and breadth of England and Ireland. I tried anything and everything to keep my foreskin back – tapes, glue, super-glue – all to no avail. Finally, I developed an incurable rash on my foreskin – there was no cure!!! So I was booked into the local hospital to be circumcised. It was a very wonderful experience. My wife brought me to the hospital and whilst I was getting ready for bed, my wife and the nurse were discussing the procedure and the nurse told my wife that it was a sensible thing to do and that it would be the end of my problems.

So I got the full treatment, going to the theatre for a general anaesthetic. I was prepared the first night. The nurses wanted to bath me. When I informed them that I had had a bath before I left home, they still insisted as I had to be shaved. And the following morning before I went down, a younger nurse was sent in to prepare me again, and she was armed with a razor. Thinking back, when the senior nurses saw how embarrassed I was, they set out to embarrass both the younger nurse and myself. As you can imagine, I ended up with a good hard-on, and that, I thought, was the last I was going to see of my foreskin. But that was where I was wrong. After a few days at home, with the swelling gone down and the dressing removed, I discovered that only half of my foreskin had been removed – only a 50% success rate.

After a couple of years, through a lady by the name of Doris Milward (she used to write for a naturist magazine) I was put in touch with a surgeon in Harley Street in London. I was in and out in less than an hour, and it cost less than £50 plus the cost of travel. There were just two injections into my groin, I lay down on his couch, he marked a line around where he was going to cut. There was no pain at all except from the two injections. He also gave me female hormone pills to stop me from getting erections so that there would be no strain on the stitches.

Finally, as I have learnt about the different styles and cuts, I don't quite know what style I have. Sometimes there is a lot of bunching of skin behind the rim and there are times when the skin covers more than half my glans. My penis is shown in the photographs. It varies in length when soft between 3 inches and 4.5 inches and goes to 6.25 inches when erect. I hope that, from the photos, someone can tell me what style of circumcision I have and advise me if I can afford to get any more skin removed to prevent the bunching and the skin covering the glans. If I can get some shaft skin removed, what would the results look like and what should I ask the doctor to do?

Life Living With My Aunt

My mother departed this earth when I was only 11 years old and I was brought up by my auntie Winnie. Auntie Win was always there for me and always gave me my bath from a very early age. In those days it was the old tin bath in front of the kitchen fire. She would give me my bath and then I had to stand up in the bath for her to pull my foreskin back and give my bare knob a good soaping. She would pull my foreskin right back as far as she could and while holding the skin back with one hand she would soap my knob well with the other hand. Sometimes it would sting a bit if the old Lifebuoy soap got into my pee hole. Also my bare knob was very sensitive at that time and was quite tender to touch. My willie would start to get a bit hard, which she seemed to like seeing and said that it was quite normal to get hard when a lady touched your willie.

She always wanted to make sure that my foreskin was not too tight and this happened every time I had a bath. Auntie Win was a nurse by trade so I thought she knew what she was doing and, looking back, I suppose that she did.

In the evening when it was just her and me, she did not like me wearing pants and trousers – the less clothes the better. She liked me to have a bare bum and willie and she always said that I should keep my foreskin pulled back all of the time when at home. If the skin came forward, she would either come up to me and pull it back herself or just say to me to pull your skin back.

When I asked her what being circumcised meant, she did explain to me and showed me where the skin would be cut off and why some boys had to be circumcised. She also carried on to say that I did not need circumcising because my foreskin was not too tight. But I would like to have been circumcised at an early age while I was with my aunt. She was only about 25 years old and had a very beautiful body. and she loved having me around. She too would get around the house with just a silk negligee on which was always open down the front showing all she had including a nice shaven pubes which showed her lovely crease.

This was all a matter of course – nakedness was the thing in the house and was very enjoyable. Neither of us bothered to hide anything and we had a carefree life together. I could not have wished for a better lady to look after me. This all went on for some years until I was about 15 years old. By this time when she pulled my foreskin right back I would get quite a hard on, but she said it was quite normal for me to get this way.

Later in life I did decide to be circumcised and have never regretted it. I can fully recommend it to anyone of any age – go for it, I had no pain and no problems. I just wish I could have it done all over again. The feeling was great to see that piece of skin being thrown onto the dish on the operating table.

I have had many experiences with many girls in my time and the majority of them liked the fact that I was circumcised, especially those which liked sucking my penis. Also I am fully shaven down there which saves them getting a mouthful of hair. This does make a lot of difference. This is a true record of my life as a youngster. I hope that you like it.

I would love to hear from anybody with their experiences via the Acorn mailbox.

Next Meeting of the Acorn Society

At the meeting of the Society in Leicester on 13th November, members proposed that the Society should meet again on Saturday 2nd April 2005 with an option of accommodation on the night of 1st April for those that want it. Details of costs and methods of booking are on the booking form enclosed with this edition.

Four members present at the last meeting have already told me that they are not free to attend the proposed April meeting. If it is necessary I shall need to cancel the provisional booking with the hotel by 31st December.

Please let me know as soon as possible, and certainly no later than 20th December if it is your intention to attend the meeting and you require accommodation. Call Douglas on 07788 126706, evening and weekends, send an email to treasurer@acornsoc.org.uk, or complete and return the booking slip.

Poetic Cut

The poetry of A E (Alfred) Housman has proved a rich source of inspiration to English composers. Ralph Vaughan Williams, Arthur Somerville, George Butterworth, Ivor Gurney, John Ireland, Ernest John Moeran, all have set his verse to music, The Shropshire Lad particularly receiving multiple settings. Housman's poetry, written from the late 19th century onwards, reflects on the transitory nature of youth and mourns the early death of young men, particularly in war, thus pre-echoing the slaughter of the first World War.

East and west on fields forgotten
Bleach the bones of comrades slain
Lovely lads and dead and rotten;
None that go return again.

A biography of Housman records his traumatic teenage experiences with respect to sexual matters. A recently appointed governess disgusted him by her immoral behaviour, behaviour which she had managed to conceal from his father. This unpleasant episode made Arthur think of sex between men and women as something rather repulsive, an impression which was confirmed by the guidance on sexual matters which was given to him at about this time by his father, who appears to have concentrated on warning him about the dangers of giving way to sexual desires.

Not long after this, at a time when Alfred was at least fourteen, Edward (his father) took it into his head to have all the boys in the family circumcised. Alfred's sister Kate later commented:

"I do not think it was to fulfil a scriptural rite that he sought, for there was no Abrahamic tradition in our family; but on sanitary mosaic lines. I think he considered it would contribute to their physical salvation – as perhaps it did. He ought to have thought of it in their babyhood. It was severe treatment, mentally and physically, for well-grown boys, and a great mystery at the time to the younger ones who made open complaint, with a mixture of importance and resentment, of the ill-treatment which had befallen them while my sister and I were staying in Lyme Regis."

Kate may have been mystified as to the reasons for the circumcisions, although the phrase "their physical salvation" gives a clue. Certainly it is not hard for us to conjecture the purpose. Alfred's father was concerned about him giving way to sexual desires. Such sexual desires must have included masturbation. And the recommended cure for masturbation at that time was... circumcision. And since, once the younger brothers reached puberty, they would be open to the same temptations, it must have seemed sensible to have them circumcised at the same time.

All this took place in 1873 or 1874 in Worcestershire, which shows that the popularity of circumcision had penetrated deep into the rural counties by that time.

She Wants Me Circumcised!

[The following question and answer appeared in a Daily Mail advice column in December 2003.]

Question:

I have been dating an American girl for a few months. Everything is excellent apart from her constant request that I have a circumcision. The thought is not a very welcome one and I have refused. This seems to be affecting our sex life now.

Can you advise me as to how I can talk her out of her request/demand?

Response:

Circumcision is more popular in America so it is possible that she believes you need to have it done because it is more 'normal' to her. It is important to ask her why she wants you to do this. My guess is that she will say it is because it is cleaner and more satisfying for sex. Neither of these arguments is true. As long as you wash under the foreskin daily your penis will be as clean as a circumcised one. And sexual satisfaction is no different in an uncircumcised man to a circumcised one.

There are some risks to having a circumcision performed in later life (as with any operation that involves an anaesthetic). You may find the operation causes numbness and soreness for some time. In addition, some men find the whole thing so emotionally traumatising it prevents them from enjoying sex afterwards.

My suggestion is that you explain all this to her and say that if she wants you then she gets a full foreskin as part of the deal! Your relationship is still very new and there is plenty of time to make an informed decision at some point in the future if you really want to. For now, concentrate on building a relationship that is not determined by how your penis looks but by how compatible you are in other ways

Because President Bush and Democratic presidential candidate Senator John Kerry were deemed too divisive for the annual Alfred E. Smith political dinner, the crowd heard from former President Bush and former New York Governor Hugh Carey instead.

But without the presidential candidates, George H.W. Bush had to come up with new material. Bush saved some barbs for his son – and in particular his famed malapropisms.

Bush said, “He wrote a paper when he was in fifth grade in which he said ‘in 1519 Ferdinand Magellan circumcised the world’”.

Four Foreskins For Christmas

Just to show that there is no bias against the cavalier tendency, here are four photos of the uncut variety for your delectation. And for those of you who favour the roundhead look, you can just fantasise about exactly the style cut you would give them if they found themselves on your operating table!

My Six Circumcisions – Part 1

On the subject of circumcision, I can claim to be somewhat of an expert, because, as an experiment instituted voluntarily by myself, I have been circumcised six times, each operation being done two years after the previous one. I had myself circumcised, progressively, one inch at a time of my redundant foreskin.

Before my first circumcision I had ten inches of loose shaft skin between the base of my penis and the rim of my penis head, a distance of four inches, leaving six full inches of redundant skin in a double layer, folded over the glans of my penis. Now I have just four inches of smooth, taut skin covering the same distance of my flaccid penis.

From a very young age, after noticing the very attractive penises of many of my circumcised little friends, I had longed to be circumcised and always felt neglected by my parents in my having to endure a foreskin. I tried my best to train my foreskin to stay retracted, with no luck. The best I could do was to wrap a piece of rubber tube around the shaft, just behind the rim of the glans, so the foreskin had to fold over it, and I would appear at least partly circumcised in group showers and changing rooms.

Before my first circumcision, I masturbated almost every day from the age of thirteen, and I nearly always drew the foreskin fully over my glans with each back and forth slide of it, with my hand. So highly sensitive was my glans that orgasm would occur after only a few seconds of this method. I tried masturbating by sliding the loose foreskin back and forth only over the shaft and not over the glans. Doing this latter method it did take a much longer time to reach orgasm but I always felt I was missing half of the sensations of both the sliding of the foreskin and the eventual orgasm. By this experience I learned that, if I were to go ahead with my long time deep desire and have myself circumcised, there would be some sacrifice of sensation in exchange for a much longer overall experience of great pleasure during sex.

I decided to get circumcised the moment I reached the age of eighteen and I had a consultation with my college doctor, told him that my orgasms came too quickly and that I couldn't bear the thought of going through life with a foreskin. He said he fully understood and agreed to circumcise me the next week at the college infirmary. I was thrilled as never before or since, and was in a state of constant excitement and anticipation for that entire long week. The evening before I was to undergo my first circumcision, I decided to masturbate one last time by sliding the full extra redundant six inches of intact foreskin, back and forth over the whole erect shaft and head of my penis, slowly and purposefully until reaching orgasm. Using one hand to slide the foreskin back and forth, and with a pen in the other hand, I wrote as best I could in the circumstances: "As the skin slides back and forth over my glans, tremendous tickling sensations are overcoming me - I'm coming - ohhh!"

This, my first circumcision, was a very exciting experience, but somewhat disappointing to me when I soon found that the doctor had removed only a one inch wide band of the foreskin around the tip of my penis, leaving just the very end of my pink and tender glans exposed; the rest was still covered by foreskin. No change of a sexual nature occurred at all. Greater cleanliness was partly achieved in that urine could no longer catch under the foreskin, but smegma still formed under the rim of the glans and on the area still covered by the foreskin. The remaining foreskin developed a habit of sliding back by itself quite often and catching pubic hairs under it as it rolled forward again, pulling them painfully. The mobility of the skin became greater and led me to masturbate more often, and I still reached orgasm too quickly. I soon concluded that circumcision which exposes only the tip of the glans is very unsatisfactory for anyone.

By this time I realised that I would never be happy nor satisfied until I had been circumcised so totally that there wouldn't be the slightest bit of loose skin on the shaft of my penis, whatever the permanent outcome. It was then that I thought of the long range experiment of having five more spaced-out circumcisions, each removing another inch wide band of foreskin until I was rid of the entire six inches of hated redundant foreskin. I would record my reactions and would be able to share this knowledge as now I am.

I knew this was possible as the scar of my first operation was an inch and a half behind the rim of the glans, and thus each successive circumcision would leap over the previous, up to the corona. Therefore I was very happy when, two years later, I had my second circumcision, removing another one inch band of the loose fold of the foreskin, which still covered half of my glans. This now meant that a total of two inches of redundant foreskin had been removed from my penis, leaving four inches of the extra, loose, wrinkled skin, folded just over the rim of my glans, leaving the rest of the head permanently exposed. The surface of the glans soon lost much of its sensitivity, as had the tip after its exposure after my first circumcision.

However, the rim of the glans and the depression just behind it, still covered by a fold of skin, kept their extreme sensitivity, all feeling now being concentrated in those areas and in the nerves of the frenum beneath the tip of the glans.

After this second circumcision, I was continually stretching the remaining fold of my foreskin forward over the corona rim as far as possible during masturbation, by rolling it forward beneath a tight grip of my hand, and then loosening my grip and sliding the foreskin back over the corona until it pulled taut away from the rim, towards my body at the base of the penis. These were fast, short, strokes, producing intense feeling in a band right behind the corona's rim, and masturbation was irresistible because of the great ease of it, and the pleasant sensations produced were much longer lasting before reaching orgasm. Probably now, after two circumcisions, almost fully exposing the glans, there was actually less overall feeling than that which was produced by my long, slow strokes, sliding my full foreskin, or when only the tip of the foreskin had been removed, giving only the slightly shortened motion, and the slightly lessened sensitivity.

Anyway, the drive to play with my penis, to pluck at the remaining bit of glans-covering foreskin, and to come to orgasm became much greater than ever before. This was probably because this shorter amount of foreskin was now so mobile that it would move back and forth over the rim of the glans with the ordinary movements of my body, within clothing or against bedding, and set off my desires again and again. For this reason, I had an orgasm in bed every time I chanced or chose to roll onto my penis and set this still four inches of redundant skin into motion. One shouldn't complain of this situation.

But this excessive amount of masturbation, plus nocturnal emissions every night, was a bit wearing and convinced me that this manner of circumcision, which leaves enough foreskin to loosely cover the rim of the glans, is not a complete enough circumcision. And the deciding factor against leaving this much foreskin is one of personal hygiene. Smegma could still collect quickly behind the rim of my glans beneath the end folds of the remaining loose foreskin as if I had never been circumcised at all.

And so, after two years in this state of partial circumcision, I requested my third circumcision.

Death

It is with regret that I have to report the death of I.D.K. of Southampton. Ian was a regular correspondent and contributor to the magazine. His last input was to the Editor's interview in issue 5/2004 where I explored with him his experiences of circumcision in the military. He will be missed.

The Purpose of the Glans

The November 2003 issue of Unzipped magazine had an interesting article on just why penises have a glans penis. Seemingly, the larger and more flared the head of the penis, the more effective it is in 'scooping out' rival males' semen from the vagina; all done on the back-stroke. Apparently, flared heads win out on the pointier parts as they remove 90% of other men's ejaculate! An interesting evolutionary fact... Effectively, the longer the penis and the bigger the helmet, the better for the job.

Suffering In Silence

My mother-in-law has always been a keen advocate of circumcision and just around the time we were married, discreetly enquired of her daughter as to my status. Quite what she proposed to do about it if I hadn't been remains an interesting question! :-)

When our boys were born, she put strong pressure on my wife to have them circumcised – not that we needed any – she should have reserved her energy for haranguing our doctors, who were adamantly against it. In passing, she mentioned that she knew 'someone else' who needed circumcising. I didn't enquire further but assumed she was alluding to father-in-law.

Now father-in-law was an extremely old-fashioned, shy man, who was very reticent about discussing any problem in the underpants department. He was the sort of guy who didn't like going to the lavatory if there was anyone else around. Fortunately he never ailed anything to cause his admission to hospital until a stroke ended his long life. Then we learned that the nurse had to catheterise him when he was in a coma. It is perhaps a blessing he never recovered to find that a mere female had placed that pipe in his plumbing or he would have died of shock! I shouldn't joke like this, but he had a pretty good, happy, life – except for one detail which he disclosed shortly before he passed away.

We often went out for a beer and a chat and one time we were talking about the local hospital and how it had changed from a charitable Victorian institution to a state of the art facility today packed with hi-tec kit. Although pretty fit, I went on to count the times I'd been to hospital. My score was a spell in childhood with scarlet fever (isolation ward then) and pneumonia, plus circumcision at eight and one or two visits to A&E to stitch wounds; from falling off my bike as a boy, to dog bites and a small DIY mishap as an adult.

Father-in-law by contrast had come through life ahead of me, quite unscathed, having never even been a day patient! But, when I mentioned my circumcision, he made a sad disclosure.

It must have been the beer that freed his inhibition, because normally the topic would have been unmentionable. Lowering his voice, loaded with embarrassment, he confessed that he had long ago needed a circumcision because his foreskin was far too tight to retract properly. Although he had fathered four children, sex had been very infrequent and always painful. This problem had not been picked up earlier by his parents who were equally uncommunicative about anything to do with sex organs. As an adult he told me he had never been able to overcome his embarrassment at the prospect of an intimate examination, so never consulted a doctor about his difficulty. He just soldiered on through life – sex being an occasional 'duty of marriage' – much to the frustration of my mother-in-law, it seems.

It was sad to realise he had waited all his life to confide this to someone, and I take it as a compliment that I was the one in the confessional. Even sadder is the fact that he had missed out so much on the free pleasure that life might have offered. If he had simply been routinely circumcised as a baby, like many in his generation were, then everything would have been fine.

We all know one or two people who have had to undergo circumcision later in life – as a child or an adult. It has often to be done for different reasons, at different ages, right through to the twilight of life. These are the ones who fortunately do receive the fix they need, albeit later when it is more painful and they have inevitably missed out and suffered first.

I venture that those of whom we hear must only be representative of a larger minority who, like father-in-law, suffer in silence. Routine infant circumcision, properly and expertly done, eliminates this actual and potential misfortune. It saves medical resources and money and ensures trouble-free penises for all concerned.

The History Boys

[The History Boys, a play by Alan Bennett, is currently in repertory at the National Theatre in London. The following is an exchange during a General Studies lesson. Irwin is the teacher; the others are sixth formers.]

Irwin At the time of the Reformation there were fourteen foreskins of Christ preserved, but it was thought that the church of St John Lateran in Rome had the authentic prepuce.

Dakin Don't think that we're shocked by your mention of the word 'foreskin', sir.

Crowther No, sir. Some of us even have them.

Lockwood Not Posner, though, sir. Posner's like, you know, Jewish, sir.

It's one of several things Posner doesn't have.

Posner mouths "Fuck off".

Lockwood That's not racist, though, sir.

Crowther Isn't it?

Lockwood It's race-related but not racist.

Akthar Actually I've not got one either. Muslims don't.

Another pause whilst Irwin regards the class.

Irwin Has anyone been to Rome?

No? Well, you will be competing against boys and girls who have. And they will have been to Rome and Venice, Florence and Perugia, and they will have doubtless done courses on what they have seen there. So they will know that when they come to do an essay like this on the Church on the eve of the Reformation that some silly nonsense on the foreskins of Christ will come in handy so that their essays, unlike yours, will not be dull.

Think bored examiners.

Think sixty, think a hundred and sixty papers even more competent than the last so that the fourteen foreskins of Christ will come as a real ray of sunshine.

Come the fourteen foreskins of Christ and they'll think they've won the pools.

Analgesia Underused for Management of Circumcision Pain

Results of a retrospective study of neonatal circumcisions performed at a large academic medical centre suggest that most procedures are performed without periprocedural or postprocedural analgesia, according to Praveen Kumar, MD, an associate professor of paediatrics at North Western University Memorial Hospital and Children's Memorial Hospital in Chicago, Illinois.

Dr. Kumar reported his findings at the American Academy of Paediatrics 2004 National Conference & Exhibition. Dr. Kumar had reviewed medical charts together with pharmacy and nursing records for 191 male infants. Of these 107 (56%) had undergone circumcision and in only about a third of the cases had analgesia been used. This is contrary to the Academy's recommendation that adequate analgesia should be provided if neonatal circumcision is performed.

All circumcisions had been performed by obstetricians and there was no indication that circumcision pain management had been discussed with parents. Dr. Kumar commented that this was an issue of culture and tradition so the results from a single institution were limited. However, his centre was a large tertiary medical centre in a large urban area, which gave some weight to the findings.

To counteract this point, Myles B. Abbott, chair of the AAP scientific program committee and in practice in Berkeley, California, stated that at his hospital they had about 7,500 deliveries a year and he thought that analgesia was used in almost all male infant circumcisions.

Dr. Kumar himself believes that all circumcisions should be done with analgesia and he suggested that both the AAP and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists should issue forceful guidelines. The AAP's position on circumcision itself is equivocal – the AAP's 1999 statement concludes that 'existing scientific evidence demonstrates potential medical benefits of newborn male circumcision; however, these data are not sufficient to recommend routine neonatal circumcision.'

Editorial

That circumcision is out of favour in the UK is usually taken as an established fact. But is this the case? My editorial column this time takes an objective look at the statistical evidence and comes to perhaps surprising conclusions. What does seem to be true is that the incidence of circumcision is geographically clustered and two other articles support this. One suggests that, in certain parts of London, the uncircumcised can find themselves in a small minority; whilst a GP from Northamptonshire claims that over a period of thirty years, until the last six months, he had never seen an infant boy who had undergone routine circumcision. If anyone else has data, anecdotal or otherwise, on this topic I would be pleased to hear.

One member recently commented to me that he was disappointed at the lack of reaction from members to an article he had written. This is a pity. The Society exists partly to facilitate exchanges between members, so why not drop a note (via the mailbox) to one or more of the contributors to this edition. Who knows, it could start an on-going correspondence more direct and personal than any that can be carried out through the newsletter.

UK Circumcision Rates

Does the man on the Clapham omnibus have a foreskin? This man is of course an imaginary person who is supposed to be typical of the ordinary British person. The answer to the question will partly depend on where the omnibus is travelling. If it is through some rural countryside, the proportion of uncircumcised males is likely to be very high. If it is journeying through the part of London where I live – cosmopolitan with a rich ethnic mix – the circumcised may well outnumber their uncut fellow passengers, if the locker room of the gym I attend is typical of the area.

So just what is the average circumcision rate in the UK. I have attempted to reach a figure first by looking at some of the data published by the Office for National Statistics. The UK population in 2003 was 59.6 million, say 29m males. From the 2001 census, we know that there were 800,000 Muslim males and 130,000 Jewish males all of whom would almost certainly have been circumcised. There were about 160,000 black African males – say 50% circumcised giving 80,000. White African males numbered 130,000. If 80% were circumcised, 104,000 join the cut tally. About 160,000 males came from North America or Australasia. A cut rate of 80% would make 128,000 of them roundheads. So far therefore we are totalling 1,242,000 circumcised males. This leaves us with about 26 million males to consider. About 20% of these are over 60, born at a time when RIC was still popular. Say that 50% of this group are circumcised (2.6m). Of the remainder, let us say that 5% have required circumcision for medical reasons (1.04m). This then gives us a total circumcised population of 4,882,000 or 16.8%. Of course, these are very broad brush figures. I have tried to avoid any double counting but estimates of circumcision rates for the various groups may be in error. But at least my assumptions are stated, and members can recalculate the figures themselves if they wish using their own estimates.

Is there any independent verification of such estimates? As it happens, there is. A letter published last year in the Journal of Sexually Transmitted Infections reports on findings on male circumcision in Britain from a national probability sample. The researchers used data from the 2000 British National Survey of Sexual Attitudes and Lifestyles (Natsal 2000) – a large scale, stratified, probability sample survey – to estimate the prevalence of male circumcision in Britain and investigate its association with key demographic characteristics, sexual behaviours, and reported STI diagnosis. All data were weighted to be representative of the British population.

They found 15.8% of British men reported being circumcised in Natsal 2000. 19.6% of men aged 40-44 years were circumcised compared to 11.7% of those aged 16-19 years. With the exception of black Caribbeans, men from all ethnic minority backgrounds were significantly more likely to report being circumcised compared to men who described their ethnicity as white. In addition, men born abroad instead of in Britain were significantly more likely to be circumcised.

Significant variations in the prevalence of circumcision were also observed across the major religious groups, with prevalence being greatest among Jewish men (98.7%) and lowest among Hindus, Sikhs, and Buddhists (9.8%). Allowing for sampling error, the researchers conclude that the true rate of circumcision in Britain lies in the range 14.7% to 17.1%. It is interesting that my own figure of 16.8%, calculated from totally different data, lies in this range.

So what does this mean for the Clapham omnibus? Suppose you were travelling on a double decker bus carrying 130 people who formed a perfect random sample from the population in terms of gender, age, ethnicity, religion etc. There would be 65 males of whom ten or eleven would be circumcised. Thus, on average, each double decker in Britain is carrying almost a dozen cut men. Next time you are on a bus, see whether you can spot them!

Genital Mutilation

[The following letter from Dr John Fitton of Kettering was published in the on-line journal Pulse-1]

This week I reported a doctor to the GMC for misconduct. I have never done this before. I have earned my living as a doctor over the space of three continents and time of three decades. I have come across a tiny number of doubtful characters but I have never, until now, known of a doctor who has deliberately harmed one of my patients.

At a routine six-week check I examined a rather miserable baby. It had a grazed glans penis, chafing on its nappy. The reason was that it no longer had any protection. Someone had amputated its foreskin. The Ghanaian mother handed me a note. I asked her what religion advised such a painful and unnecessary procedure. She said she did not know, but it was 'part of our culture'. I gave her a 'Care of the Foreskin' leaflet in the hope that any further baby boys might be able to remain with the planet's vast majority of intact men.

It is distressing that genital mutilation seems to be on the increase in the civilised shire counties of England. This is the second case I have seen recently, having seen none for nearly 30 years.

Nowadays, children have rights that are legally protected. The European Convention on Human Rights has been incorporated into the Human Rights Act. It would appear that this doctor has not only done harm (primum non nocere) but has engaged in a trade that is illegal.

At great human cost we have made remarkable progress over the last century or two. Things that were considered normal like slavery, corporal punishment, no votes for women, etc, have been consigned to history. It will take a long time to consign non-therapeutic amputation of the foreskin (usually referred to by the unthinking euphemism of 'circumcision') to history, but it will eventually happen.

There are many enlightened members of the groups that still perform this rite who seek change. They look to bodies like the GMC for leadership.

Some years ago I wrote to say how little respect the GMC has among its members. Its gaudy homilies and the machinery allowing struck-off doctors positions of power made me ashamed to be a coerced member. Respect does not come free. It has to be earned. I have no respect for any organisation that countenances such a barbaric procedure. So this is a challenge to the GMC. Do not sweep this under the carpet.

Not Such A Minority

The mistaken perception that there is a low incidence of circumcised boys in the UK may deter parents from having their sons done because they worry they might be in a 'teased' minority. Shame, as this keeps the incidence lower than it would be. The mirror of this is seen in the USA, where circumcision of baby boys is routine. This pushes the incidence up because parents believe their sons may be in a 'teased' minority if they are NOT cut. I guess many US parents have it done even against their inclinations not to; 'because everyone does'.

With the proviso that it depends where you live, I think many UK parents would be surprised to find their uncircumcised sons will be in a minority in many schools.

Take a look around London boroughs and many other big cities in Britain and you will see the schoolyard population is a rich ethnic mix. Many of the recent generations of immigrants who produced these children are from male-circumcising cultures and they are continuing to circumcise their sons.

My wife is a nursery nurse and for some eight years worked in an inner city first school reception class. The intake was Turkish, Bangladeshi, Pakistani, Nigerian, occasionally Jewish and about 10-20% white Anglo Saxon indigenous.

It's a fact of life that many of these first attenders are very young and not always fully toilet trained. Lots of them had 'accidents' and had to be changed by my wife as part of her daily duties. She therefore had opportunity to observe and she reported that nearly all the ethnic boys she saw were circumcised or had it done a year or two further on in the school. On top of that, there were usually one or two white boys who had had, or had to have, a circumcision for medical reasons. My wife's opinion was that by the time they reached the end of this phase in their education at that school, uncircumcised boys would be in a small minority. Some would go on to schools where the immigrant incidence of circumcised boys would be even higher.

We have the growing immigrant population to thank for the fact that circumcision is alive and well in the UK today. Because of fear of offending Muslim sensitivities (and perhaps, Jewish ones too?), no one is going to mount an effective campaign to have male circumcision made illegal, as (rightly) was FGM – Female Genital Mutilation. (I'm glad most sensible people no longer equate the two by dropping the word 'circumcision' from the latter.)

Authorities too are guarded in condemning male circumcision as some regional Primary Care Trusts might otherwise be inclined to. It is indeed quite the reverse in some areas, like Bradford, where Muslim community pressure has made infant circumcision available on the NHS for a reasonable fee, which ensures the anti-circ taxpayer doesn't bear the burden!

As someone recently pointed out, availability of circumcision has reached a wider population than hitherto. This is going to grow as choice in medical matters is highlighted by both the private and state funded sectors. All we need to do now is change the mindset of the medical profession, so they begin to appreciate the benefits of circumcision and start referring and recommending.

My Six Circumcisions – Part 2

[In issue 6/2004, DL told of how he decided to have his long foreskin gradually ablated through six circumcision operations. Part 1 told of his first two circumcisions. The story continues.]

My second circumcision left me with four inches of loose skin folded just over the rim of my glans. After two years, I requested my third circumcision, this time not only to remove another one inch band of the foreskin, leaving just three inches of redundant skin, but also to remove the frenulum, that extremely sensitive, pleasure producing, vertical nerve cord just under the tip of the glans, by simply snipping it away. This was in the hopes of reducing somewhat more the overall sensitivity of my penis, and thus cutting down my sexual desire a little, a goal which it achieved. Also, the last three inches of my foreskin could now lie permanently behind the rim of my glans, unrestricted by that tight nerve cord, and I would at last have complete cleanliness. I can remember well the pleasurable sensations the frenulum used to produce when tweaked or rubbed but truthfully I have never missed them since. With the foreskin now staying retracted, it was no longer stimulating the rim of the glans when totally uncalled for but could be pulled over the rim for a little extra sensation when wanted. At last I now felt that I was the master of my penis and its sexual activity, instead of letting it dominate me. This state of circumcision is a very satisfactory one for anyone to be in or to aspire to. There is just the right degree of highly pleasurable sensitivity all around the rim of the glans where the remaining bit of the former nerve-laden foreskin inner lining is turned back to meet the circumcision scar for the remaining sliding foreskin to tickle and produce a star studded climax.

Still fascinated by circumcision, I kept to my plan and had a fourth circumcision to remove one more inch of what still seemed to be an excess amount of mobile skin, now leaving just two inches of the previous six inches of redundant foreskin. This left the shaft of my penis covered with a fairly smooth skin, from its base to the rim of my glans, but with a two inch movement of it possible, by using a firm grip, even during erection when this skin was drawn quite taut. The remaining half inch band of former inner foreskin, now lying permanently exposed behind the rim of my glans, provided pleasing sensations from the motions of intercourse. There were similarly pleasing sensations during masturbation from loose encirclement by a hand, much enhanced by lubrication with Vaseline, to achieve orgasm, rather than by attempting to slide the now taut skin covering of the penis shaft. I found that, in this degree of circumcision, sex was now refined for me to the very highest experience of pleasure possible. As an unexpected bonus, I found tremendous pride in the improved appearance of my penis and the extra self-confidence that gave me. There was no longer any question of sex being, for me, a purely animal activity. My penis was now totally altered by man into a refined instrument, giving total satisfaction. I was totally circumcised and in a constant serene state of mind, knowing that my penis was always clean and attractive, with its bold head standing forth permanently, and with smooth skin covering its shaft.

However, after two years, I knew that I had to take my research one step further, even if it should result in losing some sensitivity and response. I had to find out what it would be like to be circumcised tightly with no loose foreskin. To stay with my original plan, I would have two more circumcisions, first to remove the next to last inch of foreskin, and then the last one to remove the very last inch, to leave me with a taut, non-sliding, shaft skin. Doing some research beforehand, I found a puzzling statement by a surgeon in a medical book in which he said: "A tight circumcision is a permanent positive discredit to the surgeon and a permanent negative discomfort for the patient." This seemed like a riddle to me, as I couldn't imagine what a negative discomfort could be. So I went ahead determinedly and got my fifth circumcision, having another one inch wide band of foreskin removed from just under one quarter inch behind the rim of my glans, putting the new scar line there, and taking away nearly all the last sensitive nerves of the former underside of the foreskin. Then it dawned on me what the doctor meant by "negative discomfort". He obviously meant the lack of sexual comfort, or pleasure, that could have been enjoyed by the stimulation of nerves thereby removed. Now I knew, but I had asked for it, and I still had one last mobile inch of my old foreskin that could still be slid up behind the rim of the glans to tickle that last quarter inch of super-sensitive nerves.

Having gone through five circumcisions to gain and record for others what information I could, through personal experience, I felt I must complete the research according to my original plan, and complete the total alteration of my penis from its original form and appearance. I went ahead and had a sixth circumcision to remove the last one inch band of the former six inches of my original foreskin. This circumcision left just four inches of taut skin on the shaft of my penis from its base to the rim of my glans, a distance of just four inches. The scar had to be just one eighth of an inch behind the rim, leaving just a sprinkling of sensitive nerves in that tiny space, and, anyway, there wasn't a bit of loose skin that could be drawn up to tickle them. There were now no wrinkles at all on my shaft skin, even with my penis flaccid, and, when my penis is erect, its tautness tugs skin out away from its base, providing a very pleasurable sensation from its glans to its base. By using Vaseline as a lubricant for my extremely tightly circumcised penis, I always experience an orgasm so powerful, so terrific, so star studded as to be indescribable. It is the absolute ultimate in fantastic experiences, and I am compensated one hundred times over for any lack of sensation during foreplay and the extra effort involved in reaching orgasm.

I take great satisfaction in that I have had the total of all six inches of redundant foreskin covering the glans of my penis circumcised away. I am now among a true brotherhood of similarly circumcised men, who must be the happiest and most sexually satisfied men on earth. I live totally contented and at peace with that most valued part of myself, my totally circumcised penis, and I would not wish back even one inch of foreskin.

In retrospect, I offer the opinion that there is no question of whether one should be circumcised or not; the answer, derived from my experience, is most certainly 'Yes'. Any choice is merely the question of the degree one should or would like to be circumcised. If one is like me and has always been almost dominated by all thoughts of circumcision, and particularly wishes the excitement, the permanent, tightly stretched feeling and sense of total well-being which results from the removal of the entire amount of redundant foreskin covering the penis, and the frenulum nerve cord under the tip of the glans, at the cost of trading some sensitivity for all that, plus superb climaxes, then do ask for and insist that you want a total circumcision, with removal of every bit of slack skin.

Otherwise, if a man wishes to play a safe middle ground, he should request that about two thirds of the redundant foreskin be removed, leaving about one third as mobile shaft skin, but with his glans permanently and fully exposed and his frenulum removed for comfort and control, similar to my description in the account herein of my fourth circumcision.

Penile Status – An Addition

It's always been a black and white affair, hasn't it? One either possesses a foreskin of variable length or one has had some or all of it surgically excised – classically uncircumcised or circumcised! In commonly used Civil War terminology, each male is either Cavalier or Roundhead, proven by the absence or presence of that circumferential scar around the shaft of the penis.

Though the foreskin can be naturally shortened by assimilation over the years, or kept retracted by design, the deception fails in the absence of a man-made surgical scar. Conversely a mild Plastibell circumcision in infancy could lead to the generous cuff of skin remaining bulking so that the penis would appear uncircumcised. In this confusion of appearance with the roundheaded cavalier and the cavalier roundhead, some clarification is required and an additional status is needed.

In an age when restoring techniques and commercially produced devices are available, there is the instance of the circumcised penis where the glans has been covered by the process of skin expansion. In this case of an artificial foreskin, the inner layer consists mainly of expanded shaft skin folded on itself. The appearance is cavalier, yet within lies that permanent circumcision scar, only revealed during erection. Missing is that vastly increased concentration of 1000 nerve endings in the natural inner foreskin mucosa, greater than anywhere else on the penis, and the connected frenulum.

If the foreskin which is present is not congenital, cavalier is a misnomer, and roundhead fails to describe the appearance! The man is neither cavalier nor roundhead, so I suggest a third category of penile status – ‘cavalike’ for one successfully restored. After all, circumcision removes a foreskin, and restoration replaces glans cover over a period of years.

There is now a trio of terms which might gain common usage:

Cavalier – natural foreskin (uncut)

Cavalike – restored foreskin (but with circumcision scar)

Roundhead – surgically excised foreskin and scar.

To that often embarrassing question eternally posed: “Are you a roundhead or a cavalier?”, there could be the occasional reply: “Actually, I’m cavalike!”

Where natural bulking after Plastibell circumcising leads to glans cover, perhaps ‘natural cavalike’ would suffice, bearing in mind the presence of the surgical scar line. Do other Acorn members concur? Let me know! Appearances can be deceptive, but truth will out, eventually.

Thinking Of Resigning

Although I am 54 and presently uncut without problems. I have been thinking very carefully over the last few years of becoming circumcised. However, I have seen a vast range of results ranging from very neat to disgraceful. I am particularly interested in establishing the best technique to be used (freehand or clamp, in which case which one?) and also to positively establish the identity of a suitably skilled practitioner. My present researches would indicate that a Mogen clamp might give me the neat high and fairly tight style which I am seeking (see ‘perfect op’ on the German Circlist site). Freehand methods seem to be too variable, with a definite risk of asymmetry, and some of the alternative clamps which operate below the glans (e.g. Gomco, Taraklamp etc.) tend to remove too much inner foreskin. Luckily, I have a small frenulum, so no intervention here is necessary.

It’s worth bearing in mind that, neglecting the odd ritual circumcision, most of the fairly numerous poor results which I have seen out there have been carried out by qualified practitioners. Stitch tunnels, skin bridges, scar tissue and a bent erect penis are all too common. It’s also a sobering thought that, from a cursory reading of the Newsletter, revision of an adult circumcision seems to be a fairly frequent occurrence, suggesting poor techniques.

I don’t want to sound negative about the whole business – far from it – but it is obviously well worth going to the trouble of getting it right first time. I’m looking forward to achieving, eventually, a fairly high circumcision with a small amount of free movement when erect to facilitate masturbation, but with the glans remaining substantially exposed when flaccid, in all but the most 'diminutive' circumstances. I'm hoping this acorn will grow a bit as a result!

I joined the Society last year in the hope of finding some objective information, both for and against this (one way) procedure. The newsletters have been a fascinating read, but I'm not entirely sure that they have provided the type of information I'm seeking. I would say that, on the basis of the last year's issues, Acorn is undoubtedly pro-circ, which rather clouds the issues for someone such as myself. The Internet is dominated by sites such as Circlist, which suffer from a more extreme form of the same problem. I am not by any means anti-circ; masturbating a man with a tight, non retracting foreskin is not rewarding for either party, and I would certainly advocate circumcision in these cases.

On a light hearted personal note, I've been experimenting with some success with keeping my fairly short, fully mobile foreskin right back, using a closely fitting plastic ring placed under the glans. Erections need to be avoided with this! One of my hobbies is horse riding, for which I wear a Bike jockstrap with a fairly open mesh pouch, and cotton jodhpurs. We have had some cold weather recently, and it has struck me just how cold the unprotected glans becomes, to the point of some discomfort. I wonder if this would be the case after a tight circumcision – my feelings are that it might.

I may not renew my subscription although you are, of course, welcome to try to convince me otherwise...

[Editor's note: I hope that some members will respond to LC's challenge and offer some advice as to the advantages/disadvantages of getting circumcised/remaining uncut. Why not list what you have found to be the benefits of being circumcised/remaining hooded and either send them to me for publication or write direct to LC via the mailbox.]

Subscriptions – Final Reminder

I am very grateful to those of you (over half the members) who heeded my plea in the last issue and renewed your subscription without waiting for a reminder. This still leaves a substantial minority from whom I have not heard. For you, a final reminder is enclosed. Please do renew now, otherwise I am afraid that your name will be suspended from the mailing list. I will have taken account of any renewals which arrive in the mailbox up to 16th February, so if you receive a final reminder but feel that you have already renewed before that date, please do let me know and I will check the records.

Foreskins OK Here

A friend of mine, some time ago, gave me some copies of a gay magazine called Manzone published by the Clone Zone group of shops. Such a magazine would have been unheard of at one time. Indeed, my eyes boggled a bit when I turned the pages.

It is full of photos of men revealing their genitalia, often in full erection. Foreskins are most noticeable by their absence or, at least, are well hidden. Even if the penis is not circumcised, the foreskin is usually drawn well back to reveal the bare glans.

The magazine runs a monthly competition whereby readers are invited to send in photos of their own genitalia which are then published. Readers are asked to vote on which they consider the most attractive, the winner being shown again the following month. Again among the entries, in the majority, if they are not circumcised, the foreskin is pulled back. It is interesting to note that in one month the winner was one of the uncut variety with the foreskin in its natural (rightful?) place fully covering the head.

It would seem that the foreskin is in no way out of favour with the readers of that magazine.

Let Acorn Flourish!

I was so pleased when the Acorn newsletter arrived just before Christmas. So many times it has seemed that the Acorn Society has ground to a halt but still it keeps going. This must show that members want it to continue and therefore are putting energy into keeping it afloat. For new members, and to remind more long standing ones, we have had:

- 1 A two day meeting that only lasted one day.
- 2 A meeting that started in an hotel in Bournemouth and finished at a private house in Wimborne.
- 3 A treasurer who ran off with the money.
- 4 A constitution that was simplified out of existence.
- 5 A member who regularly disrupted meetings for no reason that he or anyone else could fathom.
- 6 Months without newsletters, even though members claimed to have submitted articles.
- 7 A chairman who disappeared without trace.
- 8 A meeting fixed a year in advance cancelled.
- 9 A PO box that ceased to function for no explicable reason.

After all that, we still continue, which suggests or endorses the fact that people want it to go on. I think that this is because it fulfils a need and also brings pleasure to members, probably in all sorts of different ways.

It seems to me that various points can be drawn from my above notes. One is that if there could be a committee then there would always be someone to fill any gaps and therefore complete the plans of the group. Running the Society might be less onerous for those who do it at present. Another is much more difficult, as has been proven before, and that is to discover what people really want from Acorn, coupled with what are we willing to put into it. Which means achieving some sort of feedback.

Perhaps the picture becomes clearer as the Society continues. People want to be able to talk about circumcision, their feelings and ideas, experiences and preferences. To find somebody who feels the same.

At school, aged 11, when showers were introduced, I found that I was the only one in the form who was circumcised. Nobody noticed except me, but I noticed a lot and have done so ever since. Within a couple of years and changes in form members, there were four of us and it would have been good to have talked to the other three about it – but I didn't, like you don't at that age. They were not interested, didn't care, didn't even notice. How could they not.

I was interested, in fact fascinated, and still am, and therefore keen that Acorn should continue to exist. Other members have explained to me that they found themselves in a similar position at school, except they were part of a minority of non-circumcised blokes, and became fascinated that way. One way or another, if you are interested in circumcision, then Acorn is the only organised forum for discussion, ideas and actually meeting others, if you can get to meetings.

Priorities

In evidence submitted to the House of Commons Select Committee on Public Accounts for its meeting on 14th January 2002, Byron Walmsley FRCS, Consultant Urologist at St Mary's Hospital, Portsmouth wrote the following:

“There is absolutely no doubt that successive government initiatives have distorted clinical priorities. Over the years there has been great pressure to expand day surgery, not only because it is efficient, but also because with simple and short procedures large numbers of patients can be rapidly removed from the waiting list. The result is that patients with more complex problems have to wait considerably longer for their treatment as there are less in-patient places on the operating list, which are more expensive than day cases.

“For example: if you have an inconvenient ganglion on your wrist you will wait for three to six months, but if you cannot walk properly because of a defective hip, you will have to wait for one to two years. In my department, if you have an irritable penis which requires circumcision, the average wait is four months, but if you are over 65 and cannot get a night's sleep because you have to get up four or five times, you will have to wait an average of 14 months for your prostate operation. It is not difficult to assess which of these deserves more rapid treatment.”

Is Masturbation Off Topic?

In issue 6/2004, the editor asked whether the subjects of masturbation and masturbation techniques were off-topic for the Acorn newsletter. I certainly don't consider this is the case for three good reasons:

- 1 Masturbation is getting an ever-improving press as a healthy and normal practice.
- 2 With Acorn membership representing both sides of the 'fence', there must be a full spread of knowledge, experience and techniques.
- 3 The adage that 80% masturbate and 20% lie is doubtless true so virtually everyone has a view or experience – the only barriers to sharing it being the unjustified taboo of the subject, and the lack of a suitable forum for discussing it. Acorn can certainly provide the latter and hopefully help reduce the former.

Sand Balanitis – Two Views

Do uncircumcised soldiers serving in Iraq suffer with their foreskins?

The official view (Commons written answer 19th June 1991)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel suffered from balanitis during Operation Desert Storm; and how many had circumcision operations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The incidence of balanitis was no higher than would normally be expected. No circumcisions for sand balanitis were performed or are now required.

The unofficial view (from the internet)

A relative who just returned from Iraq said just about all men in his unit, including himself, were circumcised. Given the unsanitary conditions in the country, especially the dust storms, he knew that infections under the foreskin were common among uncut soldiers. Many men got circumcised by choice. Army doctors were happy to oblige. A close friend who had not been cut as a baby went into the hospital to have it done just for that reason. Apparently there were many others, the doctor told him.

Photo Gallery

In the last issue, there were photos of four foreskinned specimens. To balance things up, this issue I have chosen four of the dehooded variety. In future, you will get a mixture each issue.

A Memo From Douglas

Members at the meeting of the Acorn Society in November expressed an interest in meeting twice in a year and the date of the next meeting was to be 1st/2nd April. Members agreed that they would take the initiative and would contact me about their accommodation needs rather than wait for me to 'whip them in'. Details of the dates and costs of accommodation were publicized in the December edition of the magazine. I extended the deadline for booking from the 20th December to the 2nd January; by this date we had three members staying two nights, three members staying one night, one member 'may stay one night but may be a day visitor' and one definite day visitor. Four members of the group contacted me to let me know that they would be unable to attend. It is possible that if I were to take up my whip I could add two or three names to the list, even so, the total number would not, in my opinion, justify the charge of £300 for the rental of the meeting room. Members with long memories will understand that meeting without a room dedicated for our sole use is not an option. (Remember Watford?)

I have cancelled the April meeting and have made a provisional booking for a meeting to take place at the same venue on the 4th/5th November. I expect the room rates to be unchanged but I have not yet seen the Contract. No doubt there will be publicity in the magazine about this proposed event.

Postscript

I have, post Christmas, had a small catastrophic wave on my computer, not quite a tsunami, but I have lost my email address book. If your name was in that book or you would like it to be there please send me a brief email that I may add your details to my list.

Circumcision and Condom Use Reduce Risk of Penile HPV

Circumcision protects against the acquisition of penile human papillomavirus (HPV), a study at an STD clinic in Arizona has found. Dr. Susie Baldwin reports her findings in the October 2004 issue of the Journal of Sexually Transmitted Diseases.

HPV is the main cause of cervical and anal cancer but few studies have looked at risk factors for penile HPV infection in men. To investigate, the researchers administered a risk-factor questionnaire and tested for penile HPV DNA in 393 men who attended the clinic between July 2000 and January 2001.

The frequency of sexual intercourse and the presence of genital warts were both risk factors with respect to HPV. Engaging in sexual intercourse more than 30 times per month for the last 3 months raised the risk of HPV detection by 3.65-fold compared with no more than 5 intercourse episodes per month. The presence of genital warts increased the risk by 2.48.

Once these risk factors had been allowed for, it was found that circumcision and regular condom use seemed to protect against penile HPV. Circumcision reduced the risk of infection with both oncogenic and non-oncogenic HPV types, whereas regular condom use only appeared to protect against the former type.

Circumcision To Be Stressed In Anti-AIDS War

[From the South African Sunday Observer]

Southern African Development Community (SADC) member countries will soon launch a major campaign on circumcision among sexually active men, as one of the key intervention steps against HIV and AIDS.

Speaking to PST in Mbabane last week on the sidelines of Journalists and Religious Workshop on HIV and AIDS, the Director of Swaziland's National Aids Commission, Derek von Wissel, said the campaign follows recent research findings to be published soon.

"This discovery indicates that uncircumcised men are much more in danger of contracting HIV than the circumcised," said Wissel, who also closed the workshop which was organized by the Churches United Against HIV and AIDS in Southern Africa (CUAHA).

He said the research on circumcision was sponsored by UNAIDS and USAID and conducted in Kenya, Zambia and Ethiopia, whose early indication showed that the uncircumcised were more prone to contracting the virus. "In Kenya it showed that the uncircumcised are ten times more in danger, in Zambia they are eight times, while in Ethiopia they are seven times", he noted.

He said SADC countries would soon commit major resources towards a vigorous campaign on circumcision hence another great back up in the war against HIV and AIDS. The campaign among SADC countries would be riding on the achievement of the research, whereby the advantage of childhood removal of foreskin over 'manhood' and later age circumcision would be emphasized.

"Of course the campaign will definitely be met with stiff criticism, but in any case, we will have to enlighten the public against this ugly side of the foreskin in as far as HIV and AIDS is concerned", he noted.

Explaining the HIV and AIDS situation on the ground in Swaziland, Wissel said, out of every two sexually active people in the tiny south African country with a population of 1.3m, one was HIV positive.

The Best Medicine

[Extract from article by Will Buckley in The Observer, May 2003]

It's been 25 years since I visited a doctor. Looking back, my quarter-of-a-century streak had been down to luck and cowardice. For once, the cowardliness had some justification. My last visit to a doctor had been as a pre-pubescent about to move from one elitist school to a larger yet even more exclusive school. To make this transition I was required, rather like a professional footballer, to pass a medical. Except I doubt that David Beckham et al are asked to drop their pants and cough while a man far too happy in his work to think about taking up his pension does his stuff.

If the medical was fretful, the ramifications were harrowing. Within a fortnight I was lying in an operating theatre on the receiving end of an emergency circumcision. A dismal state of affairs. Which continued well into my first term, as surrounded by hearties I snivelled and sniffed in order to try and con them that I was 'Off Games' (never popular) because of a stubborn cold rather than for some darker reason.

Reticent about asking too many questions, I never fathomed the reasoning behind this one-off operation. Perhaps a quota needed to be filled. Perhaps a kinky cabal had hijacked the admissions committee. Perhaps it was all just a misunderstanding. Whatever the reason, the result was to leave me suitably wary about approaching doctors for their opinion. Once circumcised, twice as circumspect.

Paxman In Circumcision Row

Jeremy Paxman, BBC Newsnight and University Challenge presenter, withdrew from a guest appearance on Radio 4's Woman's Hour because the producers would not allow him to run a feature on male circumcision. This was reported in the Sunday Times on 9th January. Paxman was invited to present a one-off men's edition of Woman's Hour and wished to examine the childhood procedure from the point of view of men who had been left feeling mentally and physically scarred by the operation. He had intended to involve the anti-circumcision lobby in the item.

But all was vetoed by the editorial team who thought male circumcision was inappropriate listening for the holiday period – the show was due to go out on New Year's Eve – when more than the usual number of children were likely to be listening. Paxman complained that he had fallen victim to the feminist tendency – Woman's Hour had often included items on the horrors of female circumcision in Africa, but male circumcision was judged to be not relevant.

Paxman was replaced by Jon Snow who obliged the producers by including such riveting items as living in a female household, Sven-Goran Eriksson's emotional side and a recipe for roast partridge!

Acorn is moving. At the bottom of this page you will find a new box number and address for the Society which is now up and running. The old post box will remain open for a few months but we would much prefer members to use the new box immediately.

Why the move? Members may recall that last year, for some inexplicable reason, the box providers suddenly decided that the box was no longer current (even though we were fully paid up) and started to return mail. Now there have been further problems. We have become aware that the renewal subscriptions of at least eight members have failed to arrive, for reasons we cannot determine. But it is clearly unacceptable for such losses to occur. Members would quickly lose confidence if sensitive mail went astray on a regular basis – you would cease to communicate and the newsletter and the Society would just die. So we have bitten the bullet and moved.

Because the renewal process has been disrupted, I am sending a reminder with this issue to all members whose renewal I have not received. If you receive a reminder but have already sent in your subscription, I regret that it must have gone astray. I would be grateful if you could issue a new cheque

Circumcision – The Right Decision?

In issue 1/2005, LC complained that, as someone considering circumcision, there had been little in previous issues which had objectively addressed the topics which were of interest to him. I have taken this to heart and over the coming issues I hope to discuss matters such as styles of cut, operating techniques, levels of pain and discomfort, recovery times etc.

But, important though these matters are, in some ways they are secondary. The most important question is: “Will circumcision prove to be the right decision for me?” Circumcision is irreversible. There is of course always the restoration path, but as Anthony's article in this newsletter demonstrates, this is long and arduous, and results at best in a simulated foreskin, not the original actuality. If the decision to get circumcised proves to have been wrong, there is no way back. Post-op regret has no remedy.

The would-be circumcisee has a number of fears and it may be helpful to explore these. First, will the operation be botched? Circumcision is a surgical process and there can be mishaps in any such procedures, whether due to natural causes or surgeon incompetence. The recent TV programmes devoted to cosmetic operations which have gone wrong and left the patient disfigured testify to what can happen. And certainly there are cases of ineptly performed circumcisions which remove too much skin, or which attach the shaft skin to the glans or leave skin bridges or tunnels.

So what can we say to reassure the fearful? Well, circumcision is probably the most frequently performed surgical operation – just consider how many males throughout the world have had their foreskins removed and how few of them have suffered trauma. Circumcision is not just the most popular operation, it is one of the safest. This is partly because it is only skin deep. This is not to belittle the skill of the surgeon, but the fact that the operation is primarily on the surface must reduce the potential for serious mishaps. But the skill of the surgeon is important, and anybody contemplating circumcision would certainly be advised to seek out a surgeon experienced in adult circumcision and with a good reputation. This is research well worth undertaking. Put yourself in the hands of a competent, experienced surgeon and the probability of a totally satisfactory outcome is almost 100%.

Second fear – will it be painful? I will discuss these issues more fully in a later newsletter, but most adult circumcisees are amazed at how little pain is involved. Many report no need of any painkiller in the post-op or recovery period. In the first days, the dressings can be inconvenient, especially if they obscure the meatus and urine gets onto the bandages. Erections can be uncomfortable, caused by the skin pulling on the sutures. But usually the problem is quelled by passing urine. The newly exposed glans can be over-sensitive until it gets used to living without its protective covering. And of course sexual abstinence is necessary, although not always for as long as the surgeon might consider ideal! So the days after the operation have to be lived through but the amount of distress is no more than is caused by, say, a cold or a strained muscle and most men, except those undertaking manual or very active work, need take little sick leave.

Third fear – will sex be as good as before? Here research shows that there is no difference in sensitivity between circumcised and uncircumcised men. An article in the journal Urology as recently as April 2005 reports on a study into the effect of neonatal circumcision on penile neurological sensation. 125 patients were evaluated, 62 uncircumcised men and 63 neonatally circumcised men. The study demonstrated that circumcision status does not significantly alter the quantitative somatosensory testing results at the glans penis. This confirms results as far back as Masters and Johnson that circumcision does not affect sensitivity. Of course, masturbation techniques may need to change. Most uncircumcised men use their foreskins to stimulate their glans. This option is no longer available to the circumcised – but equally satisfactory procedures can be evolved as all circumcised men will testify!

Fourth fear – will I just not like being circumcised? There are two broad categories of men who get circumcised – those with medical problems and those getting cut for aesthetic or psychological reasons. Those with medical problems are just happy to have a cure. Even if they preferred to be uncircumcised, the loss of foreskin is a small price to pay for permanent relief from the difficulties of phimosis or the discomfort of balanitis.

And what of those who have no medical requirement to be cut – they just have a deep seated desire, often bordering on the obsessional, to be circumcised. The origin of the wish may sometimes be traced back to childhood when minority status as a Cavalier, resulting perhaps in teasing about this, led to a hatred of the foreskin which was seen as the cause of the taunting. More frequently, no conscious reason can be deduced, there is just this compulsive want which will not go away. The fear must be that they submit to the knife – only to find that circumcision was not the answer to whatever was troubling them and that they subsequently regret their irrevocable act.

The good news is that this almost certainly will not happen. The vast majority of men with a compulsive desire to be circumcised feel an overwhelming sense of relief when the deed is done. Indeed, the most common cry is not “Why on earth did I have myself circumcised?” but “Why on earth did I not have this done years ago?” The only regret seems to be the wasted years as a Cavalier. This does not mean that interest in circumcision matters will be diminished – usually the level of interest remains the same. But now at least the focus is far less on one's own anatomy, far more on the topic in general and the circumcisional status of others.

Let us be clear – the above arguments are concerned only with those predisposed to have a circumcision. If the Government were to pass a law requiring universal male circumcision, it is certain that there would be many very unhappy men – those who value their foreskins and would be extremely loathe to lose them.

But for those who have a positive distaste for their foreskin, or who prefer the skinned appearance, or whose foreskin is causing problems, they can undergo circumcision confident in the knowledge that their justifiable fears will in fact prove to have been totally groundless.

Don't Resign – Just Talk!

Firstly, LC, don't resign! (Issue 1/2005 – Thinking Of Resigning) Why should you? Although some would have a different opinion, Acorn is not a pro-circumcision group, but an association of men who have no fear of discussing what has to be the most fascinating and interesting part of our bodies. We are a mixture of gay and straight, cut and intact, and it would be good if we can maintain a balance.

Secondly, be aware that those who have been through the ritual tend to shout louder than those who have perhaps been more timid. I fell into just this trap a few years ago, having decided to go under the knife to satisfy a long-standing fetish.

I have to admit that I also became involved with Circlist, that on-line group of fanatical Roundheads, who carried me along with their totally one-sided advice: "You'll never regret it!"; "Sex is a million times better!"; "Go for it!"; etc. And I did. And I have regrets, not bitter regrets, but there is a down-side to it.

The principal disappointment for me is the loss of sensation that used to arise from the stretching of the foreskin at the onset of and during an erection. I remember this well, with its incredible tingling, telling me that things were happening. Now, that has gone. Sometimes I have to actually get hold of my penis to see if it is flaccid or hard. I also find it more difficult to maintain an erection, probably because those stretched foreskin signals are no longer present.

Having said that, the rest is fairly positive. I am proud of the appearance, it no longer has any unpleasant smell, orgasms are just as good and they still come very easily.

I am sure that the result of circumcision is different for each person. It depends on the relative shape and size of all of the components. Some men undoubtedly gain, but some lose. So, LC, be cautious, and don't resign, just communicate with us all. I would be delighted to tell you more, if you wish.

A Clean-cut Young Sailor – Part 1

It was the first day at my new school and the first question put to me by one of my new classmates was "Are you a Cavalier or a Roundhead?" I didn't understand what he was talking about. "Have you been circumcised yet?" I didn't know what he meant. "Roundheads have had all the skin cut off their cocks. It's hygienic and it stops you wetting your bed. Everyone has to have it done sooner or later. Cavaliers haven't been done yet," he explained. "Come to the bog and let's have a look. See, I'm a Roundhead," he said, as he showed me his purple headed cock. My cock was quite different from his. "You're a Cavalier," he explained, pointing at the sheath of skin covering my cock. "When they circumcise you, they will cut all that skin off, like peeling an orange, and your cock will then look like mine."

The first, and only other time, I had seen another boy's cock was when I was about four years old. A cousin, about the same age, came to stay with us when his parents went away for a few days. We shared the same bath. I noticed that his cock was like my new friend's, whereas mine was pointed. I didn't know he had been circumcised. I assumed that different people had different cocks and that he had been born like that. We didn't talk about it, anyway.

When I was six years old the Second World War began. I was taken away from my mother and sent to stay with a doctor's family in the country. The doctor's wife threatened to cut off my cock and hang it round my neck if she ever found me playing with it. I was terrified. In the first week or so I wet my bed several times. The doctor examined my cock and said he might have to remove the cause of the irritation to stop the bed wetting. It never occurred to me that he was going to make my cock like my cousin's. Anyway, I had no more problems with bed wetting and the doctor never referred to his proposed treatment again.

I was eight years old when I went to this new school. It was a boarding school and a kind of high class orphanage for boys who had lost one or both parents. I was to remain there for ten years in both the junior and senior schools. The house matrons reported any tell-tale stains on the bed sheets to the house masters, who reported the miscreants to the doctor. Two boys were circumcised in the first week. Usually, the doctor wrote to the boy's family doctor recommending circumcision, which was done during the school holidays. There were always several newly circumcised boys proudly showing off their purple bullet headed cocks in the showers at the beginning of each term. I wanted very much to be circumcised. I had fantasies about a Red Indian Brave circumcising me with a red hot blade.

Us Cavaliers were repeatedly told to retract our foreskins and wash our knobs. I was about ten when I first tried this – not in the showers, but in the privacy of my bath. I had to get my cock hard so that I could exert enough force to wrench the foreskin back. At first it would not budge, and then it suddenly came back over the glans and I stretched it right back. For the first time I saw and smelt the revolting smegma. I did not realise how sensitive the glans was until I wiped it with my flannel. It was excruciatingly painful. The narrow opening of the foreskin was halfway down my cock. It was bleeding from several small cracks caused by the stretching. It constricted my cock so that it got harder and harder. I could not pull the foreskin forward. I was very frightened indeed. I got dressed, and the clothes rubbing on my raw glans kept me hard until I went to bed. The following morning my cock was back to normal. I continued washing my knob this way. After a while it became very pleasurable and I had my first ejaculation. The ecstatic spasms and seeing and feeling my pearly spunk squirt out for the first time made me an immediate and permanent wankoholic.

When I was about twelve and going up to the senior school, my family doctor told me that the school doctor had recommended that I should be circumcised. He was Jewish. I told him I wanted to be circumcised and asked why he had not done it to me when I was born. He said that he was against routine circumcision and that I didn't need to have it done, then or now.

Half of my generation were circumcised in infancy; most of the rest during school days; and the remainder during National Service. Later on we were told that circumcision was necessary to disable us from the wicked vice of masturbation. Wanking would stunt our moral, mental and physical development. Our clean-cut knobs would look and feel good. Mens Sana in Corpore Sano – A Sound Mind in a Sound Body, was the ideal of the school. A clean-cut cock was the badge of a clean-cut young man. Debilitating masturbation was inhibited and the corresponding dirty thoughts could not arise. The mutilation was cruel to be kind. The chaplain endorsed circumcision in the flesh. Although it is not obligatory for Christians, he explained that it should be done to ensure physical cleanliness and mental and spiritual purity. It would enable us to identify more closely with Jesus, who was himself circumcised. If not done earlier, it should preferably be done before Confirmation.

Eventually my foreskin loosened up sufficiently so that I could pull it back without an erection. It was very long and would not stay retracted. By then the knob had lost some of its extreme sensitivity. Homosexuality was widespread. We formed little secret exclusive clubs. There were seven of us in mine – two Cavaliers and five Roundheads. There was mutual envy between the Roundheads and the Cavaliers. The Roundheads envied my long mobile foreskin and tried to pull it over their naked knobs. I envied the sculptured look and feel of the flared corona and sleek immobile skin of the circumcised cock. As well as simple wanking, we were into cock-sucking and tickling tits and frenulums. I always came quite quickly, but it took me ages to bring the Roundheads off. “Please make me come, oh, please make me come,” they pleaded. In fact I was completely unsuccessful with one of them, and my fellow Cavalier as well.

I was still uncircumcised when I left that school aged eighteen.

Confidence Restored

There are those who envy the circumcised penis, eager to embrace the shorn status by seeking a surgeon. Most already circumcised accept it with nonchalance, even satisfaction. Some are delighted by the decision made for them, but there are others for whom their baby job is disfiguring, even mutilating. For the resentful ones, which included me for 50 years, I can give the assurance that DIY non-surgical restoration is a reality! Circumcision need not be for life!

In 1992, Dr Jim Bigelow's book The Joy of Uncircumcising was published in America, detailing methods of foreskin restoration. (Hourglass Publishing, PO Box 171, Aptos CA 95001.) There are three chapters on the stages of non-surgical restoration by skin expansion, using:

1. The tape strap With shaft skin stretched over the glans, it is secured in position with a strap (or straps) of zinc oxide tape, or similar. Weights optional!
2. The tape ring Secures stretched skin in front of the glans. (Improvised a cap instead as progress was slow.)
3. Expansion device such as the commercially available TUGAHOY or PULMAN. (I tried modified rubber bungs, then resorted to tugging instead.)

For me restoration has been a dedicated journey of over eight years, slowly acquiring what was once mine – full genital integrity. From the ultimate enforced nudity of a radical free-hand circumcision in infancy with an ugly uneven scar, restoration was difficult at first with no skin to grasp at the scar line, producing much frustration.

On 9 December 1996, with Dr Bigelow's book before me like the Bethlehem Star, I started my journey with the first stage of taping with  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch strips, clumsily at first. By the time I was completing the second stage in the sixth year, I had become expert! (For those more gently circumcised, the remaining cuff of foreskin would reduce my  $5\frac{1}{2}$  years taping to a matter of months, even weeks!) Whilst wearing tape, overnight erections increased tension in the skin held forward, assisting in skin expansion, as did slow gentle masturbation, therapeutic of course! From the humiliating ground zero of a complete glans and part sulcus exposure, expanded skin crept meatus-ward a millimetre at a time, month by month. It took years before the coronal ridge and most of the glans was covered, leaving only the  $\frac{1}{4}$  inch or so of the tip. At last I had secured enough forward tissue to embark on the final third stage, that of expansion.

NON-SURGICAL RESTORATION BY SKIN EXPANSION.

Since appliances cost over £100, I took myself in hand! Tugging proved painful so I limited it to a few cycles at first. In a matter of days my improvised technique had been refined to maximise the applied tension. (With the left-hand forefinger pressing down the glans, the foreskin is stretched forward using the right hand thumb and forefinger over the left hand finger and securing it. Seated in a rocking chair, the legs are thrust forward with hand-held foreskin, then returned to the original positions.)

I started tugging on 6 August 2002, averaging seven tugs per day for the first week, increasing through 57 tugs per day on the ninth week to over 2000 tugs per day by the end of 2004. In 128 weeks, I averaged 1108 tugs per day. That Christmas I was able to sport not only full glans coverage but a luxurious half inch of overhang, the best present ever. And a pleasant tickling sensation urinating through it.

Observations

- 1 Though most of the expanded tissue was of outer shaft skin origin, there has been an increase in the area of inner mucosa. On the erect penis, the circumcision scar is now 8mm further down the shaft, an area increase of 44%.
- 2 Confinement has reduced the coronal flare, increasing circumferentially on erection by 17%. Before restoration it was 22%. What I termed the 'heart-break ridge' is no longer visible through underwear or swimming costume under preputial cover.
- 3 The glans surface has become smooth, membranous, moist and sensitive, with a colour change to a light greyish pink. I can enjoy sensations never felt before, especially the exquisite tingle when the skin curls back over the glans, and cool air blows on a moist surface.
- 4 Compared with a possible 15 square inches for the adult foreskin unfolded, I measured 11.5 square inches of skin expansion in a year of tugging (not including that created in extra 76 tug weeks to completion).

My one regret is that I will never have the erotic potential of those 1,000 nerve endings lost when circumcised! A tragic confiscation.

Now after feeling self-conscious and mutilated for decades, my restoration has left me bodily complete, able to radiate confidence rather than despair. A final note is that if things had gone wrong, I would have had the choice to revert to roundhead – perish the thought. Cavalike is liked! As the comparison between circumcised and restored in the table overleaf clearly shows:

What's lost long ago can in eight years renew
I did it myself and know well it is true.
With taping and stretching, then tugging with zeal
I gave my spoilt manhood great intact appeal.

Nature's Penile R&D

(Please note: what follows is a strongly held, pro-circumcision, personal view. I mean no disrespect to those Acorn members who are happily intact and believe foreskins are a 'must have' accessory. Some of my best friends are uncut and share your opinion.)

May I thank KG of London (Issue 6/04) for forwarding the thesis from Unzipped magazine, suggesting that the penis glans rim serves to scoop out from the vagina the semen of your partner's previous lover. It sounds very interesting, but I suggest it is flawed. It won't work that way unless the last-comer (aha, a pun!) has been circumcised.

Nature can't have planned it like that, because circumcision is interference with the natural process. Let me explain: Foreskin enthusiasts are fond of pointing out how we, who are cut, are missing out on the subtleties of prepuce manipulation during all stages of sexual intercourse. In their perfect world, the guy has a long foreskin, and approaches his female with it forward, in the normal place. As he starts to insert his penis, her vaginal lips engage with his foreskin and ease it back gently, ensuring their secretions mingle to facilitate what they call 'The Gliding Mechanism'. In this, the foreskin is pushed back on the in-stroke and then re-hoods the glans on the outstroke. Proponents claim this provides exquisite sensations for the female and stimulates the man with his own foreskin. These quick intervals of covering the hypersensitive glans forestall premature ejaculation. We are told it's all a natural, gentle, experience when compared to the vigorous thrusting 'needed' by the circumcised male to stimulate his denuded dry glans. Even worse, his 'unfortunate' female has to provide ALL the necessary lubrication, poor girl.

Having discussed this, in some detail, with a divorcee lady friend who has had some considerable experience of both sorts of penis, I found her preference for the circumcised variety and reasoning somewhat reassuring.

First, she asserts that circumcision greatly facilitates hygiene and health; not just of the male, but also the vaginal wellbeing of his partner(s). That alone would make her mandate that all boys be cut. She doesn't buy into the argument that a fastidious penile washing routine is just as good as being circumcised. It doesn't, she points out, last very long between 'services' before odour arises. She was for some years married to a particularly clean intact man and that's her verdict once she compared him with her subsequent circumcised boyfriends.

She goes on to claim that in matters of sensation and pleasure for a female, the uncircumcised penis does not perform as advertised by its proponents. All 'The Gliding Mechanism' does for her, is give the impression that the man is merely moving in and out of his foreskin, stimulating himself, but not her. This is because the foreskin shields and smooths out the stimulating ridge of the glans, which is likely to be less flared if it has lived inside a tight 'jacket' for most of its life.

My wife and I have never experienced uncircumcised sex, but we have found exquisite coital satisfaction, despite what an uncircumcised friend mischievously calls my 'mutilated dick'. Through experiment we have discovered positions to maximise the more prominent contour of my bare glans. One good effect can be achieved in the missionary position by the man raising himself up on his arms whilst bearing up with his coronal ridge behind the pubic bone. Done gently with guidance and co-operation you can stimulate the G-spot with the coronal rim. Beware though, when you really hit the button, it can trigger the mother of all orgasms and her crushing reflex, once experienced, will convince you that sexually, the female is the more powerful of our species.

Of course circumcised men do need to be more gentle in consideration of their women. The permanently exposed glans is hardly as hypersensitive as the habitually foreskinned one. But, being cut does give a staying power advantage. It is really not necessary to suddenly thrust hard into your partner or you WILL hurt her. A 'natural' guy has a frenulum and a degree of sensitivity to give him a painful reminder not to engage in this practice. We circumcisees do not. If you sense that your partner is wearying of prolonged intercourse, pull out, dry off your glans. Then ask her to play with you. Suggest she pull down tightly on any loose shaft skin with one hand whilst teasing your glans with her fingertip of the other, moving it slowly around in tiny circles, barely brushing the surface. Ask her to move down and run her fingertip around the glans rim, teasing and rocking it with light pressure. Mutual satisfaction is also attained if you are giving her similar clitoral stimulation under guidance.

Reading and researching over the years I have found interesting theories. One was testimony of a woman who failed to conceive to her foreskinned husband. Tests showed he had a good sperm count and she was OK too. Following a hunch, the doctor suggested her DH be circumcised. With some reluctance he accepted and underwent the procedure. Almost straight away, after the healing abstinence, hubby fertilised her and they became happy parents. Puzzled, they didn't complain but pressed the doctor to disclose his theory. His surmise was that the guy had a long foreskin which was closing on and containing most of his ejaculate on withdrawal. None of this hypothesis is provable, but it is an interesting coincidence. Maybe some ancient tribes observed a similar ability to impregnate was demonstrated by circumcised males and adopted it as a cultural or religious custom for that reason.

Another researcher claimed that at the moment of orgasmic spasm, the cervix or neck of the womb opens and dips to catch any sperm that may conveniently shoot in its direction. If it hits just the right spot, the sperm are fast-tracked to fertilisation. Theory had it that a circumcised glans without a frenulum will tend to be tip tilted slightly upward and direct its emission more to the target. By contrast the uncircumcised glans will be pulled by the frenulum and tend to direct the load downwards and away from it. All very fanciful of course, but again some observed incidence of success might have persuaded some communities that circumcised males were better at impregnating females. Quite important for survival of the tribe.

Related to this theory is the interesting point that we are the only species that copulate face to face (missionary position). Anthropologists suspect this is a 'recent' adaptation, and time was when man always entered his woman from behind, as other mammals do. That being so, the thesis in the earlier paragraph is reversed.

There is little doubt that the glans in all its variations is aesthetically more pleasing to most women. It terminates the organ in a bold rounded shape instead of the natural frilly flesh resembling a drawstring bag. Note also that the glans 'cleft' mimics two other rounded shapes which are sexually attractive components of the human body: the bosom and the bottom.

Surely nature intends the exposed glans to send a signal to the female that the male is ready for coitus. It seems a reasonable assumption that women are programmed to respond positively to it. Men who discovered they could attract women more easily when exposed than when hooded, were probably encouraged to make this mode permanent, i.e. circumcised. This might eventually have caused the enthusiastic adoption of circumcision as a tribal identity as others got in on the novelty. Many modern women today admit that they prefer the appearance of the circumcised penis to its curtained alternative.

Maybe nature has another straightforward reason for defining the glans from the shaft with a prominent rim. That is to provide a 'locking catch' to hold back the foreskin during intercourse. Although this negates 'The Gliding Mechanism', it could be an evolutionary mutation to test a new model. Some couples, where the man is intact, report either one of them holding back the man's foreskin during intercourse to gain maximum glans rim friction. Others say their foreskin does stay back behind the rim during coital activity. In a few, the unwanted result can be paraphimosis. It all depends on the size of the glans, the depth of the rim and the amount and thickness of the foreskin as to whether it works or not. Then again every now and then a baby boy is born with a very short foreskin or even without any foreskin at all – a condition known as aposthia.

Given a few more millennia, who knows what might have evolved? I say 'might' because the 'interfering' practice of circumcision adopted by civilisation (which seems likely to continue) will have stopped nature's experimentation with the penis or at least skewed its results.

It is a pity that we can't order a penis like ordering a car. Given that prospect I would certainly delete the foreskin feature on the original model. Instead I would have the up rated larger glans fitted with the flared rim for better performance and to impress the ladies.

Unfortunately the production line at the manufacturers can't cope with these customised variations. At present they still have to be carried out by the dealer, either on delivery, or as a later 'in service' modification. Occasionally it has been done by a DIY enthusiast but this should be strongly discouraged as it can have damaging consequences which cannot be repaired under warranty.

Circumcision Debate: It Is Not Our Job To Discriminate

In the last edition, an extract from the on-line newsletter for GPs, pulse-i, was published. In it, a GP, Dr Fitton, told how he had reported a colleague to the General Medical Council for undertaking an infant circumcision. The following editions of pulse-i contained responses to Dr Fitton and these are reprinted below.

From Dr Michael Barrie

As doctors, we are privileged to treat patients from a plethora of racial and cultural backgrounds. Part of our remit is to be sensitive to the religious and customary practices of such individuals, and not to discriminate against those whose racial origin or faith requires observance of some or other practice. Circumcision is one such observance. The removal of the foreskin is an absolute prerequisite for Jews and Muslims and is culturally important to countless others – for example South Africans and Americans.

Dr Fitton states that a doctor who performs a circumcision “has engaged in a trade that is illegal” and challenges the GMC “not to sweep this under the carpet”. Indeed, Dr Fitton says he has already reported one doctor to the GMC for circumcising one of his patients. Does Dr Fitton instruct his Jewish and Muslim patients to eat pork on the basis that there is no medical reason why they should not? Likewise meat for the devout Hindus on his list? Should a Catholic doctor refuse to help a woman requesting a termination on the grounds that his (or her) religion forbids abortion?

Surely the GMC position here is absolutely clear: a doctor should not allow his own religious or personal beliefs to impact on the care of the patient. I perform circumcisions on those baby boys whose parents request the procedure. I am neither for nor against the operation. However, I do believe that we should respect the cultural and religious backgrounds of our patients. Not to refer parents requesting circumcision of their newborn son to a competent operator – someone who will circumcise the baby competently, under aseptic conditions, and using adequate anaesthesia – is tantamount to neglect. The parents will have in effect been fobbed off and may well seek a circumcision from an untrained and dangerous ‘backstreet’ operator. Surely the child deserves better?

From Dr R Willcourt

Dr John Fitton and his fellow travellers in the anti-circumcision brigade forcefully impose on the public their unscientific and emotional opinions disguised as facts. The characterisation that the baby was “rather miserable” due to “a grazed glans penis, chafing on its nappy”, is simply speculation. In fact, this child will have the benefits of a markedly lowered incidence of urinary infections leading to lowered rates of severe renal disease and virtually no chance of ever getting cancer of the penis which has a lifetime incidence of up to one in a 1,000 for an uncircumcised man. In addition, he will never have phimosis which occurs to some degree in up to 10 per cent of adult men, no painful and frightening tearing of the frenulum during sexual activity, nor any foreskin-related infections. Indeed, he will have no penile maintenance to contend with at all.

Perhaps Dr Fitton should himself be reported to the GMC for patient harassment and improper counselling. One can only hope that the unfortunate lady in this story has the ability to change to a physician with more professionalism and respect. Readers who would prefer factually-based material to the tripe dished out by anti-circumcision proponents should visit www.circs.org/index.html

From Dr B M Dodhy

It amazed me to read such an emotive Soapbox by Dr Fitton. Perhaps he hates the religions and not the practice of circumcision. The act of circumcision is not barbaric but it is dangerous and should be made illegal for untrained hands to perform. Dr Fitton talks about rights, but no one mentions our duties as human beings. Why does he not raise his voice against the thousands of killings that take place every year under the name of medical termination? Which is worse: taking a life or removal of a piece of skin? I see no harm in circumcision as long as it is carried out as a 'recognised surgical procedure'.

From Dr Gerald Weiss

Further to Dr Fitton's Soapbox, any mother would soon learn that "a grazed glans penis, chafing on its nappy" could be due to prolonged wet or fecal contact in the infant's perineal area. Proper diaper etiquette and knowledge, with or without being circumcised, is soon learned and is in the advisory instructions for medical students.

From Dr Peter McCormick

I read with interest and some concern the views of Dr Fitton. In reporting his colleague for misconduct he is making a very bold step. Once I had cause, as a GP in the UK, to be very upset about something I regarded as negligence in a local colleague. The correct action – in consultation with my partners – was to inform the medical director at the hospital concerned and leave the dispassionate investigation and remedy to him.

Things go wrong postoperatively in the best institutions and I am sure that a seasoned doctor such as Dr Fitton has seen this often enough. In my decade of work as a children's physician in The Gambia, Ghana and Cameroon I have seen hundreds of infants and children circumcised. True I have seen postoperative complications, and some of them are horrific. We all learn from such instances, and are better doctors as a result.

We should all avoid emotive language unbecoming of our profession. It seems to me there are more serious matters by far for Dr Fitton to address in his GP work in the UK than an occasional "grazed glans penis".

From Dr S Rahman

I am appalled that Pulse has given such prominence to Dr Fitton's tirade against male circumcision. His attitude reflects both prejudice and medical ignorance. Male circumcision has long been acknowledged as the safest of all surgical procedures undertaken on humans and remains one of the commonest. There is something surprising and worrying about somebody claiming to have practised medicine for three decades in three continents not to have come across male circumcision or referred poor miserable children with phimosis/ paraphimosis/ recurrent balanitis for circumcision.

Wasting the GMC's time and resources on complaints arising from jaundiced views of how other cultures lead their life is not a good reflection on Dr Fitton's personal and professional integrity. Pulse should be careful in giving too much space to such confused rantings.

From Simon Clarke

I was alarmed to read Dr Fitton's Soapbox. It is clear that he is not speaking as an unconcerned bystander but as a positive objector. If he were to have his way, no doctor in the UK would be able to perform this simple operation. Families would be forced to seek the services of unqualified backstreet 'physicians'. As it is, so few GPs are prepared to provide this simple service that many families have to travel hundreds of miles to find a qualified doctor prepared to operate.

At the Circumcision Agency we receive hundreds of inquiries each month from families looking for GPs to perform circumcisions. They don't know where to turn: the NHS doesn't want to know, private urologists charge thousands of pounds for the simplest operation, and patients should not be forced to risk the backstreet operators. It is a shame that more doctors do not see the benefits of providing this straightforward service. Any GP, with the proper training, can perform a circumcision. If managed well, it can provide the GP with much needed extra income, while providing the community with a much-needed service.

From Dr Peter Wilson

I don't think Dr Barrie and Dr Hawker are being quite honest when they suggest GPs should always respect the cultural and religious backgrounds of parents and their choice in the debate on circumcision. While not personally having very strong views on the subject – though I'm glad mine wasn't chopped off! – I rather doubt they would also respect a request from a patient for the female circumcision of a child on cultural grounds.

Response from Dr John Fitton

I was fascinated by the international response to my assertion that a child now has a right to bodily integrity and should be protected from injury. Informed intelligent debate is useful but a barrage of defensive dogma, albeit expected, is unhelpful in what is essentially a public health and human rights issue.

If anyone wishes dispassionately and objectively to learn more about the matter, www.norm-uk.org is a good website that provides patients with the sympathy and help that they are clearly unlikely to receive in some quarters. It is run by people who (presumably) have none of the almost congenital prejudice in favour of amputation of the foreskin.

I await the reaction of the GMC.

Editorial

Magpie is the word which best describes your editor. I borrow or steal from any source to make up your newsletter. For me, the words 'circumcision' and 'foreskin' on the written page shine through as brightly as any bejewelled ring does for the thieving bird. I pounce, seizing them for my store of treasure which I then display for your amazement and satisfaction!

The newsletter is thus an eclectic mix, giving, I hope, different perspectives on the subject which fascinates us all. But undoubtedly, the mainstay of the newsletter, and the items which are most appreciated by the members, are the personal stories – how you first learned of the difference between cut and uncut, how you felt about your own status, and, for many, how that status was changed. So I am pleased in this issue to continue the story of FE, the clean cut young sailor, and to publish the story of another member, JAQ. But such accounts are only possible if there is a steady flow from you of such information. So please, if you have not yet told your story, start writing now. We are all interested in what you have to say.

Circumcision and AIDS

Thirty eight million. That is the number of people estimated worldwide to be HIV positive. Seventy five per cent of these are in sub-Saharan Africa. In some countries, the infection rate is 20% or more. And this figure is even more shocking when you consider that it is the sexually active who are affected. AIDS is cutting a swathe through the young, the people who are the foundation of the country's future. The outlook for some communities is truly apocalyptic.

To some extent, HIV and AIDS have been tamed in industrialised countries. This has come about partly through education in terms of safe sex and condom use, partly through the availability of more effective anti-retroviral therapies so that HIV infection is no longer necessarily an early death sentence. These solutions are less relevant in the developing world. Condoms are not available or their use is deemed inappropriate for religious (and the attitude of the Roman Catholic church is not helpful in this respect) or cultural reasons – it's just not macho to wear a rubber! Drugs are expensive. Even where pharmaceutical firms make provision at prices which developing countries can afford, the infrastructure to distribute and to encourage regular and life long medication is just not in place.

Alternative approaches to curb the epidemic are therefore desperately needed and male circumcision may well have an important contribution to make. A number of studies have found significant geographic differences in the prevalence of HIV infection related to the extent to which circumcision is practised. Countries with a low level of male circumcision such as Zimbabwe, Botswana and Zambia experience a high prevalence of HIV infection, whereas countries with a high level of male circumcision, such as Cameroon and Ghana, have lower infection rates. The data cannot necessarily be taken at face value. There may be confounding factors, the greatest of which might be religious. In Islamic countries and communities, the sexually active male population will be almost 100% circumcised. Yet if a lower HIV infection rate were observed, it could be because Islam encourages more conservative sexual mores which would of itself inhibit the spread of the infection. It is important that such confounding factors are eliminated before a causal link between circumcision and reduced infection is deduced. Nevertheless, there have been some powerful studies which it is difficult to gainsay. In a study in Uganda, 0 of 50 circumcised men with infected spouses became HIV-infected after nearly 2 years of follow-up, whereas 40 of 137 uncircumcised men, also with infected spouses, seroconverted during the same period.

Critics have pointed out that such results are not replicated in studies in the industrial world. This however is hardly surprising. In developed countries, HIV infection is confined largely to the gay community and drug users. The virus is mainly transferred through anal intercourse or via contaminated needles direct into the blood stream. In neither situation is the circumcisional status of the person infected likely to be relevant. Of course, it would be possible in the gay community to try to identify a difference in infection rates between cut and uncut tops – but the usual assumption is that exclusively active partners are at much less risk than their passive counterparts. Either way, the whole biologic mechanism in gay intercourse is completely different from that in heterosexual sex where it appears that in vaginal intercourse, the uncircumcised penis is far more vulnerable to infection than its circumcised twin.

There has been speculation as to why this should be. The fact that the foreskin provides an environment which favours micro-organism survival and replication, and that it is more susceptible to trauma during intercourse may be contributory factors. The main reason, however, is probably the large concentration of Langerhans cells in the foreskin. These are known to be a prime target for HIV transmission. Their removal during circumcision provides the greater protection afforded to the circumcised penis. If this is the true reason, this argues for a low style of circumcision which removes the whole inner foreskin.

There is therefore much evidence that circumcision offers protection. Nevertheless, the consensus appears to be that the evidence is not yet conclusive. Male circumcision is a practice that is entangled in a complex web of cultural, religious, and medical beliefs. All the studies completed to date are observational. It is not possible in observational studies to control for all the possible confounders that are associated with this practice. Only through the process of randomisation, blindly assigning a large number of study participants to the treatment (circumcision) or the control (delayed circumcision) arm, can all possible confounding variables be controlled for. Three such randomised control trials are currently under way, and the results are not expected until 2006 or 2007. All three have sample sizes of more than 2700 and are powered to detect a 50% or greater protective effect. Whether this wait is justified is an interesting ethical question. Circumcision, if performed properly, is generally accepted to have few, if any, negative consequences. If therefore there is evidence already pointing towards circumcision having a protective effect, would it not be better to encourage mass circumcision now on the argument that it will certainly do no harm but may do good in reducing infection rates of a killer disease?

But even if the controlled trials do point to the prophylactic effect of circumcision, there are concerns about the wisdom of a policy of positive intervention. These centre on two issues. The first is the performance of the operation itself. Circumcision is a minor, relatively risk-free procedure if performed by an experienced operator in aseptic conditions. But in many African countries, circumcision is performed as a tribal rite often by ineffective practitioners in totally unsanitary conditions. Serious infection and/or mutilation, sometimes leading to death, can be the result. A programme of mass circumcision must therefore be preceded by the building of the necessary infrastructure to ensure that there are sufficient, accessible operators able to work in aseptic conditions. This is certainly a challenge in many of the poorer, rurally dominated countries, which constitute many of those worst affected by the epidemic.

The second concern is the changed behaviour which circumcision may bring. It is a well known fact that a reduction in risk factors can lead to people feeling freer to take greater risks. The wearing of seat belts leads car drivers to feel that they can be less careful in their driving. More relevant to this subject, perhaps, is the fact that the development of effective anti-AIDS drugs has led the gay community to be less careful about safe sex so that HIV infection rates are rising again. The fear in Africa, therefore, is that a man, having undergone circumcision, will feel that he has total protection against HIV and will therefore indulge in less safe sexual practices than he had heretofore.

It may be however that these two concerns can be addressed in the same manner. If the clinics, or whatever, that offer circumcision offer safe sex education at the same time, the newly circumcised men may come to realise that, whilst their level of protection has increased, it is certainly not 100%.

There must of course be another over-riding concern. Even if circumcision is shown to be effective, will men be willing to undergo an operation which they may perceive as painful, virility-threatening and against their cultural traditions? In fact, encouragingly, there are quite a number of studies indicating that significant proportions of men and boys (50% to 86%) will be circumcised in traditionally non-circumcising populations, if circumcision is provided at an affordable price. The reasons men in these studies give for preferring circumcision for themselves or their sons are many and include improvement of hygiene, lowering the risk of HIV and other sexually transmitted infection, appearing more modern or urban, fitting in with others, and being attractive to more women. The chances are therefore that, if cheap risk-free circumcision is available, men will take up the opportunity for themselves or their sons. The latter is of course important. Circumcision is likely to be most effective as a protection if it is carried out pre-puberty before first sexual intercourse. It could be that over time infant circumcision becomes acknowledged as the most cost effective way of providing early protection.

But suppose that safe, low cost circumcision becomes available but that men refuse the operation. Would compulsion ever be justified? The issue is similar to the MMR vaccine question in this country. The vaccine offers protection not just to the individual but, if sufficient children are vaccinated, to the population as a whole. This is because the fewer individuals that are susceptible to the diseases, the fewer are the opportunities for the viruses to take hold. By effective programmes of vaccination, the diseases of smallpox and polio have been virtually eliminated worldwide. Vaccination therefore both protects the individual and contributes to the immunity of the population as a whole. If the same logic is applied to circumcision and HIV, it may be that circumcision will not just help to protect the individual, but, if practised on a wide enough scale, will also help to reduce the incidence of the disease in the population as a whole.

The effects of mumps, measles or rubella can range from the unpleasant to the fatal for the individual concerned. But it could be argued that the effects of the disease are largely confined to the infected person. AIDS on the other hand, whilst being devastating for the person concerned, is also disastrous for society as a whole since a sick person takes up nursing resources and the death of a young person, replicated on the scale seen in some African countries, helps destroy the whole economic and social structure of the country. When the consequences of the disease are so dire, perhaps personal freedom has to suffer. Perhaps any government would be justified in making circumcision compulsory for all males.

A Clean-cut Young Sailor – Part 2

[In part 1 of his story, F.E. recounted how he remained uncircumcised during his school days despite a recommendation from the school doctor.]

At university, I had almost complete privacy, and didn't play any sports which necessitated mixing with my fellows in the showers, so I didn't see who was, or was not, circumcised. Towards the end of my three years I spent a fortnight in the Royal Naval Training Squadron, prior to starting my full-time National Service.

It was rumoured that those of us who were still Cavaliers would be circumcised as soon as we joined up. Later, it turned out that this rumour was largely true. On the Lower Deck, Roundheads outnumbered Cavaliers by two to one. But I couldn't wait until then, and one evening in my last term I took a sharp pair of scissors, pulled my foreskin forward, and cut it off. When I got to the hospital I asked the doctor to circumcise me properly. He stitched the foreskin together and congratulated me on having done such a good job. My foreskin was now much shorter. It would still cover the glans when my cock was flaccid, but retract fully when I got hard as if I had been completely circumcised. After a while the scar-ring became hardly visible.

At my first medical inspection on joining the Royal Navy, I asked the doctor if I could be circumcised. He said that my foreskin was short and loose enough and there was no need to remove it. However, three of my classmates were circumcised immediately.

In the Royal Navy, physical sexual activity of any kind was absolutely forbidden on board ship or in any shore establishment (except married quarters). When I was in the training squadron, one of the officers was caught in flagrante delicto with a junior seaman in his cabin. Rather than face court martial, he eluded his guard and jumped overboard at night, and that was the end of him. Nevertheless, male-bonding was considered quite normal. We were expected to have a particularly close chum – or Oppo. My Oppo, another National Serviceman, and I compared our cocks. His foreskin just covered the flange of his knob. He didn't know whether he had been circumcised or not. He thought he may have had the skin trimmed like I had done mine, but there was no scar. Another of my mess-mates had been beautifully circumcised – a real cosmetic job. His knob was like a peach. The scar-ring was close up to his body. His hairless cock was completely smooth all the way along. Where his frenulum had been there was a 'V' shaped cut on the underside of his knob.

Confirming the rumour we had heard earlier, it turned out that two thirds of our mess-mates were circumcised. Their clean-cut knobs were clearly outlined in their tight-fitting uniform bell-bottomed trousers. They taunted those of us who were not. Four out of the five Leading Seamen, and five of the seven National Service Ordinary Seamen, were Clean Cut. All the older Able Seamen were Cavaliers. Half of the younger Regular ABs and ODs were Roundheads. Eventually half of the remaining young Cavaliers were prevailed upon to submit their cocks to the knife. Just at that time I was sent off to join the Upper Yardsmen's (Officers) Course, and the opportunity to be circumcised was missed. Most of the Upper Yardsmen had been educated at Public School. There was no difference in the numbers of Cavaliers and Roundheads. At long last I was no longer in a minority.

After National Service I was destined to make a desk-bound career. I needed some kind of regular exercise. I was no good at ball games or athletics, so I joined a Keep Fit class organised by the local school, soon after I started my first job. The members of the class came from all walks of life. Their ages ranged from 17 to 70. The number of Roundheads was exactly the same as Cavaliers. There was no difference between social class and age group. So no-one was embarrassed by being in a minority one way or the other. Although changes of job and location meant joining a new Keep Fit class every so often, these proportions remained the same.

After I left full-time service, I continued as a Reserve Officer part-time. We had a lot of medical students who were destined for careers in the Navy after they graduated. One evening in the mess, the subject of conversation was sex, as usual. Someone asked what was special about circumcision. There was a lot of heated discussion. One of the senior medical students explained the benefits, as he understood them. He had been circumcised in infancy, so could not speak with before-and-after experience. He could not remember having been circumcised, and never knew that he had been until he went to school.

"Circumcision is hygienic. The foreskin of an uncircumcised cock has to be retracted and the foul smelling smegma which collects under it washed away regularly. This is a painful and frightening experience the first few times it is done in boyhood when the foreskin is still tight. It becomes very pleasurable as the skin loosens, and leads inevitably to wanking. Keeping the uncircumcised knob clean is no protection against fungous infection which abounds in public showers and changing rooms. Circumcised men never develop cancer of the cock; nor their wives cancer of the cervix. For these reasons alone, all boys should be circumcised in infancy.

"Circumcision does not disable wanking. There is no loose skin to rub over the knob of course. Because it is insensitive, there is no danger of premature ejaculation, but it can take quite a long time to come. It can be very frustrating, but the reward is a satiating abdominal orgasm. A clean-cut cock is symbolic of a Clean Mind in a Healthy Body. It feels good too – clean and free. During sex there is no interference with two-way stimulation of the flange. Condoms are comfortable and stay on. The obviously clean and odourless knob encourages cock-sucking."

Altogether, he was very glad that he had been circumcised, and strongly recommended it.

Soon after that I visited my doctor and told him my story. I wanted to be completely circumcised. He didn't try to dissuade me and referred me to a specialist. The operation was done in hospital under a general anaesthetic the following week. The cut healed up in a few days. I was very pleased with the result. I was delighted with my now naked glans and flared corona. I could feel it all the time. Although the remaining skin was not completely immobile when I was hard, condoms no longer rucked up and pulled off.

However I became increasingly dissatisfied with the web of frenulum that was still attached to the underside of the knob, and the thick scar. The surgeon had explained that he would not remove the frenulum – Love's Guitar, he called it, because it remained sensitive. The scar was very thick because of the way he had folded the skin to get a good mucosal adhesion, as he had explained. He had used so-called soluble stitches, but they never disappeared completely and left holes, which did not close up, where they had been.

Many years later, I was working in a Muslim country. I had to have a routine general medical examination. I told the doctor about my circumcision, and he said he would be quite happy to tidy it up. He removed the frenulum and the old thick scar. It took some time for the skin and the new scar to stretch to accommodate the erection. Now my cock is beautifully smooth all over. When I am hard, the remaining skin on my cock is very tight and completely immobile. My scrotum tightens up and holds my balls firmly at the base of my cock. It takes me much longer to come, which pleases me and my partners. I have been delighted with the result ever since.

A Very Manly Piece Of Skin

I have been uncertain about renewing my membership of Acorn because I have felt for several months that Acorn hasn't done enough to stem the anti-foreskin brigade with their hurtful and very negative attitude and remarks in regard to the foreskin. Some of them consider that foreskins are boyish and look upon them as unhealthy, dirty, filthy and unmanly. What utter claptrap! No wonder mere uncircumcised members of Acorn have left and haven't renewed their membership over the past years.

I am circumcised and fully support circumcision for religious reasons, as an initiation rite to manhood, and on medical grounds for paraphimosis when it is not medically possible to relieve the condition. Apart from these three reasons, I personally don't see any need for anyone to be circumcised. Having said that, from a personal point of view, any male that wishes to be circumcised, that is entirely up to him. It is called 'live and let live' and the anti-foreskin brigade should adopt exactly the same policy.

I know an uncircumcised guy that doesn't find the circumcised penis attractive but he doesn't get on his soapbox and talk about it in a negative way. Let all of us be more constructive in a sensitive way in airing our opinions. I absolutely love being circumcised but I find both the circumcised and uncircumcised penis equally attractive to look at and also to admire. In fact, a very large number of circumcised males worldwide are admirers of the foreskin and find it very erotic and exciting.

Between the ages of 13 and 18 (1960-1965) I took part in a lot of mutual masturbation. I much preferred the friends who still had their foreskins and I would only masturbate with those who were uncircumcised. To me the uncircumcised penis was far more erotic and sexually exciting at all times. Whenever my friends or I pushed back their foreskins, I always saw smegma. In some of my friends it was thick and had a very strong smell and I always touched it and their very moist and wet sensitive glans. Since then I've always been a big fan of smegma and I enjoy reading stories of guys involved in mutual masturbation where smegma (cheese) is mentioned.

I first joined Acorn in the early 1990's and in those days it described itself as an organisation for people interested in circumcision and foreskins. Now it sounds very pro-circumcision and anti-foreskin, judging by the letters that we read in the newsletter. This is hardly surprising because, according to Acorn's own figures, the majority of its members are circumcised. I would like to ask the anti-foreskin brigade what they find so wrong with the foreskin. It is actually a very manly and masculine piece of skin that serves a very important function.

Finally Complete

I was born, notionally at least, as a Christian but my father had Jewish blood. For most of my life I wanted to be circumcised, achieving this only when I was 32 (22 years ago). Three years ago I came to the inescapable conclusion that I wished to convert to Judaism and – for a number of reasons – this had to be Liberal Judaism. Now, with my circumcised cock and my certificate of admission to the Jewish faith, I finally feel complete (as it were).

Have any other members who have sought circumcision had similar feelings about Judaism (or indeed Islam)?

One further point – I was not required to be circumcised because I had already had the op. I volunteered though for a procedure called hatafat dam b'rit because I still wanted to do something special to mark my admission to Judaism. The procedure is required for those converting to Orthodox Judaism but I was the first person coming to the notice of the (Liberal) mohel as wanting it done and he had never performed the procedure before. The procedure involves a pinprick around the circumcision scar and the drawing off of a minute amount of blood by pipette plus appropriate prayers.

My Story

I was not circumcised as an infant and I didn't really know what it meant until I was about 11 years old. My best friend as a young boy (aged about 5) had been circumcised but at the time I assumed that his 'skin was back all the time'. My mother taught me from a fairly early age to retract the foreskin in the bath to clean underneath, so I knew it could be retracted, and what it looked like underneath. Until I was about 11 years old, I was unaware that some boys had their foreskins removed by surgery.

When I started at Grammar school aged 11 (1961), PE and games were held weekly and there were opportunities to see other naked boys in the showers. I became aware fairly soon that other boys had 'skin back all the time', although I still didn't know why. I'm not exactly sure when I discovered more about the penis, but it probably came up in conversation with my peers. I also read in the Bible during RE lessons about the circumcision of Christ, although I didn't really connect this with foreskins. I thought there must be another ceremony by the same name.

My family moved home when I was 13 so I started a new school. Here, games and showers were much more frequent and compulsory. There was no room for modesty in the changing rooms and I was soon aware that a much greater proportion of my school friends, probably 40%, were circumcised. This coincided with the onset of puberty and I naturally became more aware of my penis, its size and, more importantly, its shape. My foreskin was not excessively long but extended beyond the tip of the glans, even when erect. It was fully retractable but never did so on its own. I soon became envious of my circumcised peers – particularly those with a well developed glans – and, at the same time, I began to loathe my foreskin. I observed during these years that two boys of my age returned after the summer holidays minus their foreskins – lucky devils! Circumcision became a fascination, almost an obsession, which featured regularly during masturbation. I attempted to keep the foreskin retracted, to appear circumcised, but the over-sensitivity of the glans became uncomfortable and often caused unwelcome erections. It became an ambition to lose my hated foreskin – but how?

I endured my school days as a cavalier, although the desire to be circumcised remained. My foreskin was retractable until I was about 19, when for some reason it became very tight and completely unretractable – a severe case of phimosis. This made sexual experimentation very difficult; I did nothing for several months, but finally found the courage to make an appointment with my GP. I was very embarrassed to explain my problem but he was very matter-of-fact about it, told me that I would have to be circumcised and referred me to a surgeon. It was now early 1970; I waited patiently (and with trepidation) to receive an appointment from the hospital until one morning a brown envelope with a telltale postmark appeared through the letterbox. I was now on the road to becoming a roundhead. The most difficult task was explaining the situation to my parents, who had never been open about any sexual matters – in fact, my father avoided any conversation on the topic. I therefore found explaining my situation very awkward and embarrassing.

The hospital appointment was only a consultation and lasted ten minutes or less. The surgeon was a grumpy, middle-aged man who told me he would “whip it off” and his secretary would be in touch. Again I waited but this time not for long. Within a month I received an appointment for admission five weeks later. Now I was really on the road to becoming a roundhead; my foreskin’s days were numbered!

I arrived at the hospital at the arranged time, filled with apprehension but also very excited at the prospect of becoming a roundhead. There had already been some embarrassment explaining to various people what I would be doing for the next few days (I lied to some), and more during admission to the ward, containing about five other patients being prepared for various surgical procedures. I was the only one in for circumcision, but the nurses and doctors were very matter-of-fact (just like my GP) and eventually wheeled me off to the theatre. I remember a needle in the back of my hand but very little else before being returned to the ward minus my foreskin. I slept reasonably well that night and enjoyed an early breakfast. Then came the surgeon’s ward round accompanied by a crowd of medical students! They all seemed satisfied with my condition but I was beginning to experience a burning sensation around the cut line under a tight dressing which exposed only the tip of my penis for urination; this was another new experience for me as I had never been able to urinate with the foreskin retracted. This had always caused an erection which necessitated rehooding the glans until the feeling subsided.

I was later instructed by a nurse to take a bath in a nearby room and put several scoops of salt into the water. I climbed into the bath and gingerly unpeeled the blood soaked dressing to reveal a swollen and bruised penis with stitched scar line just behind the glans. I was surprised (but pleased) that the whole foreskin had been removed having read in Forum and other books that NHS circumcision usually removed only part of the foreskin. The most intense sensation was the sensitivity of the exposed glans – this is often described as sensitive as an eyeball and I can’t argue with that. The only other discomfort was caused by the snagging of the stitches on my underwear; these eventually came out on their own, much to my relief. The burning sensation soon faded and within about three weeks the glans sensitivity had also diminished. By now I was feeling quite horny, not having masturbated since before my operation.

I decided to wait a few days longer because the scar line was still quite tender, and I had no wish to endure pain during a normally pleasurable activity. I woke one morning a few days later with a strong erection and knew that the time had come. I grasped my rigid member with an enclosed fist below the glans and started rubbing to produce the most wonderful sensation I had ever experienced. In spite of my efforts to prolong the pleasure, I soon ejaculated with an explosive orgasm, the semen shooting several feet across the bedroom. I was now a complete roundhead and there was no turning back. Mission accomplished!

This took place long before the advent of the Internet: there is now a plethora of information available on the subject and circumcision seekers have all the information at their fingertips. Whether NHS patients have any choice in the result is another matter, but some clinics can provide the service at a very reasonable cost. With hindsight, I would certainly pay for the operation and style I desired if I were in the same position I was in 35 years ago. Although quite satisfied with my penis, I would ideally have preferred the 'high and tight' look often mentioned in communication and on the various websites. My own circumcision is what I would call low and fairly tight: the scar is just behind the glans with a little bunching of shaft skin when completely flaccid. There is a small amount of movement when erect and this is ideal for dry masturbation. I occasionally use lubricant but it's not really necessary. The frenulum was not removed although I would quite like to lose it if I ever thought about a revision.

I still spend time reading all the information I can find on circumcision. As well as Acorn, there is plenty on the Internet. There are certainly many individuals who lament the loss of their foreskins and go to the trouble of restoration. I would never consider this and I often wonder what drives so many to do so. They all seem to be very bitter about having been 'deprived' of their foreskins during infancy: I would suggest that their parents made a decision in the best interest of their children. Am I in favour of routine circumcision for all male babies? A difficult one, but I would have been spared the problem I encountered if my parents had made that decision for me. I think that a mix of those with and without is the ideal; I consider myself one of an elite group and that would not exist if we were all roundheads.

That's my story except for one small point. I remember reaching forty years of age; this marked the 20th anniversary of my circumcision and very important to me as I had now been a roundhead longer than I was a cavalier – a significant milestone and a feeling of elation and achievement. After all these years I still become quite aroused by any mention of circumcision: I think I always will.

An Uncircumcised Jew

Stewart Steven, who died in January 2004, enjoyed a colourful and controversial journalistic career as the editor of The Mail on Sunday for 10 years and the London Evening Standard for three more.

Born in Hamburg, Steven was brought to Britain when his Jewish parents fled Nazi Germany. He liked to boast years later that he was a rare example of an uncircumcised Jew, explaining that many Jews born in the late 1930's were given a dispensation by rabbis not to be circumcised. One evening in a pub off Fleet Street he was challenged to prove the fact, so he took a Daily Mail reporter, Tim Miles, to the lavatory. A minute later, with a beaming Steven behind him, Miles emerged with raised thumbs to an outburst of cheering.

From a report in The Guardian

Dr Fitton – Another Response

[In issue 1/2005, a letter from a Dr Fitton, extracted from an on-line newsletter for GPs, was published, condemning infant circumcision. In issue 2/2005, responses which appeared in later editions of the newsletter were published. Now a member has his say on the same topic.]

I do not think that the protest of Dr John Fitton against infant circumcision should go unchallenged. It is not clear whether this Kettering doctor has reported his colleague for performing a botched circumcision, or simply carrying out a procedure to meet the mother's cultural obligation – in common with dozens of doctors, who do the same every day, across the UK. If the former, all well and good; if the latter he is well out of order. Male circumcision is the oldest, recognised surgical procedure, accepted for its benefits worldwide. These transcend the boundaries of mere medical opinion. In no way can it be compared to slavery, corporal punishment, or the disenfranchisement of women.

We are not told whether this doctor has himself been circumcised? If so, he may well have a grudge because it was also botched. Or, more likely, he wasn't educated by his parents and given a positive view of his body image and the advantages of his status. From such bases, circumcised malcontents are born.

However if, as I rather suspect, Dr Fitton is uncircumcised, he is not in a position to pass such a negative opinion against the millions, like me, who are happily so. He would also do well to reflect that he will have seen dozens of other 'rather miserable' baby boys with infected foreskins. The nappy stage is particularly conducive to irritations in this area for girls as well as boys – irrespective of whether the latter are circumcised or not. One thing is for sure; the permanently exposed glans of the Ghanaian infant, once toilet trained, and in a clean, airy, environment, will be a lot healthier than many of his foreskinned contemporaries who go on to carry that moist bacteriological incubator around for life. As a consequence, they may, at any time, become one of the thousands of boys and men who have to undergo an unwelcome, embarrassing, painful, and expensive circumcision in later life.

Can't Help Wondering

There used to be a web-site with the name "Can't help wondering". An image of a young man would appear and we would be invited to offer an opinion as to whether he was circumcised or not. When the poll closed, a naked image was shown and our suspicions confirmed – or otherwise. I only surf the web occasionally as I do not have a computer at home, but I still "can't help wondering". So how does one get an idea of the rate of circumcision amongst young men today?

As I am now into my second half-century, I am long past the stage of sharing communal showers with football teams and I do not like the gay sauna scene. I was therefore delighted to be able to borrow a casting tape made by a gay film maker featuring British men aged 18-24. The tape contained film of ten men. All were required to strip and masturbate. Of the ten men shown, two were circumcised – 20%. Of the remaining eight, seven had no apparent foreskin problems but one could not retract his foreskin at all and was an obvious candidate for the knife. There is of course no way of knowing how representative this sample is but it not far away from other estimates I have seen.

Apart from discrete observation, there are other ways of finding out the status of friends and work-mates. Fifteen years ago, a new bar opened near my home. The first bar manager was a young Englishman from Devon. Being a beer lover, I got to know Wes quite well and we had many conversations. Wes was working on his 25th birthday and, as the bar was quiet, we chatted about his future plans. He said that he was not ready to settle down and was thinking of going to Israel to work on a kibbutz. I said jokingly that he would do better to pick grapes in France as he would need an operation if he went to Israel. He laughed and replied that he had been circumcised at birth. Wes was not Jewish and was born and RIC'ed in Plymouth in 1965.

Some years before, when I was in the road haulage industry, I called every week at an electronics factory in Edinburgh. I got to know a young storeman called Jim. At the same time, Jim (a Catholic) was arranging his wedding. There was talk of his factory being taken over by another company. At the time (the early 80's) unemployment was a major problem and Jim was worried that he might lose his job as a result of the take-over. I said, tongue in cheek, that he should be more worried about the Catholic church being taken over by the Jewish faith. He smiled and said: "Too late – I've already had that done." It is strange for me to think that both these guys will be nearly 40.

At work, a colleague told me that his two sons had been circumcised within eighteen months of each other during the last two years. Both were eight years old at the time of their operations and had been referred following medical examinations at school. As I write, a third child is on the way and it has already been decided that, if it is a boy, he will be cut at birth.

I would be interested to know from younger members their estimate of the circumcision rate among men in their own age group.

I visited New Zealand recently and had a wonderful time. It is a marvellous place and I would recommend it as a holiday destination. I was however amazed at the number of foreskins I spotted there. Many years ago I saw a book called Sons of the sun. This was a book of photographs of naked New Zealand naturists and I well remember every last one of them was circumcised. Now it appears that anyone under 26-27 years is uncut. I discussed the issue with several Kiwis and estimates of current rates varied according to age. A guy in his mid-twenties (who was himself cut) reckoned about half his school mates were cut. Another young man of 20 (himself uncircumcised) said that only one of fifteen boys in his class at school was circumcised.

This contrasts with my experience of Australians who were always, in my experience, more likely to be cut than Kiwis. I have read that the circumcision rate in Australia has plummeted to 10% but I have my doubts. I have discussed the subject with three London based Aussies in the last six months. All were aged 22-27 and all were circumcised. But more significantly, all three had recently-born nephews in Australia and all the youngsters had been cut at birth.

Any updates from members in Australia or New Zealand would be most welcome.

A Date For Your Diary

The next Acorn Society meeting will take place over the weekend of 5th/6th November. There will be more details and a booking form in the next edition of the newsletter but put the date in your diary now!

An Adult Perspective

Can I give my current perspective about routine infant circumcision. I read a lot that the 'choice' should be left to your child. Here is my problem, I am married to a guy whose parents made a choice that he would not be circumcised as a child. He did not have any problems until he was married and now the choice is (a) go through 6 weeks of no sex and a lot of pain or (b) tolerate the intermittent problems he has with his foreskin.

The problem is that my husband hates the thought of surgery on his penis. He had major anxiety over the flu shot he got this fall (no man intimidates him, but needles make him shake). We also are a relatively affectionate couple and three days would seem like a long time to remain celibate; six weeks would be torture. I have read that up to 1 in 10 guys have to be circumcised for medical reasons. I have to wonder how many 'fly under the radar' like my husband because the operation itself is not worth it. He was thinking of getting circumcised earlier this year so I looked it up on the Internet. I read about the six week recovery and I told him I would respect his decision but I thought it sounded really painful. He agreed and for now we aren't having problems so the issue has been dropped.

My friend had her son circumcised by a Rabbi (she's Jewish) and the kid did not even cry. I doubt my 38 year old husband would have such a reaction. My husband would now have to go through an expensive procedure to cut his much larger sexually mature penis. He is a manager and he would have to miss work which he rarely does. He is married but would have to remain celibate. My friend's son never missed out on any work or sex and his proportionally smaller penis healed quickly. I am aware of the cons. I do not kid myself about it. I don't want to desensitize my son. I am not totally convinced he would be because in my part of the country most guys are circumcised. I have yet to meet a woman who finishes before her husband does (though I know they must exist) whether he is cut or not. Anyway, since we are trying for one more I will continue to research this topic.

But my point once again is that there is no answer that will guarantee that a child won't query the choice made for him. My husband is uncut and unhappy with his parents' decision. My brothers are cut and happy with our parents' decision. I have no doubt I could find men in the polar opposite situation. I say either way, as a parent, you are taking a risk. I am not saying all this to point out that RIC should be done but rather to say that parents shouldn't kid themselves about the 'choice' they make for their son. If they choose to wait until he is an adult, they are subjecting him to possibly having to undergo a painful and perhaps humiliating procedure, or possibly having to deal with intermittent or chronic pain.

Keratinisation

Could any members let me know whether something can be done to reduce 'keratinisation' of the glans after circumcision. By this I mean the hardening of the mucous membrane that occurs post-operatively to varying degrees, often reducing sensitivity considerably.

From my own observations, mature men circumcised in infancy often show a marked degree of keratinisation with very white crepey glanses. Those circumcised later in life apparently develop the dry, whitish glans associated with the roundhead style to a lesser degree, but they also grow a tougher, less sensitive, exterior more reminiscent of normal skin.

Is there any product on the market that reduces keratinisation? Some kind of cream, perhaps, thereby increasing sensitivity. In my own case, hardening of the glans is not (yet) very advanced since my adult circumcision some years ago. To halt the process, I have tried using Nivea, but without any positive result. Should anyone have any relevant information available, I should be grateful to find out about it.

Pride

In the local sports centre recently, I saw a couple of small boys around 8-10 years old – part of a school party who were changing – who displayed very nicely circumcised penises. The fascinating thing was that they were bounding around nude whereas their uncut pals were doing their best to remain covered up. This brings to mind a sighting last summer in a beach toilet when a boy of about 12 made no attempt to hide the fact that he was neatly cut. It seems to me that cut boys are proud of the fact that they are different. Certainly it mirrors my own experience as an uncut school boy.

Editorial

Sadly, this edition contains the resignation of our long serving Chairman and former editor, David. He considers that the Acorn newsletter has become too biased – pro-circumcision, anti-foreskin. I have too much respect for David and his contribution to the Society over many years to undertake a detailed rebuttal – indeed, he may be right.

My defence, if any, is that I print what I receive. I wield my editorial pen lightly – I do not see it as my role to come between the member and his message. The views members express are personal; they may be opinionated, biased, or just plain wrong. If this is the case, it is for other members to take up their pen and contradict.

If the majority of articles are pro-circumcision, the solution, dear member, lies in your hands. I do not have a cache of pro-foreskin articles stacked up in my study, censored through personal bias. Au contraire, such articles go to the front of the queue because of the general paucity of such material. So, if you disagree with what you read in our newsletter, please do not resign. Instead, take the argument to the other camp by putting the contrary viewpoint.

Manifesto For A Healthy Foreskin

Phimosis, paraphimosis, balanitis, frenulum breve. These are the main diseases of the foreskin which can lead to a requirement for circumcision. We know that something over 20,000 circumcisions are performed annually on the NHS, largely for medical reasons. In all, about 5% of males have foreskin problems which lead to their being circumcised.

But recent articles in Acorn have indicated that there could be many men who also suffer, but suffer in silence. In issue 1/2005, G.D. told the story of his father-in-law who suffered lifelong phimosis which made intercourse painful. He was too embarrassed to seek medical help and marital relations were confined virtually to the times his children were conceived, much to the frustration of his wife. In issue 2/2005, a correspondent from the Internet reported how her husband has a short frenulum, causing sex to be uncomfortable at times. But the thought of injections, and the pain and inconvenience of an operation, left him living with the condition. And in this edition, we reprint an article from The Independent where the author tells how he lived for years with an unretractable foreskin before a chance medical encounter led him to seek help.

Long gone are the days of routine school medical examinations; and doctors and nurses these days are inhibited from genital examinations through fear of accusations of pederasty. So many men, to use a phrase from one of the articles quoted above, 'fly under the radar'. They have foreskin problems of which they are vaguely aware but, either through ignorance or embarrassment, they decide not to seek help. It is likely that about 5% of men fall into this category. In other words, there may be a million men in the UK today who have sub-optimal sex lives because of physical problems.

Some Acorn members will immediately argue that this reinforces the case for routine infant circumcision. But such a policy requires the slaughter of nine healthy foreskins for every problematic one. So if RIC is not viable, we should seek another solution. Of course the more extreme of the anti-circumcision brigade argue that the foreskin is inherently healthy and requires absolutely no care or attention. Indeed they actively disapprove such action. This is patent nonsense. The truth is that the foreskin, left to its own devices, can be potentially damp and malodorous, ready to play host to bacterial infection. If the foreskin is to remain, it requires a positive programme for its care and maintenance, which should be the responsibility of the parents, the medical practitioners, and ultimately the boy himself. Hence my manifesto for the foreskin:

- 1 From early infancy, when the baby is being bathed, his foreskin should be retracted very gently as far as it will go to start to put pressure on adhesions between the foreskin and the glans.
- 2 At the age of five, all boys should be medically examined to ensure that the foreskin will fully retract. Where this is not possible, there should be surgical intervention to clear any remaining adhesions. If there is phimosis, defined as the opening of the foreskin being too narrow to permit retraction, circumcision should be performed.

- 3 As soon as the foreskin can be retracted, the boy should be taught to retract the foreskin fully for urination.
- 4 As soon as the foreskin can be retracted, the boy should be taught to retract it fully and wash thoroughly underneath at every bath or shower.
- 5 Chronic or persistent balanitis should be treated by circumcision. Every foreskin will occasionally be subject to mild irritation. This should however clear in two or three days. Balanitis is described as chronic if an attack persists for more than two weeks or persistent if more than two attacks of a week's duration are suffered. Once a foreskin is subject to balanitis, attacks are likely to reoccur at frequent intervals until the root cause, the foreskin, is removed.
- 6 Boys should be taught to retract their foreskins and leave them retracted for significant periods of time. This can be beneficial in training the foreskin to remain retracted (see point 8 below) and can also assist in reducing the over-sensitivity of the permanently covered glans.
- 7 Even where phimosis does not exist in infancy, it can occur during childhood or puberty. Full development of the glans can often mean that it becomes too large for the opening of the foreskin. Boys should therefore be medically checked at puberty to ensure that full retraction is still possible.
- 8 Boys should be medically checked again when growth is complete, at about age 18, to ensure that the foreskin can still retract fully. At this stage, the erect penis should be checked to ensure (a) that frenulum breve is not present; (b) that, as the penis becomes erect, the foreskin of itself retracts automatically and fully behind the glans, i.e. without manual intervention.

This last point brings us to the question of so-called 'redundant foreskin'. Whilst this term has no exact medical definition, it has nevertheless been used by doctors in the past, and may even be used now, as a justification for circumcision.

The mature foreskin varies considerably from male to male. At one end of the spectrum, it is very short, only partially covering the glans. In some men it may be so short that it stays almost permanently retracted. In such cases, there is little difference from a loosely circumcised penis – indeed, to the casual on-looker, the man may appear to be circumcised. At the other extreme, the foreskin extends well beyond the tip of the glans, sometimes by as much as an inch or more.

Our consideration here has to be based on the functionality of the foreskin during intercourse. It is highly desirable that the glans should remain fully exposed during all stages of vaginal intercourse, i.e. on both the in-stroke and the out-stroke and for the duration of intercourse until ejaculation has occurred. This is important for both partners. The male receives full stimulation of the glans only when it is exposed and moves against the vagina wall – it is this stimulation which gives the ecstatic pleasure which the male enjoys and which in due course brings him to climax. At the same time, it is the exposed glans which is most effective in stimulating the female. With a long foreskin which remains unretracted during intercourse, the male is effectively moving within his own foreskin. This cannot provide the same effective direct stimulation of the glans as when the glans is fully exposed. So the experience is less enjoyable for the male; and equally so for the female since she now receives no direct stimulation, only the sense of the man moving within his own foreskin.

It is for these reasons that the last point in the manifesto is important. If a man's foreskin retracts of its own volition on erection, it is likely that it will remain in that position throughout intercourse. If the glans can only be exposed by manual intervention, the foreskin is likely to remain mobile during intercourse resulting in glans coverage, to the detriment of both partners. The ability of the foreskin to self-retract will depend upon a number of factors – the strength of the erection, the degree to which the penis expands when tumescent and, critically, the length of the foreskin. It is self evident that a long foreskin which extends well beyond the glans is less likely to retract fully than its much shorter counterpart. Add to this the consideration that the long foreskin is more susceptible to balanitis and to harbouring bacteria and the reasoning behind the quasi-medical diagnosis of redundant foreskin becomes clearer. There has probably been no investigation into the correlation between foreskin length and foreskin problems. Nevertheless, there is a case for viewing with some suspicion any foreskin which, in the adult male, extends beyond the tip of the glans. In the manifesto for the healthy foreskin, such foreskins could well be judged, prima facie, unhealthy and therefore worthy of excision.

Letter From The Chairman

Having been editor for 10 years and Chairman for about 12, I've always prided myself as showing no bias over the debate on foreskins and circumcision. We now have an editor advocating worldwide circumcision as a cure for AIDS. As well, his arguments don't hold the full quota of water. I have researched the black African rate of circumcision, and find that, apart from Zimbabwe, all the countries have full or highly dominant circumcision rates. Don't take my word for it, read Acorn President's book, Circumcision, an Ethnomedical Study and if you log onto GAYDAR website you can go through all the major countries in the world and find their circumcision ratios. The two highest rates and deaths are Africa and the USA, both almost totally circumcised, while Europe, Russia, India and China, with all those billions of foreskins have no epidemic at all.

In the latest edition of Acorn I was appalled to read the invective delivered to the foreskin. Also by the lies in it. Regarding Clean-cut Young Sailor (do I have to assume by the number of times 'clean-cut' appears, that the antonym is 'dirty-uncut'), I was in the Navy for 25 years from 1942 on, for a time at the induction centre HMS Raleigh, and at no time was there a programme of forced circumcision. This would have been against normal human rights and NHS directive when it was instituted. I only ever knew of one circumcision and that was by a sailor who accidentally tore his foreskin. As for the ratio of circumcision in the Navy, it had to be the same as nationally at the time, which was the exact opposite of the lie stated,  $\frac{2}{3}$  uncircumcised,  $\frac{1}{3}$  circumcised, which is so well documented. It couldn't be otherwise.

He also comes out with all the old clichés. The incidence of smegma is very low. I have had a foreskin for 78 years and come into contact with many others, but still haven't smelt a bad smell from them. Circumcision is only hygienic to those who don't bath or shower very often... To the rest of us the subject is a non-starter. Also, where does he think we put our cocks to catch all these infections in showers? Next, the cancer rate of circumcised cocks is not zero. Years ago it was published that penile cancer in the uncircumcised was double that of the circumcised. The laugh came when it was stated later that the rate for circumcised was something like 1 in 50,000, and the rate for uncircumcised was 2 in 50,000. All in all that letter was full of intolerant rubbish and lies.

I won't go through the rest of the edition except to say that there was so much intolerant innuendo, with phrases such as 'nicely circumcised', 'neatly cut', 'husband uncut and unhappy, brother cut and happy', I am elite, and of course 'clean-cut'. 'Moist bacteriological incubator' is the very end. Would all the circumcised be happy if the rest kept telling them that they were not normal, disfigured, or desecrated? Of course not, but I know that a lot of 'normal' men think that way. It's just too insensitive to shout about it. Apparently it is thought to be OK from a minority group, but that's how wars and terrorism start. INTOLERANCE.

I was happy to read I.N.L.'s letter, his heart being in the right place. One has to remember that there are many billions more with foreskins in the world, in those continents I've previously mentioned as well as all of South America, and the world hasn't come to an end through about 6 billion years because of those 'nasty' foreskins. When we started Acorn we stated that one of the aims was to ensure that one's cock was in the best possible shape – FOR ONESELF. Not to denigrate another person's point of view.

Having got all that off my chest, I believe that, with the one-sidedness we have now, and with the membership at an all time low because of it, the demise of Acorn is imminent (even the circumcised will get fed up with 'My Operation'), and it is with regret that I resign as Chairman and as a member. I thank and think well of all the friends I have made during the 18 years since we started.

Cut Off In His Prime

From an article by Neil Forsyth in The Independent, 5 June 2005

It was around six months ago that I awoke one morning to find an eye puffy and bloodshot and, with my local medical centre just 100 yards away, I decided to side with caution and make a rare visit. The doctor diagnosed an errant piece of grit. Perhaps it was the jollity of having a one-eyed view of the world that made me hesitate when the doctor asked whether there was anything else, or perhaps it was genuinely the wish to ease myself of over a decade of occasional concerns. "Um, yeah," I answered cautiously, "there might well be."

I can't remember when I first realised there was something not quite right with my penis, but there was something about the caricatures carved in steamy schoolbus windows that didn't quite make sense – that portion at the top, why was it separated by a horizontal line? My humble offering had a covering fold of skin that remained resolutely fixed near the very point of urination, with only the slightest movement to hint at the glories underneath.

By the time a realisation of sorts set in by late adolescence, it was married to the comforting finding that sex was by no means ruled out, requiring only heightened care. There were some exceptions and, without dragging uncomfortable detail forward, there were occasional abandonments of activities.

Yet these occasions were rare enough for the situation to adopt a secondary position of worry until I delved into adulthood's more long-term outlook (I'm 27) and it became a harder issue to ignore. It was time for action, though it did take the stray piece of dirt to arrive at it.

Circumcision in 2005 is rather a confused beast. The traditional air afforded it by the Jewish religion, Australian Aborigines, Muslims and certain African societies, jars with a North American-led medical reading built on decidedly shaky foundations. Taking their lead from British practitioners, who declared in the late 19th century that circumcision could act as a cure for paralysis, epilepsy and masturbation, American physicians hailed circumcision as a preventive measure for a raft of concerns. As late as 1932, a distinguished professor in America grabbed public attention by claiming that circumcision prevented cancer of the penis.

American influence during the Second World War meant that thousands of Australian and Kiwi soldiers were circumcised before being deployed in Africa and Asia with a flimsy 'sand in the foreskin' explanation. Soon after American troops arrived in South Korea in 1960, the Koreans adopted infant circumcision.

In 1964, male circumcision in the US reached a staggering peak of 90 per cent, but dissenting voices had grown also. The decades since have seen both an acceptance that there are no discernable medical or behavioural benefits to circumcision, and the growth of protest groups arraigned against the procedure. In recent years, many American states have halted funding for the general circumcision of infants and there has been a string of legal cases brought throughout the country for botched circumcisions going back 50 years.

In the UK, circumcision has always been comparatively discreet. Perhaps the most significant clash of historical practice and modern doubt over its benefit was the reportedly successful stance of Princess Diana against the circumcision of Princes William and Harry in keeping with royal tradition.

However, religious tradition and corrective surgery have kept circumcisions rolling along quietly in the UK, with around 30,000 male circumcisions being performed each year and estimates of up to 20% for the male population as a whole. Early this year, it became clear that I was to be added to their ranks as I met with my local urinary consultant.

Dangers are extremely limited, I was told, the most likely complication being a trapped blood vessel, which is not too serious a matter. "It's very common," he explained, as he pointed out the three-month waiting list. "As a culture, we're hopeless with this. There's no education and a general feeling of embarrassment, so it's young adults like yourself who come through the door, and older." As the possible mishaps that a non-retractable foreskin could incur were again laid bare, I didn't falter in agreeing to surgery and entering pre-op limbo.

The response of my immediate friends to my case's progression was unbridled delight. The suggested slight shortening of length was predictably popular, whilst the consultant's suggestion that I might be awkward of gait for a couple of weeks nearly made my brother crash his car in amusement.

I turned to Google. One female professor concluded light heartedly that circumcision can cause psychological after effects consistent with rape, torture and sexual abuse. On a medical message board, a man complained that the procedure left him with small scars on the penis, whilst another with a similar model to myself (from the description) was advised that circumcision is unnecessary.

At this point, you're probably expecting a period of consultation – a second opinion, further readings and so on. Well, I'm afraid it's straight to the operating table a few months later. I wish I could say that it was innate trust in the medical services, or a successful voyage of self-analysis. In actual fact, I lacked the motivation to question the decision, rather accepting it as a fait accompli and concentrating on freeing up a fortnight for recovery.

I began the fateful day by notifying a girl-friend of six months of the development, seeing as I was about to order a taxi to the hospital. She took it in her stride and agreed to pick me up in my groggy state late in the afternoon.

I was, however, kept in overnight after a slipped stitch had meant another jab, another stitch, and a delay in going home until the morning. The extra injection of anaesthetic directly into the action zone was the only point of genuine pain in the whole procedure. Sent on my way with a bag of painkillers, swabs and a jockstrap, I began three weeks of decreasing discomfort that takes us to the present day.

The results are as I expected. Visually it is a work in progress, but the blemishes appear temporary. As for performance, there has been no great hindrance and the loss of sensation is marginal, feeling more different than worse. Any tinges of regret have yet to arrive, let alone any ruinous psychological damage. It's just one case of course, but for me the trading of dangers both real and imagined for these weeks of mild irritation has been a worthwhile adventure for both myself and my new lean machine.

Life With A Foreskin

I want to share with you my interest in circumcision. It goes back a long way. I was born in the 40's to an upper middle class family and in the normal course of events would expect to have been circumcised at birth as most of my peer group were.

Even before prep school I noticed the difference. At nursery school many of my friends had bare knobs. But I was comforted that my best friend who was born in the same hospital as me was also uncut. Interestingly we discovered that his elder brother was cut so maybe the particular private nursing home in which we were both born was recommending mothers not to follow the then current fashion.

At prep school there was great rivalry between the roundheads and the cavaliers in the dorm – pillow fights etc which the roundheads always won. The roundheads were always better at games and more gregarious than the cavaliers and my dissatisfaction with my foreskin grew as time passed. At prep school my estimate was that 60% were cut. In the village where I lived the local boys were mostly uncut, confirming that circumcision was a social/class matter more than anything else.

I went on to one of the top public schools. Here I felt even more of an odd man out. The proportion of cut boys must have been well over 80%. All the aristocratic boys (and there were lots of them) were cut. The only uncut ones were those on scholarship from less well off homes and those from liberal or very 'alternative' backgrounds. At this stage I started to keep my foreskin pulled back to conform.

During this time I became almost obsessive about who was and who was not cut. I used to try to guess what was the cock-head status of everyone I met. More often than not I was right. When I went to work in the city of London, I found that the incidence was different but in some ways even more interesting. This is because a number of the 'Essex' boys who I would have expected to have been uncut were in fact cut. I still don't understand why. I still play the guessing game but it has become a bit boring because one knows that everyone under 45 is likely to be uncut.

Then my interest turned to girls and their cock preferences and experience. I began to look at a pretty girl, wonder about her pussy, shaved or hairy. (In those days it was less of an issue because most pussies I came across were hairy whereas now most of the young seem to be shaved and it is only the 45 plus who still tend to be hairy.) Being a middle class public school boy, most of my girlfriends were surprised to find that I still had my foreskin. Some actually commented on it. "How interesting, you still have a foreskin" or "how come you did not get circumcised" but most assumed I had been cut (as I kept my skin pulled back) and it was only those who gave me oral or who inspected my cock closely (after I had come and was flaccid) who saw my uncut status. Not one girl said how nice it was to have an uncut cock although some complimented me on my very short foreskin and that maybe it was the best of both worlds – almost bare knob but more skin for a good wank.

My first wife was American and she naturally inspected my cock closely and saw its uncut status. She was fascinated and always wanked me by pulling the skin fully over my knob and then pulling it fully back. My second wife was an English rose who had been brought up to believe that gentlemen were cut. The first thing she did before sex was to run her hand over my shaft to make sure the foreskin was back. During prolonged love making she used to put her hand between her legs and grasp my cock and pull the foreskin hard back. She said she much preferred the feel of a bare knob and the prominent ridge of the bell-end stimulating her vagina. My third wife was another English rose and commented after a lovemaking session some 18 months after we had been married that she was relieved that all the men in her life had been circumcised. We had been married all this time and she had not noticed. The policy of keeping the skin back had worked!

It is a real turn on being wanked by a girl who thinks you are cut. The technique is so different because she concentrates on massaging the shaft. The really experienced seem to concentrate on the middle of the shaft, just where the circumcision scar would have been. I find this so much more of a turn on than the movement of the foreskin backwards and forward over the knob.

I would love to hear other experiences of the differing techniques that women use in wanking men.

On A Knife Edge

Ecstasy Uncle Ed Halliwell responds to a question

[From Time Out, December 2003]

Question:

I have always quite fancied having a circumcised penis. Are there any dangers to having the chop?

Answer:

Of course – there are risks attached to any surgical procedure. Infection and bleeding are possible in the aftermath, and there's always the chance your penis may not heal properly or the surgeon will remove too much or too little skin. Most circumcisions are performed soon after birth (one in six boys worldwide), and the operation is usually recommended to adults (at least on medical grounds) only if there is some problem with the foreskin – tightness, infection, or an inability to retract which interferes with sexual performance or cleanliness.

It sounds like you're interested in circumcision for cosmetic reasons, so you ought to be aware that the aesthetics may fall short of your expectations, that it's likely to be painful (abstinence from all sexual activity is required for up to six weeks), and that it may permanently affect your sensitivity levels during sex. It's worth asking yourself why you're unhappy with what nature gave you, and whether the discomfort of going under the knife is really going to change that (even if the results are good). That said, a circumcised penis is less likely to get infected and may marginally reduce your chances of getting an STD – and the slicing can usually be done under a local anaesthetic.

Ultimately, like all cosmetic surgery, it has to be a personal decision. I wouldn't fancy it myself – but then I'm not queuing up for a nose-job or liposuction either.

A Member's Perspective

I would like to congratulate the Editor on his swift action in changing the Acorn PO Box. I was one of the eight members whose subscription went missing. Apart from the money, I was concerned that sensitive material could fall into outsiders' hands. Here's hoping that Box 11 is more successful. At least my subscription got through this time.

It would be good if more members sent in contributions for the newsletter. Personal experiences and hearsay stories about the penis and circumcision would interest most of us and help fill our publication. More communication is what we need. Somebody, somewhere, would like to read your story and share your thoughts. It may seem ordinary to you, but others could find it fresh and interesting. Some think that it has been told before, and that they are not unique, but you never know, someone could be interested. Give it a try.

I look forward to each edition, reading of others with the same interests as myself, giving me a sense of belonging to a group of like minded men. Until I found Acorn, I felt alone and isolated; now I know that I am not alone. Many others are as interested in circumcision as I am. I cannot get to meetings, but I can read my fellow members' thoughts on the subject. Infant, childhood, pubescent and adult variations are all grist to the mill.

I am 12,000 miles away from most of you, but Acorn keeps me in touch with my fellow members in Britain and other parts of the world. I urge members to put pen to paper or use their word processors and contribute something to our newsletter – hopefully pro, but anti if you must.

Please get writing – let us hear from YOU.

Poor Advice?

The following is taken from the February edition of Gay Times. If the writer is concerned only with appearance, surely he would do better to undergo a full circumcision rather than spend months attempting to achieve a restoration that will not cover the whole glans anyway. This option appears not to have been considered.

Question:

I have a very strange foreskin. When I was younger, I had to have an emergency partial circumcision. I still have some skin left, and have read on the net that there are exercises you can do to restore the full foreskin by stretching it. Is this true?

Answer:

Yes, you can restore some of the original foreskin length by stretching the skin as you describe. Generally this involves a very slow process where the remaining skin is pulled and stretched down over the head of the penis. I'm afraid it's generally a painstaking process, which takes several months to achieve. I doubt though that you'll manage to achieve the full restoration you probably want.

It may be worth seeing a plastic surgeon privately to discuss whether there might be other options available to you, such as a surgical release of any remaining skin to accelerate the process. Good luck!

Acknowledging Your Contributions

In the past, when members have written to me or submitted contributions, I have tended not to acknowledge the letter until I have time to respond fully – leading sometimes to quite long delays. I realise that this is unfair on members who do not know whether their missive has never arrived or whether they are just being ignored!

From the beginning of July, I have adopted a new policy of sending a short acknowledgement of everything I receive. I empty the mailbox once or twice a week so, in the normal course of events, you should hear back from me within two weeks of writing (slightly longer outside the UK). If there is a delay beyond this, do please check with me whether your letter has arrived.

A Proposed Bill To Ban Male Circumcision

[The following article by Sherry B Colb is taken from the Findlaw website.]

A San Diego based group that calls itself a health and human rights organization recently submitted a proposed bill to Congress called the Male Genital Mutilation Bill ('MGM bill'). The bill, if adopted, would ban the practice of circumcising baby boys.

The MGM bill has not yet found a Congressional sponsor and is therefore unlikely to go anywhere in the near future. Nonetheless, it raises important questions about the relationship between the protection of children, gender equality, and religious freedom, questions that have ramifications beyond the proposed bill itself.

Reportedly, at this time, more than half of the baby boys born in the United States undergo circumcision. For most of these infants, a doctor performs the procedure. For a minority, however, circumcision is a religious ceremony. It ordinarily occurs on the eighth day of a Jewish baby's life. For Muslim children, it may occur on the seventh or eighth day of the boy's life, some time in his first five years, or during adolescence.

The ceremony serves, for many Jewish and Muslim families, as both a celebration of their children and an assertion of religious identity.

What Is Male Circumcision?

Circumcision, in males, involves the cutting and removal of the foreskin, a fold of skin that covers the head of the penis. Because the procedure typically occurs during the baby's first month, anaesthesia (other than topical) is generally considered unsafe. This means that a vulnerable newborn infant undergoes the surgical removal of a part of his body that is dense with nervous tissue, without anaesthesia.

Notwithstanding the pain suffered during, and in the immediate aftermath of, the procedure, circumcision does not – when performed correctly – prevent the young boy from growing up to be a sexually functioning and fertile man. (Some argue, though, that sex is more enjoyable for the uncircumcised male.)

Is Male Circumcision Like 'Female Genital Mutilation'?

This apparent lack of permanent harmful consequences significantly distinguishes male circumcision from the practice sometimes called 'female circumcision' but also known as female genital mutilation ('FGM') or female genital cutting. FGM is prohibited by a federal statute passed in 1996.

FGM typically involves the removal of a girl's entire clitoris (an excision that virtually eliminates the possibility of orgasm). In addition, clitoridectomy is often accompanied by the removal of the girl's labia and the sewing together of remaining raw surfaces, leaving only a small opening for the outflow of urine and menstrual blood, a process known as infibulation. Infibulation itself can have life-long deleterious consequences, including urinary distress, pain during intercourse, and dangerous complications during labour and the delivery of children.

Though the federal statute that prohibits female genital mutilation is limited to the protection of female anatomy, the extreme nature of FGM does not have a true analogue in male circumcision. In the light of this reality, it is somewhat misleading for advocates of the MGM bill to claim – as they have – that federal law currently discriminates against boys subjected to genital mutilation by outlawing FGM alone. No modern culture subjects male children to anything so extreme as clitoridectomy and infibulation are for girls.

That said, the practice of male circumcision is not a trivial matter. As described above, highly sensitive and healthy tissue is removed with a knife, generally without anything but a topical anesthetic, and the patient is ordinarily a newborn infant. Though some people suggest that newborn babies do not actually suffer pain, this claim has always been suspect and is now at odds with what is known to the scientific community.

But Is the Pain ‘Unnecessary’?

The suggestion that circumcision causes unnecessary pain is, of course, a controversial one. The reason for the controversy is twofold. First, Muslims and Jews have performed circumcision on their sons for thousands of years as a religiously required practice. It serves as an affirmation, at a very basic level, of their religion and culture. To suggest that such a practice is ‘unnecessary’ is accordingly to ignore this feature of circumcision, the fact that it is experienced by many as an essential and imperative component of their religious and cultural identity.

Second, for a long time, there were medical professionals who believed that routine circumcision of infants could be beneficial to their later health. Circumcision can prevent infections where hygiene is less than adequate. There were also some studies that suggested that women partners of circumcised men are less likely to develop cervical cancer. More recently, some have even claimed that circumcision helps to prevent HIV transmission to the circumcised male. The American Academy of Paediatrics, however, issued a statement in 1999 indicating that the data do not support routine circumcision (a retraction of its 1989 statement suggesting a range of possible benefits).

If the evidence continues to provide little or no medical basis for circumcision, that will leave only the religious and cultural reasons for the continuing choice of parents to circumcise their children.

But those bases are powerful. Many Muslims and Jews continue to circumcise their sons, even when they – the parents – are otherwise unobservant. Circumcision is thus, for Jews and Muslims alike, an important identifying mark.

Others continue to circumcise their children because the practice has been routine in America for some time. Studies suggest, as well, that there may be a cosmetic preference for the look of the circumcised penis. But over time, the number of those who continue to circumcise their sons without a religious justification is likely to dwindle, a development that may lead to more support for the outright banning of the practice.

When May the Law Intervene in Religious Practice?

When it comes to matters of religion, legislators are, for good reason, hesitant to ban a practice that represents a religious mandate. The U.S. Constitution itself, however, as construed by the Supreme Court in Employment Division v. Smith, does not actually require the accommodation of religious conduct, provided that any prohibition applied to that conduct is part of a neutral, generally applicable law. In the absence of evident discriminatory intent, a prohibition against the cutting of male children's genitals would therefore satisfy the demands of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

Moreover, even when the Court had interpreted the Free Exercise Clause more broadly, as a requirement that religious practice be affirmatively accommodated, that accommodation did not extend to practices that subjected minor children to health risks on account of their parents' religious observance. In Prince v. Massachusetts, for example, the Court held that a mother could be prosecuted under child labour laws for having her children distribute literature for the Jehovah's Witnesses in the streets, notwithstanding her religious motivation for her actions.

Should the Law Intervene?

If circumcision turns out to be what medical professionals are saying that it is – anaesthetised amputation from a newborn child of living, healthy tissue flush with nerve endings, for no medically beneficial result – then it might seem quite proper to prevent parents from subjecting their infants to this cruelty.

Yet there is a worry, and it is significant. The worry is that perhaps, out of the many painful things that people do to their children, the law could be singling this one out for prohibition at least in part because the practitioners are religiously motivated, and the religions in question are minority religions in the United States.

There is a troubling precedent for this sort of targeting. In Nazi Germany, for example, the law prohibited Kosher slaughter of animals. Though the treatment of so-called food animals and their slaughter – Kosher or otherwise – is indeed extremely cruel, the law in Nazi Germany did not address itself to the whole category of cruelty to the sentient warm-blooded animals who are routinely and unnecessarily killed for food. Rather, it singled out the Jews' religious practice, and it did so out of anti-semitism rather than any true humane concerns for animals.

We do not live in Nazi Germany, of course, and the proposed law against circumcision does not nominally single out Jewish or Muslim practice. Yet the worry about discrimination has two separate components, one of which applies even to ostensibly neutral laws. The first component is that the law might deliberately aim at harming a minority group. That is what the Nazis were doing in prohibiting Kosher slaughter. The second is about the willingness to pass legislation that may impose serious costs when a majority will not have to worry about bearing those costs.

The second concern animates the idea that one way to ensure that the majority does not pass excessively burdensome legislation (in which the costs outweigh the benefits) is to require that the burdens of the law fall equally upon everyone. The equality principle, in other words, protects everyone from overreaching by ensuring that the majority truly experiences the negative consequences of its decisions and will therefore – on its own – seek to weigh costs and benefits in an honest fashion.

Because a prohibition against circumcision would not burden every group equally, there is a substantial risk that any cost/benefit analysis performed would largely ignore the true costs to Jews and Muslims, while perhaps exaggerating the benefits of the legislation.

The Best Solution: Wait

Does this mean that religiously motivated practices should be immune from legal intervention, no matter how harmful and abusive? Of course not. The ban on female genital mutilation, in fact, is a good example of appropriate legislation banning a practice embraced by a minority in this country for a combination of religious and cultural reasons. The costs to girls and women who have suffered the procedure are just too great to permit it to continue.

But male circumcision is different. Though professionals have (with some hedging and ambivalence) decided to oppose the practice, it does not pose the obvious risks and harms of FGM. Until we can say with certainty that circumcision is truly harmful to children in a lasting way, we should probably leave it alone.

In the meantime, the groups with the most to lose by a ban on the practice – Muslims and Jews – can absorb the medical evidence and have a chance to respond on their own. If the evidence of harm mounts, it is likely that religious groups will eventually find a way to modify their practices accordingly.

Film Review

[The following is an extract from a review of the film Meet the Fockers in The Observer on 30 January 2005.]

The Fockers are secular Jews, their faith being entirely invested in old-style liberal politics and in total sexual freedom. Their principal concession to Judaism is circumcision, which extends to keeping Greg's severed prepuce among a collection of childhood memorabilia; inevitably this morsel of shrivelled skin accidentally ends up in a simmering fondue pan during a lunch party.

Editorial

Late holidays by both the production editor and myself have caused this issue to be delayed. Apologies. But I am still planning that you will receive issue 6 before the end of this year.

My editor's column this time returns again to the subject of circumcision and its potential to reduce susceptibility to HIV infection. I hope that you will not feel that I am becoming obsessed with this topic. Had the recently published research been available two issues ago, I would have incorporated it into my article then. But the new information seems sufficiently important to risk boring you again.

This research certainly hit the media headlines and reports were carried in major press outlets worldwide, including The Guardian and the New Scientist in this country. Media attention to circumcision usually tends to concentrate on individual cases, whether this be boys or men with problem foreskins who require surgery or stories of restoration by men who have been psychologically damaged by infant circumcision. Such stories are interesting and informative. But it is good from time to time for the debate to be taken up a level to discuss the subject of circumcision in somewhat wider terms.

Male circumcision reduces HIV risk by 60%, says study

Circumcision rarely rates as a major news item. Any report is usually a minor event – perhaps one or two hundred words to fill a page – a Nigerian prosecuted for performing illegal circumcisions in Ireland, a New York rabbi accused of spreading herpes.

But the title of this article is taken from the headline to a substantial news item on page 11 of the 25th October edition of The Guardian. The same story appeared in the New Scientist and was replicated worldwide – news media in USA, Australia, Africa, the Far East all featured an account.

The origin of the story was a paper published in the Public Library of Science – Medicine Journal and it concerned the possible protective effect of male circumcision against HIV infection. But why the sudden interest – surely this is old news? It is almost twenty years since the first paper was published suggesting the link and there have since been many observational studies which have noted, for instance, that most men living in east and southern Africa, the regions with the highest prevalence of HIV, are not circumcised.

The reason for the excitement this time round is that this is the first randomised controlled trial on the subject. The problem with observational studies is that an observed association does not necessarily indicate causation. There can be a third factor which is having a confounding effect. Thus for instance, circumcised men may be Moslems and Moslems may take a moral stance against casual sex. Thus the lower incidence of HIV infection in some African regions where the men are circumcised may be caused not by their circumcision per se but by their religious or tribal attitudes towards sexual contact. It is therefore the religious beliefs which might be key, with the circumcised status being purely incidental.

A properly controlled randomised trial gets over this problem. In a drug trial, for instance, two groups of patients matched in respect of factors such as age, gender, ethnicity, symptoms etc are chosen. One group receives the new drug; the other group a placebo. In the best trials, neither the patients nor the doctors administering the medication know whether it is the drug or the placebo which is being administered to a particular patient. Thus by comparing the two groups, any extraneous influences can be eliminated and the true effect of the drug can be measured.

In the circumcision trial, some of these features could not be replicated – it's fairly obvious to the guy concerned whether he has undergone circumcision or not! But apart from that, every effort was made to establish a properly controlled trial. The experiment was carried out in a semi-urban region close to the city of Johannesburg in South Africa. Information about the trial was disseminated in the community through meetings during the recruitment period and uncircumcised men interested in undergoing circumcision were recruited. The participants were divided randomly into two groups. Participants in the 'intervention' group were offered circumcision within a week. Participants in the control group were asked to wait until the end of the trial before being offered circumcision. The circumcisions were performed by three local general practitioners in their surgical offices. The general practitioners were experienced circumcisers. The procedure was standardised and used the forceps-guided method, as is widely practised in South Africa.

Both groups were followed up with three-monthly visits over the next year. At each of the four visits, each participant was invited to answer a face-to-face questionnaire, to provide a blood sample, and to have a genital examination and an individual counselling session. The questionnaire allowed for collection of data on background characteristics and reported sexual behaviour. The last section of the questionnaire allowed for the description of all sexual partnerships over the previous period with the number of sexual contacts, the date of first and last sexual contact, the frequency of condom use (never, sometimes, always), and the type of partnership (spousal or non-spousal), a spousal partner being defined as a sexual partner with whom the respondent is married or living as married. The counselling session (15-20 minutes) was delivered by a certified counsellor and focused on information about STIs in general and HIV in particular and on how to prevent the risk of infection.

There were 3,035 participants. During the study, 20 participants in the circumcised group acquired HIV infection and 49 in the uncircumcised control group, corresponding to incidence rates of 0.85 per 100 person years amongst the circumcised and 2.1 per 100 person years in the control group. The difference was so significant that the trial was stopped at the interim stage and all participants in the control group were offered immediate circumcision.

The study provides the first experimental evidence of the efficacy of male circumcision in protecting men against HIV infection but the findings are consistent with protection suggested by the observational studies. Male circumcision appears to provide a degree of protection against acquiring HIV infection equivalent to what a vaccine of high efficacy would have achieved. Consequently, the authors think that male circumcision should be regarded as an important public health intervention for preventing the spread of HIV. They believe that male circumcision could be incorporated rapidly into the national plans of countries where most males are not circumcised and where the spread of HIV is mainly heterosexual. This is even more important at a time when no vaccine or microbicides are currently available and when delivering antiretroviral treatments under WHO guidelines will have only a small impact on the spread of HIV. In addition, male circumcision is an inexpensive means of prevention, performed only once, and men can be circumcised over a wide age range, from childhood to adulthood.

The first and obvious consequence of this study is that male circumcision should be recognised as an important means to reduce the risk of males becoming infected by HIV. Acceptability studies of the use of male circumcision as a prevention measure against the spread of HIV have been conducted in South Africa, Kenya, Zimbabwe, and Botswana. These studies, in which most of the uncircumcised African men expressed interest in becoming circumcised if performed safely and affordably, highlighted the potential of male circumcision as a population-level intervention to reduce HIV spread. Male circumcision is not a universal cultural practice, and cultural practices can be barriers in policy considerations. However, there are examples showing that the prevalence of male circumcision can be changed. For example, in South Korea 50 years ago, almost no men were circumcised; today some 85% of Korean men 16-29 years old are circumcised. The role that women can play in promoting male circumcision is potentially important. If women are aware of the protective effect of male circumcision, this awareness could, in turn, have an impact on the prevalence of male circumcision by encouraging males to become circumcised.

The authors point out that there are potential risks in promoting male circumcision as a way of reducing the risk of HIV infection. Male circumcision can be performed under poor hygienic conditions, leading not only to infection, bleeding, and permanent injury, but also to HIV infection from non-sterilised instruments. In the healing period, sexually active men are likely to be at a higher risk of HIV infection, and this risk should not be underestimated. Male circumcision does not provide full protection and, if perceived as full protection, could lead to reduction of protection of men who, for example, decrease their condom use or otherwise engage in riskier behaviour. It was found that the intervention group had significantly more sexual contacts. While the protective effect of circumcision remained despite this increased risk, this should be a concern when considering implementation of circumcision as a means of preventing HIV infection.

This is of necessity a short summary of a long research paper which goes into some detail about the analyses carried out and the statistical safeguards employed. If any member would like a copy of the full paper, please let me know.

Boys And The Hood

Those with the good fortune to be genitally complete are generally nonchalant of their status; it is those who have been deprived of their foreskin that can be ashamed of the shorn status and passionate about its restoration. 'Cavalier' is complimentary whereas 'Roundhead' is mouthed with sneering contempt. It is no wonder that the genitally scarred can become 'circumsensitive'. They feel cheated, incomplete, even mutilated. There is no escape from that immediately recognisable physical appearance, the stumpy, permanently exposed glans with an exaggerated coronal flare, let alone an ugly scar circling the shaft. (Remember!)

Yet most circumcisees are happily circumcised and do not suffer such angst. Many women and some perhaps misguided men state that circumcision makes the penis cleaner, neater, tidier, even more attractive, ignoring the fact that half of the erogenous tissue is amputated to permanently expose the glans. But far from being an 'advantage' as I was told, it is unnatural, a denial of normality, a reduction in sensation, and an inflicted ugly appearance, hated by many.

"It's only a little thing," does not disguise the fact that circumcision can cause psychological damage – self consciousness, chronic resentment, feeling of inadequacy, the shame at being disfigured, the fear of 'being found out', the derision of others (Dante-esque, but possible in a minority!)

"No-one need see it" were my mother's words of consolation. I didn't reply, but my words were there... "I do, several times a day, whenever I dress, change, urinate, shower or bathe." To me, it was ugly. How I envied those lucky enough to have had their foreskins survive infancy and early childhood when the risk of circumcision is greatest. Full genital integrity is a birthright I had been cruelly denied, but what could I possibly do about it? I loathed my circumcised status for decades.

It took over half a century before I discovered that non-surgical foreskin restoration was possible through stages of skin expansion. Given sufficient time and dedication the permanently exposed glans can be successfully rehooded. Natural maleness, full genital integrity, requires a functioning foreskin, that much maligned fleshy birthright of boys and the hood. In being restored by skin expansion, the flaccid penis has an uncircumcised appearance and all the advantages of a natural foreskin short of the lost nerve endings removed during circumcision. Boys rehooded? Yes, suffering the anguish of an inflicted circumcision without consent need no longer be for life!

Teachers Who Take Time Off To Get 'Cut'

[From a story by Njoroge Mwaura and Petikas Lelendu in the Daily Nation, Kenya, 28th October 2005]

Schools reopened on September 5th, but learning in Samburu District was interrupted as some male teachers were still at home nursing circumcision wounds. According to the local deputy district education officer Mr Samuel Kiura, 15 teachers from 10 secondary schools underwent the rite. Mr Kiura did not have the figures of primary school teachers who had been circumcised, but it definitely is higher than in secondary schools. The affected teachers are about 25 years of age. Though the teachers had been circumcised during the August school holiday, they were still nursing their wounds by the first week of September.

The teachers were not heeding a call by scientists that males be 'cut' to minimise the spread of HIV/Aids, rather, they were observing a centuries-old Samburu custom that despises uncircumcised men and women. Out of the six divisions that make up Samburu District, Baragoi, Lorroki and Kirisia were in the race for the rite with Waso, Nyiro and Wamba slotted for January next year. Fortunately, there is a strong campaign going on against the use of one knife on many 'boys'. A knife for every boy is being encouraged, and so too, is the use of qualified surgeons, something that was previously unthinkable.

The 'cut' for men is determined by an age set. The teachers who were circumcised in August will belong to the Lkichemi age set. Their fathers belong to the Lkishili age group. Should one be left out of this circumcision season, it might take another 20 years or so before another season is launched.

Technique – Before And After

I am a 43-year old who was just circumcised two months ago. Probably like most un-circumcised men and boys, I masturbated with the foreskin pulled forward, so that the friction was between the glans and foreskin. As this area was always moist, masturbation was easy and comfortable. Intercourse on the other hand, I would always retract the foreskin and perform with my glans exposed, which I found far more enjoyable. However, speaking for myself, the pressure I placed on the foreskin with my fingers as I was moving it back and forth was considerable. While I never really thought about it, looking back on it now, pretty much all the stimulation came from around the rim of the cockhead.

Now that I'm cut, all it takes to bring me to orgasm through masturbation is making a circle with my thumb and forefinger, and running it very lightly back and forth over the rim of my cock head. However, the area where the frenulum used to be is very sensitive and erotic as well – something that that area never was when the frenulum was there. For me, losing the frenulum was a great move. At the end of the day, it all comes down to friction of skin against skin, whether it's hands, mouths, pussies or asses that you happen to be in to.

Another masturbation technique I used to use when I was uncut was to pull the foreskin as far as I could, back down over the shaft, and then keep pulling it back down the shaft even further, really hard, on a repeated basis. I got a really fast, intense orgasm that way. I can't and don't masturbate that way anymore, but I don't miss it. In all respects, I like being circumcised a lot better. The new sensations and techniques for sex and masturbation that are experienced and learned are a big part of the fun.

From the internet

A Masturbation Problem

Let me begin with just a little bit of background. I'm a retired doctor, seventy two years of age. Though I'm happily married with two adult children and four grandchildren, I've been actively homosexual since my first sexual experience at the age of nine, and have no regrets about it. I still masturbate almost daily though, at my age, it is not too surprising that partnered sex is a relatively infrequent occurrence. Recently my health has caused me several problems. Arthritis has caused me to have a replacement hip and during pre-operative checks I was found to have a dangerously enlarged heart. I have also been diagnosed with cancer of the prostate and have a long-standing shoulder injury, which is probably the most painful thing I have ever had to tolerate day and night. What with heart tablets, prostate tablets, painkillers for my hip and shoulder and injections for the latter, it is perhaps understandable that I am also receiving medication for depression. This cocktail of therapy had had side effects which, alas, have caused me one over-riding problem that pales everything else into insignificance. I have become impotent. Without the assistance of expensive Viagra

I can't get an erection for love or money, though fortunately 'Big V', when I can afford it, works wonders. It's my saviour when I visit our local sauna.

So here's my problem. How do I masturbate with a soft penis? It's a real difficulty because it isn't as if I'm well endowed in that part of my anatomy anyway and getting a good grip on things has its snags at the best of times. Fortunately the Internet provides many sites to promote pictorial stimulation and, being retired, I have no time constraints when I settle down, trousers around my ankles, in front of the computer screen. Yes, it sometimes takes a long time and, because I'm well and truly circumcised, my glans is often quite friction-rubbed and sore after a session. I have to concentrate hard and avoid allowing my attention to wander regardless of minimal sensation in the early stages but eventually, with my penis still flaccid in my fist, the feeling begins to mount and at last I achieve orgasm. There's rarely much in the way of a prolonged 'plateau of excitement' when I can 'edge' just short of ejaculating. The final climax happens very suddenly and, I must admit, it isn't always as strong as it was in the good old days (though fortunately there are often magnificent exceptions to this!)

Afterwards the feeling of exhaustion is overwhelming and I often have to lie down for an hour to sleep it off! But at least I can still cum with a soft dick and there's life in the old dog yet!

May I ask whether other older members still achieve worthwhile gratification by masturbating a soft penis?

Ray Hamble

Heads In The Sand

So, the editor is berated for daring to publish research which suggests that Circumcision may protect against HIV infection. I am not one of those who categorises foreskins as smelly and distasteful. As a UK gay, I would be depriving myself of many potential partners if I only went for cut men, and as far as I am concerned, most foreskins I have come across have been exemplary in the hygiene department.

This doesn't mean I can't recognise a fact when I see one, and those who deny that even the cleanest foreskin is a potential cause of disease is, quite frankly, sticking his head in the sand. It's been known for a long time that circumcised babies are less prone to urinary infections, which can lead to kidney damage. Evidence of the link between the foreskin and HIV infection is gradually coming to light. The latest evidence of the unhealthy foreskin comes from research on chlamydia. This disease is one of the most common bacterial causes of sexually transmitted infections and its effects, particularly for women, can be severe. Not only can it cause severe reproductive complications, it is also associated with increased risk of cervical cancer. The health minister has just announced that one in ten young women in the UK is infected. We are talking about a lot of problems and future heartache.

At the same time, it has been found that females with circumcised partners are at far less risk of infection than those whose partners are uncircumcised. These findings were published in the American Journal of Epidemiology for 1st November 2005. The research was led by Dr. Xavier Castellsague, at Institut Catala d'Oncologia in Barcelona. 300 female subjects and their male partners were enrolled in studies in Colombia, Spain, Brazil, Thailand and the Philippines. Blood samples from the women were tested for chlamydia. The rate of circumcision in the male partners varied from country to country, ranging from 1.8 per cent in Spain to 92 per cent in the Philippines with an average of 37 per cent. Nevertheless, in all five countries, women with circumcised partners were significantly less likely to be infected with chlamydia. Only among younger women and women with a history of consistent condom use was there no association between circumcision and chlamydia detection.

The researchers speculated that the foreskin perhaps retained infection 'subsequently increasing the likelihood of infection to the penile urethra and transmission to the vagina during intercourse.'

Genital integrity is a fine watchword but are we doing any favours to the guys (and the partners of guys) left uncircumcised? At least let's discuss the subject in a sensible manner rather than pretending that the foreskin has no case to answer.

Close Encounters

I am an intact hetero of mature years and became an Acorn subscriber last year having been reminded of the practice of circumcision on several occasions over many years. I have thought about the procedure for myself a number of times including at one point seeking information from my GP. Having access to Acorn would, I thought, give me a greater insight into the advantages and disadvantages of the op.

I first became aware of 'the difference' at junior school when the annual medical check took place. I remember that there was some concern at 'the rate descent' in my case but no positive action was taken and a year later all was well. (I cannot recall anyone being sent for circumcision at these inspections although this might well have occurred.) Shortly afterwards, however, my parents noticed that my retraction was only partial and as one of my friends had recently undergone the procedure, some discussion within the family took place as to whether circumcision might be desirable for me. Again, the elapse of time cured the problem. At my single sex senior school, swimming activity was undertaken totally naked and the master responsible for physical activity was always concerned to ensure that the circumcised boys were not bullied by the majority who were not.

A spell of a couple of years in the Forces added little to my knowledge of the subject although affording plenty of opportunity to see the results of the surgeons' handiwork. Then came marriage and a son who at junior school age needed the procedure. A few years later I had a sebaceous cyst removed from the scrotum under general anaesthetic and I suppose this would have been an ideal opportunity to have had the cut but it was not until after that time that I came to know a medic who was involved in this type of surgery and from whom I learned more about the subject. Incidentally a friend in North America told me that on giving birth to a boy very recently, the second question she was asked was: "Would you like him circumcised?"

My second wife has a strong preference for circumcision but was not keen to pressure me into surgery just because of this. In recent years, however, we have holidayed in foreign resorts where nudity is common and we both feel that the circumcised penis looks superior. We sometimes go nude ourselves in these circumstances and so the subject has surfaced again.

In reading various contributions to the magazine, the comments of those who have opted for circumcision in adult life have been informative although not perhaps totally conclusive as to the balance of advantages and disadvantages. Apart from hygiene issues and the apparently marginal medical case for those with satisfactory equipment, my principal considerations would be the preferences of my wife and aesthetic appearance. On the other side of the coin, the reputed (in several cases) loss of sensation and the (admittedly fairly minimal) risks of the procedure itself suggest due consideration before any irreversible action is taken.

Whilst I get the distinct feel that Acorn sentiment is generally pro-C, I suspect that I shall not feel sufficiently strongly to take this step although I perhaps may have been happier had the decision been taken for me years ago. Nevertheless I shall continue my interest in contributions to the magazine and who knows...

Celebrity Cuts

First Minister of Scotland

A recent biography of Jack McConnell MSP, First Minister of Scotland and Member of the Scottish Parliament for Motherwell and Wishaw, reveals that he is circumcised.

Colin Farrell

The following appeared in an internet discussion on the status of actors:

Check out the director's cut video of Alexander which clears up Colin Farrell's status. There's this brief scene as he's climbing into bed that offers a fairly decent shot of his equipment. From what I can make out (after several reversals, pauses, & plays) there's definitely foreskin covering Colin's dick.

Another contributor reported what Farrell is supposed to have said in an interview:

They are kind of fucking fascinated with a foreskin, aren't they? In Ireland, at birth we don't get the tip of our fucking knobs chopped off. I fucking completely disagree with that. People say, "It's much cleaner to have no foreskin." What, have you never heard of a fucking shower? Of Q-Tips? Whatever you want to do it, just clean the fucking thing. I was at the party with 20 people, one of them an agent from CAA, when somehow the subject of foreskins came up. She said, "I just don't understand a foreskin. I've never seen one." So I whipped out my dick and said, "Here, that's all it is. A bit of skin." I did a little Puppetry of the Penis thing and showed her what it was about. You would have thought she was at a circus.

Presley Broke Hearts In The Bedroom

Elvis Presley often left his one-night stands in tears, because he refused to take their virginity after they had pleased him orally. Members of the King's entourage would persuade girls picked from the crowd at shows to perform acts of fellatio on them before delivering them to Presley's bedroom, but despite the nights of passion, the willing teens would always go home with their virginity intact.

Byron 'The Siren' Raphael, who Presley allegedly hired to wrangle girls for him to 'play around with', admits the nights would often end in heartbreak because Elvis would refuse to go 'all the way' with his one night stands and fall asleep soon after he had ejaculated. In a new Playboy interview, Raphael recalls, "He really wasn't all that keen on doing the wild thing. He was far more interested in heavy petting and panting and groaning... Elvis was particularly fond of blow-jobs and had no guilt about them. Girls would come out of his bedroom in tears, crying, "Elvis wouldn't take my virginity. He said to wait until my wedding night"."

Elvis told his entourage that he declined offers of full-on sex because he hadn't been circumcised and feared his foreskin would tear during the act. He also promised his mother he'd wait until he was married before having sex.

Association Between The Intact Foreskin And Inferior Standards Of Male Genital Hygiene Behaviour: A Cross-sectional Study

[The following is an abstract of an article by O'Farrell, Quigley and Fox published in the International Journal of STD & AIDS. August 2005]

This study was undertaken to determine whether non-circumcised men have inferior standards of genital hygiene behaviour, as measured by reported washing of the whole penis, compared with circumcised men. Male attenders at a sexually transmitted infections (STI) clinic at Ealing Hospital, London had routine STI tests and examinations performed and were asked about the frequency and thoroughness of genital washing. One hundred and fifty non-circumcised and 75 circumcised men were enrolled. Not always washing the whole penis, including retracting the foreskin in non-circumcised men every time they washed (defined as inferior genital hygiene behaviour) was more common in non-circumcised (26%) than circumcised men (4%) and those with balanitis (42% and 5%). Circumcised men were more likely than non-circumcised men to wash the genital area more than once a day (37% and 19%).

Studies investigating the relationship between male circumcision status and other outcomes, for example HIV infection, should include assessment of genital hygiene.

Politically Correct

There is always much comment on the subject of circumcision – some people for, some against. Debate rages about why it is done – to prevent masturbation, or for reasons of masculine hygiene. But I have never seen any comment about it as a protection from women. Yet many years ago, a Jewish gentleman told me that this was one of the best reasons for circumcision. Apparently there are more bacteria around a woman's genitals (the area between the vaginal opening and her anus) than anywhere else on the human body. This was verified by two female bacteriologists in a TV programme in the nineteen seventies. At least, if a man is circumcised, it prevents harmful bacteria from getting under his foreskin and causing infection.

I suppose it would be inappropriate to print this information in these 'politically correct' days. Nevertheless I believe that it is a point worth considering. My own experiences of some women I have known would endorse these comments. Perhaps greater emphasis should be placed on men protecting themselves from the lack of feminine hygiene. As a naturist, I have known women to comment on how much easier it is for a man to keep his genitals clean than it is for a woman. All too often, men are the butt of adverse comments on personal hygiene – perhaps this information will help redress the balance.

It's The People They're Attached To That Really Matters

From an article by Shonagh Rae in You, 28th August 2005

In one of life's more unexpected developments, I recently found myself in Brian Sewell's home discussing circumcision. The art critic was not only illuminating on the aesthetics of the foreskin but on the arguments surrounding its removal or retention. Our conversation took place under the kind auspices of BBC3 – who else would sanction a documentary on such a subject? I must confess that until then I hadn't given circumcision much thought. I knew that it was mostly associated with religious custom, but I hadn't questioned the need for it in secular societies. In the United States, for example, around 90 per cent of adult males are circumcised – although this should decline, as only 60 per cent of newborns are now subjected to the process.

The argument has always been that circumcision is advisable for health and hygiene reasons, and that an uncircumcised penis is more vulnerable to HIV, STDs, cancer and general inflammation. But opponents – and they are legion – argue that there is no proof of this and that research is flawed. They say that in an age of improved sanitation and condoms there is less risk to a male to leave him uncircumcised than to subject him to an invasive, painful (unless carried out under anaesthetic, which has its risks) procedure with potential side effects. And they point out that in babies the foreskin and glans are joined, so circumcision involves forcible separation of these tender parts before an equally yelp-inducing snip.

The clinching argument against it, to my mind, is the fact that the Victorians started a programme of infant circumcision because they believed it would deter self-stimulation. Brian Sewell remembered how his circumcised classmates at school found it far more arduous. Which makes sense: the foreskin, you see, is one of God's design greats: engineered to promote stimulating friction and thus arousal, and comes with its own lubrication, ring of muscle and sensory nerve endings. And its sliding motion is designed to ease penetration – therefore lack of it can, say some women, make sex uncomfortable because increased force is needed. According to the experts I spoke to while researching the subject, it's a fact that circumcision will to some degree desensitise the penis. Perhaps this is why the slang term for the circumcised is 'roundheads', with its puritanical connotations, whilst the intact go by the more hedonistic-sounding 'cavaliers'. When you take all this into account, I cannot imagine why anyone would circumcise a child unless their religion dictated it. That said, I don't know any circumcised men who feel hard done by – it seems you don't miss what you've never had. And the few female friends of mine who expressed a strong preference have all said they think a circumcised penis looks 'tidier'. Well, in my opinion, it's who it's attached to that really matters. Mind you, I've noticed that the few men I've ever known who've expressed a lack of interest in oral sex were all circumcised. I can see that if you've been snipped as an infant it might leave you averse to placing your member in close proximity to sharp objects – such as teeth.

Were You At Leicester?

May I remind those members of Acorn that stayed at the hotel in Leicester that the contracted room rate was £48.50 including dinner bed and breakfast for those in shared rooms and £52.50 for those using a single room. Additions would be only for goods/services you used and charged to your room. If you were charged more than indicated above please contact Douglas on 07788 126706 (evenings and weekend the best time).

Picture Gallery

Three of this issue's models have their glans exposed, but how many are circumcised?

French Art

Every reasonably sized collection of medieval and renaissance art will almost certainly contain a depiction of the Circumcision of Christ and this is true of Le Musée des Beaux Arts in Lyon. But the picture itself, painted by le Guerchin in 1646, is exceptional. First, it is enormous – 4.15m by 2.65m – and it dominates the far wall of its gallery, catching the sightline the moment you enter. Second, unusually, the characters show emotion. In most paintings on this subject, the Christ Child is shown lying peacefully, bearing His fate with equanimity. Not here – the Child's face shows real distress and he is twisting his body away from the mohel and looking pleadingly towards his parents. They in turn are showing the concern and discomfort which all Jewish parents must feel as they watch their baby son being circumcised.

Another unusual painting in the museum is a Pieta. This shows the dead Christ lying prone, presumably prior to burial. His naked genitals are portrayed – the first time that I have seen a depiction of a naked adult Christ. And, inauthentically, He is uncircumcised.

Outside, in Place des Terreaux, on a hot sunny afternoon, there is a congregation of young people, a few of the more intrepid of whom have climbed the fountain and are kicking water over their more timid friends below. One young man lowers his shorts and, this being France, he is of course uncircumcised. The Pieta may be inauthentic in terms of the Man portrayed but it is no doubt a true depiction of the model which the artist employed.

Rabbi To Stop Circumcisions

[From a story by Steve Lieberman, the Journal News, 17th September 2005]

A Monsey rabbi linked to three infants who contracted herpes has agreed to stop performing oral suction circumcisions in New York City until a religious panel investigates the method. Yitzchok Fischer has been under a temporary restraining order issued by a New York City court not to perform oral-suction circumcisions. Fischer uses his mouth to suction blood from the wound after he removes the foreskin.

The centuries-old ritual, called metzizah bi peh, is used by Hasidic and ultra-Orthodox Jews. Fischer and the circumcision method came under scrutiny when a Manhattan newborn died of herpes in November, and his twin was diagnosed with the virus. A Staten Island newborn circumcised by Fischer was diagnosed with herpes in November. The strain of herpes found in the infants is transmitted orally.

The New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene had been trying for months in court to stop Fischer from using oral-suction circumcision. Agreement has been reached and an agency spokeswoman said: "Rabbi Fischer has agreed to stop performing metzizah bi peh in NYC pending an investigation being conducted by the Rabbinical Court of the Central Rabbinical Congress."

Fischer's lawyers, Mark J. Kurzmann and his son Hillel M. Kurzmann said no conclusive medical evidence has been shown that the infants contracted the virus from the rabbi. The rabbi took a herpes test, but the results have not been released by the state or city. "I remain as convinced as ever that a thorough investigation will confirm that my client was not the source of any of the three unfortunate infections", he said.

Circumcision Deaths Spark Hunt

[From TNT magazine, December 2003]

Cape Town: Two more circumcision deaths were reported in the Eastern Cape last Thursday as provincial health authorities continued their battle against illegal initiation schools. The new deaths – one at Barkly East, the other at Maclear – brought total circumcision-related fatalities to seven in the last three weeks, Eastern Cape health department spokesman Sizwe Kupelo said.

He said police were hunting for the iincibi, or traditional surgeons, responsible for the circumcision schools that the youths had attended. He also said police arrested an unregistered iincibi on Thursday after closing down two illegal circumcision schools in the Port St John's area of Transkei. Kupelo said the man was the sole surgeon operating in the entire Port St John area: "We believe that by arresting him we'll stop that in the area." The arrest brought the number of iincibi and traditional nurses taken into custody this year to 30.

The Application of Health Standards in Traditional Circumcision Act was passed in 2001 to help stem the tide of casualties of young men who died or were maimed after botched circumcisions. The law says only recognised traditional practitioners may perform the operation, and they must have the permission of a medical officer. At the time, it was bitterly opposed by traditional leaders, who saw it as interference with custom.

Smith & Nephew Scraps Skin Graft Treatment

[From a story by Stephen Foley in the Independent
28th October 2005]

Smith & Nephew is to axe its much-hyped skin graft product, after more than a decade of work and about £100m of investment. The medical products company said that Dermagraft, which uses lab-grown skin cells to repair chronic ulcers, had been refused approval for extended use in the US.

Dermagraft was once seen as S&N's most exciting new product, harnessing biotechnology for the first time and representing a break from the company's past as a supplier of bandages and plasters. An S&N laboratory in San Diego uses tissue from circumcised babies' foreskins to grow human skin cells which are then placed over an ulcer on a dissolvable mesh. A decade ago, analysts forecast annual sales of more than £300m, but S&N was expecting only £14m in 2006.

The company has proved that Dermagraft works on foot ulcers associated with diabetes, for which it has been on sale since 2001, but the US regulator decided much bigger trials would be required to convince it that the product could be of use in more common leg ulcers. Sir Christopher O'Donnell, the chief executive, said it was not worth making the investment associated with larger trials.

Extract From: *Pediatric Genitourinary Examination: A Clinician's Reference

Phimosis

In uncircumcised infants the foreskin adheres to and completely covers the glans penis. Retraction of a full foreskin will occur over time without intervention. Usually, nocturnal erections cause the gradual release of the glans adhesions, and therefore no intervention is required. A full prepuce that is not retractable during childhood is of no significance in the absence of symptoms. A child who is uncircumcised should be taught at potty training how to gradually and gently retract the prepuce for voiding and hygiene.

Phimosis can become problematic if ballooning of the prepuce occurs with voiding. This can result in local irritation, urinary tract infections, or balanitis. In the uncircumcised boy, or in children with repeated infections, phimosis can result in a cicatrix, or trapping of the glans penis behind scar tissue. This often requires surgical correction.

If an uncircumcised child has symptomatic phimosis, 0.05% betamethasone cream can be applied to the phimotic ring twice daily for up to 1 month to facilitate resolution. Additionally, gentle stretching of the prepuce by placing a thumb and a forefinger on the lateral aspects of the base of the penis and applying pressure posteriorly can augment the natural process in symptomatic boys.

Penile Adhesions

Penile adhesions are usually noticed by the primary medical provider or the caregiver and are usually asymptomatic. Circumcised boys who have a significant peri-penile fat distribution are more likely to have telescoping of the penile shaft skin towards the glans of the penis. This can result in filmy glanular adhesions or a true skin bridge. Evaluate for glanular adhesions by reducing the fat pad at the base of the penis and observing the coronal margin. Typically, the coronal margin is visible around the entire circumference of the glans. If adhesions are present, the prepuce will be covering the coronal margin in part or in full.

Filmy adhesions can be differentiated from a true skin bridge by observing which portion of the prepuce is adhered to the glans. If it is the inner prepuce that is attached at the glans, then the adhesion is most likely 'filmy' and will break down with time, without intervention. Although debatable, it is not recommended to forcefully break down filmy adhesions, especially while the child has significant telescoping of the shaft skin since the adhesions will most likely recur. On the other hand, if the adhesion is attached at the circumcision incision line, then the adhesion is most likely a skin bridge that will need to be surgically released under local anaesthesia.

Editorial

Happy New Year! Despite these greetings, Acorn is still in 2005 and this is the last issue of that year. My apologies for the lateness. My New Year's resolution is to catch up with myself in 2006.

Your resolution, I hope, is to renew your subscription. It's that time of year again and with this edition is enclosed a personalised renewal notice. (E-mail subscribers will receive theirs shortly.) I hope that you have found the newsletter sufficiently interesting and stimulating over the past year to have no difficulty in continuing as a member. If so, please, for my sake and that of the Treasurer, renew without waiting for a reminder. Remember, every minute spent chasing late payers is one minute less spent on the much more interesting task of putting together the next edition of the newsletter.

There are two unusual items in this edition from opposite ends of the spectrum. One is about an artificial foreskin which has just come onto the market. The other is an opportunity to go on safari in Uganda and see a tribal circumcision ceremony. If any member explores either, or both, I would dearly like to hear about it.

Now Everyone Can Have A Foreskin!

Whilst many Acorn members glory in their circumcised state, for some it is a source of severe unhappiness. Clipped as infants, they feel that they have been deprived of a birth right, that something that was rightfully theirs has been removed without their consent. The sense of loss is heightened by the suspicion that they have lost more than just a flap of skin – rather, that they have been mutilated and deprived of sensory pleasure, a loss perceived as all the greater for not knowing what they might be missing.

Such men can, if they wish, travel the long and arduous road of restoration – and Anthony reported on his own successful journey earlier this year. But for those unwilling to devote such effort, or for those who would just like to know what a foreskin feels like, help is now at hand. The firm Viafin Atlas is producing the SenSlip, an artificial retractable foreskin.

SenSlip is a brand new product for circumcised men. The product information claims that being circumcised affects the natural operation, appearance and sensitivity of the penis. “Many men worldwide who have undergone circumcision experience a decrease in sensitivity compared with those who have penises which are intact (i.e. with a natural foreskin). During recent years much medical research has been carried out in several countries into the function and purpose of the foreskin. There is now conclusive medical evidence that a circumcised penis with the glans exposed has less nerve receptors and is less effective than a naturally covered penis. Over the years the exposed glans becomes less sensitive. There is well-documented evidence which shows that this can, and often does, have a disastrous effect on sexual performance, and ultimately, on self esteem.”

The SenSlip undergarment is an artificial retractable foreskin which has been carefully designed to help resensitise and dekeratinise the ‘glans’ or head of the penis. The SenSlip is worn on the penis throughout the day, protecting the glans and the remaining exposed foreskin from chafing and the elements. Constructed and anatomically formed from very thin pre-vulcanised latex and microscopic viscose rayon fibres, the SenSlip has an inner and outer rolling layer to allow natural retraction to expose the glans for urination or cleaning. Like a natural foreskin the SenSlip is specially designed to stay in place all day (it weighs as much as a tissue), and it is seamless.

When worn, the SenSlip provides immediate protection. Irritation or friction to the penis ceases, and the surface of the glans and any remaining foreskin on the penile shaft slowly become dekeratinised. Over the course of a few weeks the glans becomes more sensitive to touch and feel. This in turn should lead to more pleasurable sexual responses both for the man and his partner whilst engaging in sexual activity.

The SenSlip can provide:

- A flexible, protective and comfortable retractable cover for the glans
- An affordable artificial foreskin which is washable and semi-disposable

- Immediate and instant protection of the glans from underwear and the elements
- A program for reversing lack of sensitivity in the glans
- A deeper and more enjoyable orgasm
- Natural dekeratinisation of the glans (thinning of the existing calloused skin)
- A softer and smoother glans which is more sensitive to touch and feel
- An artificial foreskin which gives the appearance of an uncircumcised penis
- A feeling of warmth, security and self-esteem.

The SenSlip is available in Caucasian Pink with mid-brown and dark brown colours available soon. It is individually packaged in a re-sealable medical packet, and is supplied in packs of five in any one size. Each SenSlip is designed to keep its shape, consistency and appearance for up to ten days, and is hand washable.

The SenSlip is very flexible and expandable. However, to enjoy the feel and comfort of the artificial retractable foreskin to the maximum, the range is available in ten different sizes, to allow for variation between individuals and correct fitting right from the start. It is the girth which is important and the circumference of the flaccid penis has to be measured at the mid point of the penile shaft. The length of the SenSlip is adjustable. The SenSlip comes complete with a comprehensive program, and instructions on how to use the SenSlip and how to care for it. There is currently an introductory offer of five SenSlip for $90.

Most of the above is marketing information taken from the company website. A number of questions arise, at least in my own mind. First, what about sexual activity? The artificial foreskin does not have a frenulum. The function of the frenulum is of course to draw back the foreskin as the penis becomes erect. Without a frenulum, the artificial foreskin will probably continue to cover the glans, even when the penis is erect – a form of artificial phimosis! So, is the SenSlip actually meant to be worn during sex? The blurb is silent on this issue. For intercourse, does one remove the SenSlip or merely peel it back to expose the glans? And if a condom is worn, is this worn over the SenSlip, or is the foreskin removed before the condom is put on?

One of the most valuable functions of a foreskin is as an aid to masturbation. Is the SenSlip sufficiently robust to be used in the same way, or would the stress to which it would be subjected induce wear and tear?

The way in which length is accommodated is unclear – only girth appears to be taken into account. The range of length of the flaccid penis in normal males is enormous – from two inches or less to five inches or more. Do men with smaller endowments have considerable rucking at the base of the penis, or a long overhang of foreskin, or does the SenSlip not cover the full shaft of the well endowed man? Either way, is the foreskin really going to look natural to the careful observer?

Then there is the cost. The product is not cheap. Each SenSlip costs about £10 and since it lasts about 10 days, we are talking about £1 a day – for the rest of your life. And this is an introductory offer – maintenance of the artificial uncircumcised state obviously does not come cheap.

But such scepticism may be unfair. What is really needed is a proper evaluation by someone who regrets their circumcised state and would like to experiment with this new product. Is there such a member who can afford the $90 and would be prepared to trial the product? I would be delighted to print your report. Of course, if you have sufficient nerve, you might contact the firm, offer to undertake an evaluation for the Acorn Society and see whether they would be prepared to supply samples free.

For those interested, the website is <http://www.viafin-atlas.com> and Viafin Atlas are based at Unit No.1, The Malverns Business Centre, Cherry Orchard Lane, Salisbury, Wiltshire, SP2 7JG. The phone number is (01722) 322611. Let us know how you get on!

Witness A Circumcision

Would you like to witness an adult circumcision? This opportunity is now being offered by the tourist operator Real Africa Excursions. It runs organised trips to Uganda which are aimed at those who are as interested, or perhaps more so, in the people and the cultures that they come into contact with as in the wildlife which the country is famous for.

Real Africa Excursions' Cultural Uganda is an off the tourist beaten track authentic tribal experience. The activities involved on this safari include circumcision ceremonies. The circumcision ceremonies in Uganda among the Bagisu people happen every other year and 2006 is the season for it. People going on the trip would see and attend some of these ceremonies but would also be able to experience other aspects of Uganda. You would be able to be as involved as you wish too in the ceremonies.

The safari lasts for twelve days with a flight into Entebbe airport and transfer by road to a hotel in Kampala. At the end of day 2, you stay overnight at Jinja Nile Resort and then on day 3, you drive east to Mbale. This area is known for the Bagisu Culture. On years that are even numbers you can witness the circumcision cultural display called Kadodi. You then go to a hotel for your overnight accommodation. On day 4, you visit the Sipi falls. In the evening, you witness another circumcision ceremony.

Tour prices, which include accommodation, all meals, transfers, services of driver/guide, all park entry fees and a boat cruise on the Kazinga Channel, are £1,300 (single person) or £900 per person (double occupancy). The price excludes flights, visas, comprehensive travel insurance, drinks, tips and all items of a personal nature.

More details can be obtained from the website <http://www.real-africa.co.uk> or from Denis Kigongo at Real Africa Excursions, Top Flat, 4 Mill Lane, Teignmouth, Devon TQ14 9BJ. Telephone (01626) 870 249. Mobile: 07776 311 266.

If any member does go on this trip, please take plenty of photographs and share your experiences with us via the Acorn newsletter when you return.

Half And Half

The overwhelming majority of males with a foreskin are happy the way they are but there will always be an exception (like me) who, when he was growing up, wished he'd been circumcised, and in adulthood had it done. I was circumcised about 30 years ago when I was in my mid 20's, so for the first half of my life I had a foreskin and for the second half I was without one.

I was born in West London at the end of the war and lived and went to school in a lower middle class area. It was when I went to grammar school aged 10 that I discovered that some boys, like me, had a foreskin, but many didn't. In the boys' changing room everything was on show. About a third of boys were circumcised. There was much interest in who was done but virtually no discussion on why, when and advantages/disadvantages. I now think circumcision was so commonplace that we just accepted it as a fact, no different to being left handed. Circumcision at the time is said to have been more prevalent in the upper classes. We had boys from various backgrounds in the school, so a judgment on this was possible, but I cannot, with the benefit of hindsight, see any correlation.

I played a lot of sport after leaving school and when I started I was obviously one of the youngest players. I was one of only two who were intact – circumcision almost seemed to be a prerequisite to play sport; but I now think it merely reflected the situation that existed when my older colleagues were born. My father was circumcised but I never discussed with him why I wasn't, or whether my parents ever considered it. I expect my mother would not have liked the idea of an operation on her newly born son.

I always liked the circumcised look and, as I said earlier, I wished I had been done. After I left school, I was still keen to be circumcised, but as you can imagine in the pre-internet days, it was not easy to get information. I thought it probably wouldn't happen, but then I read an article in a health magazine about adult circumcision. I contacted the author and he circumcised me. This was in the mid 70's and it was done using a freehand method under local anaesthetic at his London consulting rooms. He was a doctor who regularly carried out the operation on children and adults. I suffered very little discomfort and after three weeks was back to normal. I have never regretted having the operation. My circumcised penis is neat, attractive (to my eye!) and self cleansing, and it does all the things it is supposed to do!

Based on my experience, I favour circumcision and, if asked, would recommend it. I would not, however, recommend routine circumcision, and certainly not for the newly born. Birth is enough of a trauma for all concerned. I think it should be a matter of individual choice made when the individual has the necessary knowledge to make a reasoned judgement.

[From an article by Richard Johnson in the Mail & Guardian On-line, South Africa 16th November 2005]

Eight circumcised men are meeting in Watford, north of London. They want new foreskins. Laurie is sharing his experience of restoration, as foreskin renewal is called, with members of the National Organisation of Restoring Men UK (Norm-UK). The meetings are small and intimate. There is little in the way of physical display. "People are always worried we're going to drop our trousers," says general manager David Smith. Laurie wouldn't be averse to the idea. Women stretch skin for reconstruction after a mastectomy, so why shouldn't men stretch a foreskin?

Some men can't restore. They are too tightly circumcised and have no tissue left to grow. But others can and are availing themselves of products such as the TLC Tugger, Tug Ahoy and the Your-Skin cone. Some have found their own DIY solutions, using funnels and gaskets to stretch the foreskin, and sash-window weights to provide traction. The whole idea sounds funny, but it isn't. Not if it's happening to you. Laurie, nearing 60, was rapidly losing the sensation in his circumcised penis. "I just could not feel a thing." His glans was so desensitised that he could have an orgasm and not even feel it. During heterosexual intercourse with a circumcised man, the penis removes natural lubrication as it moves in and out of the vagina. "So my poor wife was buying artificial lubricant by the gallon," says Laurie. Now, he says, after restoration, sensation has returned and "We're delighted."

John D's circumcision was unnecessary; a course of antibiotics had already cleared up his urinary infection. "But my father agreed with the doctor, and told me I was going to have a minor operation," he says. "I remember the nurses giggling as I was taken off to theatre... I was eight... I remember waking up after the general anaesthetic had worn off, and looking down. My beloved penis had been replaced with wrinkled skin, a collar of thorns – the black stitches – and an ugly great dome on top. I experienced shock at first, later deep anger and resentment. The stitches disappeared, but the mutilation didn't. My father said, "I didn't think it would look like that. It was misinformed consent." John D has never been able to reach orgasm through sexual intercourse.

John E hates the word 'circumcision': "I prefer 'foreskin amputation'. There's no medical benefit. It's a rite. A faith crime."

In the Bible, circumcision was God's covenant with the Jewish people. Circumcision isn't mentioned in the Qur'an, but it is in other Islamic texts, and most Muslims believe it's fundamental. Asked if Norm-UK has Jewish and Muslim members, Smith replies, "Yes we do, but if someone joins us, we do not ask their religion."

Religious circumcisions are frequently performed without anaesthetic, even on newborn babies. Adults can testify to the pain and can give their informed consent – but children can't. Norm-UK points out that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child declares that violence to children cannot be justified on grounds of "religion, culture or tradition".

Circumcision on females was made illegal in Britain in 1985. The same protection is not extended to males because it would mean taking on two of the world's great religions. Most forms of female circumcision are, certainly, more damaging than male circumcision, but the distinction in law can't be justified objectively. Circumcision only gained popularity in the 19th century, after claims that it stopped the vile habit of masturbation, which, the Victorians thought, caused everything from epilepsy to asthma and alcoholism.

A recent paper in the British Medical Journal found a link between an intact foreskin and HIV infection – but a paper in the British Journal of Urology found exactly the opposite. Norm-UK argues that a lack of cleanliness is more important to the transmission of disease than the lack of a foreskin. The organisation accepts there are medical conditions where it is necessary, but, says Smith, doctors often "seem unaware of the alternatives". "And you cannot cut off normal, healthy, sexually functioning tissue without cutting off normal, healthy, sexual functioning," says Marilyn Milos, a nurse and director of the National Organisation of Circumcision Information Resource Centres in the United States. "It's a sexual issue, and it's a human rights issue."

The foreskin isn't a useless flap that evolution should have got rid of long ago – it is rich with blood vessels and nerves. These contribute greatly to the sexual response. There's no escaping it – the foreskin is sexual tissue. In time, campaigners such as Norm-UK hope that routine circumcision will come to be seen as yet another deluded fad, along with bleeding, electro-convulsive therapy and the frontal lobotomy.

Minutes Of The Meeting Of The Acorn Society Held In Leicester On 5th November 2005

Eighteen people attended. Apologies were received from Vernon (newsletter production), Ivan (editor) recovering from surgery, and Kevin.

There being only one officer present, Ian agreed to be acting chairman and Alan took minutes. There were no objections to this arrangement.

Treasurer's report. The Treasurer distributed accounts sheets but an argument ensued when he did not hand one to a visitor who claimed to be a member. Various comments as to what provided proof of membership were made, and various accusations flew about. The Chairman attempted to carry on, but because of a barrage of insults and interruptions, had great difficulty. Eventually he instructed that the account sheets should be collected and that we should move to another subject.

The dropping attendance at meetings was discussed and it seemed important to determine whether members actually wanted a meeting, and if so where and when. Walt agreed to construct a questionnaire for distribution in the magazine and those present agreed that he should, with a budget of no more than £30. Stuart suggested that disruption at meetings was putting people off attending. Several members agreed, whereupon a new series of interruptions started, from the original source. The Chairman calmed things and moved on.

A constitution was discussed and once again it was decided that none was needed at this stage. A membership card was suggested and discussed. It was decided that the practicalities of implementation of this should be looked into by Douglas and Ivan. Having accounts professionally audited was suggested and discounted.

Recruiting new members was discussed. BW had offered to initiate advertising and to receive correspondence addressed to a box number. Appropriate magazines were suggested and it was agreed to accept the offer. After further discussion involving the Treasurer a budget of £500 maximum was agreed.

The need for new signatories, in the light of resignations, was discussed and new arrangements were made. The Chairman proposed that the accounts should be viewed and discussed every five years, unless ten members wrote to the Society requesting otherwise. This was carried unanimously.

The meeting closed at 4.15 pm.

Persuasion Not Compulsion

[A member responds to the Editor's column in issue 3/2005 which discussed the potential contribution of male circumcision to the reduction of the spread of HIV infection, and queried whether, if this were proven, circumcision should become mandatory in the countries most affected.]

The editorial in issue 3/2005 raises a number of points. Firstly, as the infrastructure in this (advanced) country cannot cope with sexual matters (high teenage pregnancy rate, high rate of STD's compared with much of Europe) can the infrastructure of other, far poorer countries cope?

Secondly should health matters be a matter of compulsion? In certain cases of contagious and infectious diseases this is probably so. But as the example of Sweden has shown when handling AIDS, this is a self defeating policy. In this country the way that the government handled the matter of MMR is revealing – heavy persuasion is self defeating. Had the government stood aside, the scientific issues of MMR and autism would have been discussed for a month in the press and then common sense would have prevailed. To be flippant about the matter, we were bored to hell as to whether little Leo Blair had had the MMR jab; I really do not want to go through a newspaper debate as to whether he is circumcised or not.

There are several problems regarding circumcision in this country. The first is a medical profession that got out of control with the establishment of the NHS and is now slowly being brought back into line. I am not an advocate of privatising the NHS but a client/professional relationship is a good way of ensuring that client views are respected. I guess that Dr Fitton has few private patients! The second is that school medical inspections are now fairly cursory in many areas and, since the abolition of National Service, routine health checks of young men have disappeared. We need to re-instate thorough health checks for men and also to increase the level of male awareness of sexual health, not just circumcision but also testicular cancer, prostate cancer etc. etc. etc.

It is very interesting that many health organisations do not give basic advice. Before being cut I asked the advice of my doctor at the local STD clinic during a regular check up as to how to keep a condom on. I had a long foreskin and kept losing them. He advised a Femidom! I checked with the Terrence Higgins Trust, the leading gay AIDS organisation in the country, and they had no advice to give either. I pointed out that condom use is an essential aid to safe sex, but got no satisfactory reply.

Lastly there is the emotion flowing around the debate. I note that J.A.Q. of Oxon sees himself as a member of an elite group now he is circumcised. Just a minute; when I was cut I had my foreskin removed, and this introduced me to a whole range of new experiences and new sensations. It did not induct me into an elite group. I think that if we are to give information on circumcision we should stick to purely factual terms.

One August Day

I was circumcised on 11th August. It's quite strange because I wasn't nervous at all. I had my last uncut wank on 10th August and turned up at the surgery at 2pm on the 11th. I'm sure I'll never forget the date. Dr Zarifa is only 15 minutes from my house so I just got on the DLR – its about 6 stops. The surgery was quiet because it was lunchtime and the main surgery is closed for lunch – just the circumcision centre is open. I had a 20 minute consultation with Dr Zarifa – he was very nice and obviously a very experienced circumciser – he told me that he does 500+ each year.

I told him that I wanted to get cut and that I didn't want a very tight finish – just moderate. I just wanted the helmet to be permanently exposed and to look like a cut guy. I wanted to keep the fren – mine is very small anyway and you wouldn't think I had one. 20 minutes later I was in the cutting room. I lay on the table – it was comfortable and I dropped my jeans and white Cks. He injected the base of my cock a few times – I winced a bit. However we chatted constantly for the whole op – this made it go very fast and took my attention away from what was happening. Dr Zarifa is a Christian Palestinian from Gaza city – I have quite a few Israeli and Palestinian friends and have visited the region a lot – so we had lots to talk about!

The anaesthetic took seconds to take effect and then I heard a few snips. That was a bit weird but only took seconds. The remainder of the op was basically him stitching me up. I didn't look at what was going on; I just stared at the ceiling and talked about Middle East politics!! 25 minutes later he cleaned me up and showed me my cut cock – I was elated. I was bandaged up, had a bottle of water and 15 minutes later was in a taxi home. The whole thing was fine. I would advise anyone wanting to get circumcised that there is nothing to worry about.

He told me to keep the bandage on for 7 days. It didn't hurt but felt a bit sore – on and off only for 24 hours. After that it was OK. Getting hard-ons was a bit different. I am horny a lot and just thinking about my circumcision got me hard so I had to concentrate. I woke up a few times during the first days with a hard-on during the night. Because the wound was bandaged tightly this was uncomfortable – but not too bad. It took a while for my hard-on to go down again – then I could go back to sleep.

After 7 days I took the bandage off in the bath. I was expecting a horrible bruised wound but it was fine. After 17 days I had my first wank which was amazing. I shot the biggest load of my life. Now after one month everything is fine and I am very pleased with my cut cock and proud to be circumcised.

Perfect Man

On the website <http://www.perfectmanforme.com> a woman is advertising for her perfect man. She lists the qualities she requires and each characteristic is scored. "Circumcised – no need to search under the hood" scores 3 points out of a hundred. Being Jewish adds a further 0.5 points!

Picture Gallery – A Guest Editor!

I am sending in some photographs for the picture gallery. These pictures are of a great friend with whom I used to go to school. I made friends with him because of the highly desirable appearance, to me, of his circumcised cock. Everyone can no doubt imagine the fun times that we had in the woods!

He was circumcised as a baby and remembers nothing about it. But whoever performed the operation knew what they were doing! To me, the cut is ideal – no surplus skin when flaccid and about an inch of inner foreskin left. There is no frenulum to speak of. I would think it got torn during the procedure as opposed to being separately and specifically removed, but who knows? Anyway, being smooth in that area adds even more to the end result.

We are still friends and meet up most years. He is keen on naturism and likes to 'show off' his cock. He keeps himself fit and is still very active sexually, extremely randy and usually cums at least twice a day, often more.

Results And Conclusions

There have been a few articles in Acorn that have left some unanswered questions. I ask the members who told these stories to please provide the outcomes. I am curious to find out the conclusions.

In issue 2/2004, 'Californian' told of his and his sons' circumcisions. In that piece he also told that he has two grandsons, only one of which is circumcised. He felt (correctly, I am sure) that the other should be done since, as he points out, being the odd man can be a very cruel experience for a youngster. At the time of writing he was working on the boy's mother to have the lad circumcised. He wrote that the boy would look better and feel better when he was circumcised. The question is: Has Californian been successful? Has he persuaded the mother to agree to have her son done yet? I suppose Californian's son who is also the boy's father is in favour of the boy being cut like himself and the brother. Come on, Californian, tell us the final result.

In 6/2003 'Daniel' told the graphic experience of his circumcision at the age of thirteen, without anaesthetic. He also wrote of his fifteen year old son who was keen to get circumcised, because he had a rather tight foreskin. Perhaps the boy wanted to have a penis like his father's, although he did not state that aloud. Have the fifteen year old's wishes been granted? A fifteen year old's desire and request should be respected. Surely, if he wants to be circumcised it should be carried out, with or without anaesthetic. Please, Daniel, tell. Has the boy been circumcised or are you still denying him?

I hope that there is a response to this from both these two members either in these columns or, if preferred, directly to me through the Acorn mailbox.

Zippered

Talking about bad parenting, this brings to mind the not uncommon cases of Penises Caught In Zippers, which I encountered during my A & E posting umpteen years ago, in a smallish, now non-existent hospital. Why do parents not teach their young 'uns (referring to the male gender) to wear underwear ESPECIALLY when wearing pants/shorts with zippers???

One case which particularly stands out in my mind involved a seven year old boy who came in on a particularly busy, hot and humid Saturday afternoon towards the end of my shift. His member was deeply caught in his zipper (sorry guys, I know you are cringing!). To his credit, he was very brave, albeit anxious, and didn't shed a tear. Usually, what we Medical Officers did was apply some EMLA (placebo effect - better than nothing), wait 15 - 20 minutes for it to take effect (for what it's worth) then give a strong yank down, and it usually did the job. Kid is a bit sore, organ a bit abraded but intact, and patient goes home with a tube of antibiotic ointment +/- paracetamol.

Well, for this particular case, this method didn't work. So using forceps and tweezers, I got down to trying to lever off the zipper teeth without injuring the above said organ. Being a busy Saturday, the nurses left me to do it on my own, since the kid was pretty co-operative. So there I am, sweating buckets, hovering over the boy's privates, and the kid starts yelling: "Don't touch my penis, don't touch my penis!!!" And I start yelling back in frustration: "I'm not touching your penis! I'm trying to get it out without hurting you!!!" Do note that the only thing separating us from the other areas of the department was a drawn curtain, so I can't imagine what the other patients were thinking and picturing happening behind the curtain. Anyway, after a 15 minute struggle with the stubborn zipper, we SOS'ed for help from the on-call surgeon, who after another 20 minute struggle, also gave up.

The kid finally was admitted for a circumcision.

Between A Rock And A Hard Place

[An article by Andrew Gumbel in the Los Angeles City Beat]

On the morning of his 42nd birthday, Stephen Harrell was arrested outside a liquor store on Century Boulevard in Inglewood, handcuffed, and hauled off to face the screwiest charge ever levelled at him in his admittedly chequered career with the criminal justice system. He was accused of concealing four rocks of cocaine in his foreskin.

To be more precise, he was accused of wrapping the rocks in individual clear plastic bags, placing them all in another black bag, shoving them halfway up his penis and then keeping them snugly in place for at least an hour between the time of his arrest and the time that three Inglewood cops strip-searched him. The whole package was variously described by the arresting officer as being 'bigger than a marble' and having roughly the same diameter as a dime.

Let me point out to those of you unendowed with male genitalia that we are talking about an almost unfathomable world of pain here, not to mention physical elasticity of a truly extraordinary kind. (Those of you with male genitalia have probably crossed your legs already.) Nothing in Harrell's long resume as a petty criminal and drug user suggests he was ever in serious contention for the cast of Puppetry of the Penis. Or, as Harrell himself put it in one of his first interviews with his defence attorney: "I may be big, but I ain't no horse."

So far, just a funny story. But it only gets more bizarre on closer examination. The arresting officer, Patrick Manning, claims he saw Harrell drop a crack pipe from his waistband as soon as he became aware of his patrol car. That, at least, was the pretext for the arrest. But Harrell didn't apparently think of dumping the cocaine – assuming he ever had it in the first place. Officer Manning noticed nothing unusual about the way Harrell was walking, and once he had cuffed him and put him in the patrol car he didn't report any wriggling or gasps of pain.

The public defender eventually assigned to Harrell, Eleanor Schneir, had the bright idea of downloading some penis diagrams off the Internet and asked Officer Manning and the two colleagues he took with him into the strip-search room to show the trial jury where exactly the bulge had been. Curiously, each policeman put it in a different place. One said it was at the top, beneath the foreskin proper, while the other two put it further down and to the side. In one diagram the package was almost all the way to the base of the penis – which makes one wonder just how endowed with male genitalia the police officers themselves can have been.

Schneir had great fun buying up gourmet gumballs from her local grocery store and waving them at the jury, with a dime taped to the side for size-comparison purposes, just to emphasize the preposterousness of the allegation. She cited no less an authority than Seinfeld to question whether any penis could withstand the cold of the strip-search room without succumbing to the dreaded male problem of shrinkage, which would surely have shaken the incriminating package loose all by itself. At a certain point, it seemed Harrell was home free, and Schneir was confident enough to berate the prosecution for subjecting him to an embarrassing public spectacle. As she told the jury: “He has to sit here and hear me, his lawyer, his advocate, a woman, argue to a jury of 12 strangers that his penis is too small for this to be possible – what could possibly be more humiliating than that?”

Things took an unexpected turn, however, as a batch of photographs of Harrell’s genitalia was released to the court and appeared to show that he was circumcised. From Harrell’s point of view, this might have looked like a pretty good defence – how, after all, can anyone conceal drugs in their foreskin if they don’t have one? In reality, though, the photographs unleashed a furore in the courtroom and changed the terms of the debate entirely. Suddenly, it was not the Inglewood PD whose honesty was under scrutiny but rather Harrell’s, as the defendant was accused of yanking his foreskin back for the camera in an attempt to conceal it.

In the single most surreal sequence of the trial, Officer Manning bragged that he knew all about the flexibility of uncircumcised penises because he used to play baseball for the Atlanta Braves (he was a 1999 draft pick later sidelined by a knee injury) and frequently showered with players from Colombia and Central America who not only had foreskins but were frequently ‘silly’ with them. Manning told the prosecutor he saw players pull down their foreskins and dance around for as long as 20 minutes. Schneir wasn’t going to let this one go. “I’m a little confused,” she said disingenuously. “I was always led to believe that men in showers go to great lengths not to look at each other’s penises, and you’re telling me you looked for 20 minutes?”

Members of the jury started guffawing. Manning said sheepishly that he hadn’t exactly looked for 20 minutes. So Schneir asked him how long he had looked for – 15 minutes, 10 minutes, 5 minutes? Eventually, Manning said he’d looked at one penis for one minute. Schneir deadpanned: “Okay, we’re all dying to know: whose penis was it?”

For all the courtroom humour, from here on out the trial started slipping out of the grasp of the defence. The deputy district attorney suggested the only way to resolve the circumcision question was to have Harrell re-examined by a medical professional. Harrell told the court he’d had quite enough people looking at his penis and refused. The judge, Deirdre Hill, then instructed the jury that they were free to interpret this refusal as a form of self-incrimination.

Schneir tried valiantly to argue that the circumcision question made no difference to the plausibility of the police’s story. But the damage was done, and the jury came back with a guilty verdict. He was sentenced to six years and six months behind bars. and is now stuck behind bars until 2010 at the earliest.

Ask The Sexpert

I am a 20-year-old boy. I experience little pain during masturbation, when too much pre-seminal fluid gets collected at the urethral opening. But this pain is occasional. Kindly suggest a remedy.

Move your foreskin daily up and down to loosen it up enough to slide it back up to the base of the head of the penis.

I had a pea-sized growth on the area that connects the foreskin with the head of the penis. Doctors diagnosed it as a cyst and asked me not to worry, and I underwent a minor operation to remove the same. After the surgery, the pleasure that I experience during an orgasm as well as my sexual desire has reduced to almost half. What can I do about this?

The area that has been removed is where the most pleasure-nerves are. Try different positions to ascertain what will be most pleasurable. Try stroking more vigorously. I believe the sensation will improve with time.

I am a 17-year-old boy. It seems that I have an infection on my penis. The foreskin itches and some red rashes have appeared all over it. There is no burning sensation. The itching gets unbearable at night and also early in the morning. The itching had once healed when I applied Candi Derma cream on my foreskin, but now it has resurfaced. Please suggest some remedy to cure this problem completely.

Please do not try to be your own doctor. Consult a doctor who will be able to suggest a simple remedy to your problem. Meanwhile, apply the same cream.

I am a 27-year-old man. I will be getting married soon. How important is circumcision for a healthy and satisfying sexual life? I have had sex several times using a condom. I can easily pull my foreskin back. Is it necessary to have it done before having sex without condoms?

If you can easily slip your foreskin up and down over the head of the penis then you do not need a circumcision.

I am a 30-year-old man and will be marrying soon. I masturbate three to four times a week. My problem is that the veins on my penis show clearly and the skin on its tip does not stretch back beyond an inch. What should I do so that it does not affect my sex life?

You seem to be normal. Consult a doctor and he will clear all your doubts. You may need a circumcision.

Since the last one week I have been finding small, paper-like, pale yellow substance on the tip of my urethra. Initially, the deposit used to be less frequent. It does not hurt me, but the presence of these particles makes me very uncomfortable. Could these be kidney stones? I drink three glasses of milk every day. So, could it be excess calcium?

Send some of the deposit and a morning urine sample to a pathologist and get them tested. It is possible that it is smegma – a normal secretion that deposits under the foreskin. Do you retract your foreskin and clean it daily?

I am a 35-year-old man. I had sex a year back, which resulted in cuts on my foreskin. Ever since I have developed some white spots on my foreskin, which, I suppose, is vitiligo. Even the skin does not retract like before. What should I do?

Kindly consult a doctor. It could be more than vitiligo.

I am 21-year-old boy. In one of your replies to a query in this column, you had mentioned that it is normal if the left testicle is lower than the right one. But in my case it is the reverse. Is this normal too? Also, is it necessary that the foreskin retracts while having sex? I have had sex a couple of times but my foreskin does not retract. Is there something wrong?

It is as normal to have the right testicle lower than the left and vice versa. If you are able to have sex successfully without the foreskin retracting, then that's absolutely normal too. But later a tear may occur due to vigorous stroking and that can be painful; so please consult a surgeon.

I am a 55-year-old healthy and active man. I wish to get myself circumcised. Is it harmless? If yes, from where can I get it done?

Circumcision is harmless. If correctly done, it can be very useful during sex. It also helps avoid infection if one has a tight foreskin that cannot be pulled back. It is a simple surgery that any good surgeon can perform.

I am a 20-year-old boy. My girlfriend and I recently started enjoying a good and healthy sex life. Both of us are able to enjoy as well as give each other pleasure. Earlier my foreskin could not retract at all but now it goes back completely when the penis is flaccid. However, when erect, it does not retract fully as the circumference of the skin is less than that of the penis. The foreskin is attached to the skin within. Is this why my foreskin does not completely retract? How can I make it do so? I don't want to be circumcised. Will stroking the penis hard help?

The foreskin is naturally attached at the lower base of the head of the penis. You need not worry about this till the time you do not experience any pain during intercourse. Do not do anything except slipping back the foreskin gently every day.

I am a 25-year-old man. My foreskin is attached to the tip of the penis and is quite tight. Do I need to undergo circumcision to have an active sex life or will it get detached on its own during intercourse? What are the disadvantages of not having it detached? I have never masturbated.

I would suggest that you consult your family doctor in this case. If you have a tight foreskin it might need a simple surgery.

Editorial

This edition has an Irish flavour. First, an account of an operation performed in Ireland for phimosis again demonstrates that adult circumcision, whether performed for medical or cosmetic reasons, is only a minor procedure. Unfortunately, the guy requested a partial circumcision, only to find that it was too partial and that he might need a second op. The second Irish contribution is from a member cut in his thirties and who now wants his loose result tightened up. He is seeking help and advice so I hope that the many Acorn members who have undergone revisions will contact him as requested.

Finally an expert committee in Ireland has recommended that the health authorities establish regional services to carry out cultural male circumcisions. The argument is that if babies are to be circumcised, it is better that this be done by trained medical personnel in hygienic conditions rather than by back street practitioners. It estimates that up to 2,000 such procedures could be required annually. Since the population of Ireland is about 4m, this could indicate that 5% of Irish babies would be routinely circumcised under this initiative. But of course, if this opened the way to infant circumcision on demand, the percentage could be much greater.

The fate of the frenulum

So. The decision has been taken. The foreskin is to be excised. A circumcision is to be performed. At that point, the fate of the frenulum hangs in the balance – is it to remain or is it to be swept away with the prepuce?

The frenulum is a band of skin which tethers the foreskin to the underside of the penis, in the V-shaped part of the sulcus. It functions mainly during erection. As the penis becomes engorged, the frenulum tightens and pulls on the foreskin, causing it to retract behind the glans, leaving the glans fully exposed, ready for intercourse. (For those who have long since lost their penile frenulum, another occurs in the mouth, attaching the underside of the tongue to the bottom half of the mouth. Some sense of the frenulum's function with respect to the foreskin can be gained by touching the mouth's frenulum with the tip of the tongue, feeling how the body uses it to keep the tongue in place.)

The frenulum can itself cause problems through a condition called frenulum breve, literally, a frenulum which is too short. In such cases, as the penis becomes erect, the frenulum tightens to perform its function of withdrawing the foreskin, but it is too short for its purpose. The frenulum becomes very taut which can cause a sharp pain every time the penis is thrust to and fro during intercourse – a very effective discouragement to sexual activity! The frenulum becomes like a piece of thread under extreme tension and it can split. Sometimes the splits are slight, rather like paper cuts, exquisitely painful, slow to heal and apt to reoccur. Sometimes there is a complete rupture of the frenulum, which can be frightening, accompanied as it can be by quite profuse bleeding. If the two halves of the ruptured frenulum heal separately, that can cure the problem. Otherwise, healing is as for less severe splits, slow and with a risk of the problem reoccurring.

Once, circumcision was the cure for a short frenulum, but these days, when circumcision is often viewed as an operation of last resort, a frenulectomy or frenuplasty can be performed instead. In the first case, the frenulum is cut through or is removed entirely. Although this solves the problem of the tight frenulum, it can cause a new difficulty. Without the frenulum, the foreskin is now anchorless, and it no longer withdraws automatically on erection; in the worst cases, the foreskin continues to cover the glans during intercourse, reducing the sensation and pleasure of the man. Frenoplasty is an operation which lengthens the frenulum. This leaves the frenulum in place to perform its natural function but problems can occur if the man has a fairly narrow foreskin. The frenoplasty lengthens the frenulum by reducing the width of the foreskin. In the worst cases, a tight frenulum is replaced by a tight foreskin!

But if, for whatever reason, circumcision is to be performed, should the frenulum be removed at the same time? There are a number of arguments in favour. First, once the foreskin is removed, the frenulum no longer has a function. There is no longer a foreskin to pull back on erection; it is a tether with nothing attached. It is therefore redundant and might as well be removed. Second, the surgeon can achieve a more aesthetic finish if the frenulum is removed. If it remains in place, an excess of foreskin is left on the underside of the penis, causing bunching which in some cases can be unsightly. The surgeon also has to ensure that he doesn't cause the frenulum to be over-tight and he is therefore inhibited from performing too tight a cut. A loose circumcision can result with the possibility of some bunching of skin behind the glans.

Surely therefore it would be sensible for the surgeon to remove the frenulum as part of the normal circumcision procedure – as indeed some surgeons do. But here controversy raises its head. Many men claim that the frenulum is the seat of the most exquisite sensations – that if the frenulum is removed, then sensitivity, and hence sexual enjoyment, is vastly diminished. Other men who have had their frenulums removed argue that it is not the frenulum itself, but the V-shaped area in the sulcus underneath which is the real area of sensitivity. The removal of the frenulum exposes this area to even greater stimulation and therefore heightened enjoyment.

Frenulum in place

Frenulum removed

Interestingly, surgical texts give little guidance to surgeons on this matter. Sometimes the operator is urged to avoid the frenulum; very occasionally there is encouragement to remove the frenulum; mostly the topic is not mentioned. Traditions therefore build up, presumably because operating techniques are passed from generation to generation – the surgeon practises what he learnt during his early days as a doctor and surgical registrar. Thus in the UK, the tendency is towards a loose cut with the frenulum left intact. In the US on the other hand cuts are tighter with the frenulum excised.

It may be that the American tradition derives from the fact that infant circumcision is practised fairly routinely in that country. Although neither the Gomco clamp nor the Plastibell, the two techniques most commonly used on American babies, specifically target the frenulum, nevertheless the frenulum just fails to develop following infant circumcision. The body obviously knows that the frenulum will now be redundant and that there is little point in it growing. American surgeons performing adult cuts take as their model the penises that they see in their urological practice (and between their own legs!), circumcised fairly tightly in infancy and with an undeveloped frenulum. The adult frenulum is therefore removed so that the guy is as he would have been had he been circumcised as a baby. In the UK, there is no such generalised model from infancy to copy. Since most adult circumcisions are performed for medical reasons, the surgeons just remove the amount of skin necessary to solve the problem, usually resulting in a loose cut with frenulum intact.

For those choosing elective circumcision, there is a risk assessment to be made. If a tight result is required, loss of the frenulum is virtually a requirement. Yet there is then a danger of loss of sensitivity. How great that danger is may be difficult to assess, for the evidence on the subject is mainly anecdotal. In the end, it is the patient's decision. For most Acorn members circumcised as adults, full exposure of the glans has been important. Many have even undergone revision circumcisions with removal of the frenulum to achieve the tight finish which they consider the aesthetic ideal. For them, any potential loss of sensitivity was a risk worth taking. Is it for you?

Circumcision – Irish Style

This story is taken from a discussion forum on the [IrishHealth.com website]

I suffered from phimosis and tried stretching but that wasn't very satisfactory (I have been trying it on and off for several years in fact) so I went to my GP who recommended a specialist. He then recommended a circumcision, but was happy enough with my request for a partial one (i.e., removing the tight tip, leaving some of the skin so that the glans is still mostly covered when I am flaccid). Here's the story of my operation.

I got to the hospital about 12.30 or so; I was pointed to a waiting room, where I spent about 15 minutes before being called in for an official admission. This consisted of giving my VHI details and my religion (presumably only for the morbid reason in case of something going wrong, I hope, and not for any discriminatory purposes!).

After this I was sent to a day ward; nothing fancy, but a well kept room with 4 beds in it. Here I spent the next hour, whiling away the time with a book (I advise you to bring something to keep your mind off what is ahead). About 1.30 or so, the anaesthetist called in to ask me a few questions, such as my age and what I had eaten recently. A nurse also called in, leaving me a gown and telling me to have it on by 2pm. Shortly after that time, two nurses called with a trolley, and after that there was no turning back! They got me to lie on it, then went off for a ride to the operating theatre.

Before I reached the theatre itself, there was an anteroom where I had a needle placed in my arm for the anaesthetic. I'm a coward when it comes to anything medical, and I'll never like needles, but apart from that awful sensation when it goes in, it was fine afterwards and I couldn't even feel it. Then I was wheeled into the theatre itself, and moved onto the table there. The anaesthetist worked quickly; as my consultant chatted to me, I felt a strange cold sensation in my arm, which in the back of my head I figured was the anaesthetic being injected. However, I didn't have long to wonder about it...

I woke up later, not feeling too bad; in fact, as if I'd had a refreshing sleep. Checking the clock, it was 3.20, so I'd been out for about an hour. Of course, there was the possibility I'd been awake previously – I'd been told that I would only be asleep a half-hour or so – and just couldn't remember it. Soon afterwards, I was moved back up to the day ward. There was no pain, just a numbness down there; I'd been told I would receive some form of local, or pain block, while knocked out. My girlfriend arrived soon afterwards; rather than have a look at the damage myself, I got her to take a look. She was surprised there was no bandage; rather, just a thick gauze or cotton pad seems to have been just lain over the area, but this had fallen off. Apart from some dried blood, it didn't look too bad, she said.

My stay in hospital was longer than it should have been, only because I wasn't given food and liquids early enough, and I was told that I had to urinate at least once before I left – presumably to make sure everything was OK in that department. I ended up sitting there knocking back glass after glass of water. Urinating was the hardest part; I ended up performing it sitting down, and the first part of the flow was accompanied by a lot of water. Eventually I was able to leave the hospital at 8pm.

There was really little or no pain for the first 2 days or so; the local seems to take care of that. Only after that period was there pain, usually during two times; urination, and morning erections. This could sting quite badly sometimes. There was also some blood; not much, but enough to cause a stain. I also wished that the consultant had told me exactly how much bruising and swelling would occur; after day 2, my penis began turning a deep purple from the tip back to the base over the course of two days, and the swelling increased. At first I was worried, thinking that it couldn't possibly look this bad if everything was fine. But reading a few online forums reassured me that, yes, it would look like this before it got any better.

It's now day 21 after the operation – three weeks – and someone taking a look might think that absolutely nothing had happened. The colour and size are the same as before the operation, and, because it was only a partial, the difference isn't too much. The foreskin is shorter, with the tight tip removed, but that's it. Everything still isn't normal though; where I presume the stitches were put, inside the foreskin, is a firm ring; this prevents me pulling the foreskin back, and also hurts if I press against it, such as when urinating. I can only hope this will eventually go away, and isn't another problem to deal with! So I'm not yet sure whether the operation was a success; I guess that will be the subject of another posting in a month or two.

Six weeks after the operation

I am going back tomorrow for a checkup after my partial circumcision. I am unhappy at the moment, since the opening of the remaining foreskin is about the same size as it was originally. Plus now, I'm having a problem spraying while urinating. It looks like I may need to get the whole lot removed; needless to say I want to hear from the surgeon that this will be a success, otherwise I'm tempted to look elsewhere before placing myself in his hands another time.

Surgeons Should Perform Circumcisions, Report Says

[From an article by Martin Wall in the Irish Times, 24th January 2006]

A Government-appointed expert committee in Ireland has recommended that the health authorities establish regional services to carry out cultural male circumcisions. The committee's report, which has been given to Minister for Health Mary Harney, strongly argues for the procedure to be carried out in a medical setting.

It says that circumcisions "performed by untrained people in inappropriate environments are not acceptable in Ireland". It warns that any injury to an infant arising from a circumcision carried out by "an incompetent person" could be deemed to be a form of child abuse and be subject to child protection legislation or criminal law. It says that such incidents should be reported to the Health Service Executive, properly investigated, and decisions taken on the facts of the individual case.

The report says circumcisions should be performed by appropriately-trained surgeons and anaesthetists in adequately equipped units. However, the committee says it is satisfied that the practice of neo-natal Orthodox Jewish circumcisions – carried out by trained rabbis – should be permitted to continue. It proposes that this situation be kept under review.

The expert committee, chaired by the professor of paediatrics at the Royal College of Surgeons, Dr Denis Gill, was established by the Department of Health to establish the needs for cultural circumcision, to address the ethical considerations and draw up recommendations on procedures to be followed if the practice was considered appropriate.

Last October a Nigerian man was found not guilty by a court in Waterford of reckless endangerment in relation to a home circumcision he carried out in the county two years previously. The court had been told that a 29-day-old boy, Collis Osaighe, had died from haemorrhage and shock due to bleeding some hours after the circumcision had been carried out.

In its findings the expert committee recommends that cultural male circumcisions should be provided in the Irish health services. It says the Health Services Executive should provide a regional service capable of performing the requisite number of circumcisions. It estimates that up to 2,000 such procedures could be required annually. The report also warns that the provision of increasing numbers of elective circumcisions may have an impact on the volume of other surgical procedures that can be performed in hospitals. The report says that medical and nursing staff who have ethical objections to the procedure should be allowed to opt out of the service.

Looking For A Revision

I enjoyed the last issue of Acorn (issue 6/2005) especially Half and Half (F.I. – North Wales) as I was able to relate to it and had similar experiences.

I was born in Dublin in the 1950's into an ordinary middle class family and the norm then was that 80% of boys were circumcised at birth. I was delicate and the procedure was postponed for six months but unfortunately was never carried out. From an early age, I was engaged in all sports at school and scouts and was very aware of the differences between Roundheads and Cavaliers, as we used to call it. I always felt the odd one out and regretted that I had not been circumcised. I tried as far as possible to keep the foreskin retracted behind the glans and had it well trained. I noticed that the circumcised boys were always keen to show off their equipment. I always liked the clean cut look and the nice exposed knobs.

When I was 30, I decided to be circumcised which took a bit of courage as there was not very much information available especially in Ireland, unlike nowadays. The procedure was very straight forward and was carried out under local anaesthetic. The freehand method was used and the whole procedure took about 30 minutes. I have no regrets and should have had it done much sooner.

My only slight disappointment was in the result. It is low and loose with the frenulum removed. I would have preferred the high and tight look but at that time I didn't know anything about the various options and they were not mentioned or discussed with the doctor. It is about 20 years since I had it done and I am very keen on getting it re-done and, as I mentioned, I would like the high and tight look this time, like in last issue's picture gallery (C.A.). Is this possible?

I would welcome other members' views, comments and suggestions. I would also appreciate the names and contact details of recommended doctors who are experienced in re-doing jobs either in these pages or directly to me through the Acorn mailbox. Don't forget to send the correct value postage stamps for Ireland. I am willing to travel to the UK.

SenSlip – A Review

The article 'Now everyone can have a foreskin' in issue 6/2005 prompted me to log on to the Viafin-Atlas website and find out more. Detailed information of their SenSlip artificial prepuce was provided, arousing my curiosity and I decided to place a sample order.

Measuring the girth of one's penis for a snug fit is the most important factor when ordering, but measuring the flaccid penile circumference accurately with a tape measure is easier said than done. Therefore having assessed my measurement as half way up the Viafin-Atlas scale of 1 to 10, I ordered a sample pack of three SenSlip 'undergarments', containing sizes 4, 5 and 6. These arrived within a matter of days and I found size 6 to provide the best fit for me.

If the SenSlip is too long, which is usually the case, it is easily cut to the required length with sharp scissors. It is nevertheless tricky to put on, despite coming with a detailed explanatory leaflet. When adjusted, there should be no overhang as on a long foreskin, otherwise some urine will be retained inside after micturition. Indeed, it has been my experience that the glans becomes permanently moist, even if the SenSlip is worn correctly, but this is also the case with any foreskin, whether long or short, I believe. It also has a rubbery feel, unlike a real prepuce – I know the difference, having been circumcised as an adult. Also, as with a real foreskin, I am convinced it would develop the typical odour associated with foreskins if worn on a prolonged basis. Perhaps that is why the manufacturers state that it should not be worn at night.

Nevertheless, the SenSlip is comfortable to wear and I have placed an order for a small supply. If my glans becomes de-keratinised after ten days' wear as suggested, I may continue to wear them, but the prospect of doing this would not come cheap – my sample pack already cost $36, only one of which is really suitable.

SenSlip And Sensitivity

I was most interested to hear about the artificial foreskin (issue 6/2006). I have, as reported in Acorn previously, already conducted experiments on sensitivity. These involved wrapping the penis in soft tissue with a moisturiser. I conducted a two year experiment to see if there was any noticeable increase in sensitivity. The findings were disappointing and my conclusion was that those men who stretched the remaining skin to form a new covering to the glans were wasting their time. There was a slight increase in sensitivity immediately after unwrapping prior to, say, intercourse but it did not last for long. I must admit I did enjoy the wonderful 'bare' feeling remembered from post circumcision days.

SenSlip – Are They In Business?

I was very interested to read the article 'Now everyone can have a foreskin' (issue 6/2005). I have been trying to follow it up with the firm Viafin Atlas in Salisbury but without success. I wrote to them but with no reply and I have phoned about six times but all you get is that the number is not accepting calls.

So I visited Salisbury and called on them only to find the Unit looking deserted and all locked up with nobody around. It would appear that they are not in business. Nevertheless, I left a card through the letter box so we shall see if there is a reply. Having been circumcised for quite a few years, I was prepared to give SenSlip a try. I shall keep trying to see whether I can get any reply from them.

C.P. – Wiltshire

[Editor's note: The website for Viafin Atlas is still very much up and running and, from GB's experience above, it appears that the American side of the operation is working. If anyone has success in contacting the firm in the UK, please let me know.]

Circumcision Is Barbaric And Unnecessary

[An article by Angelika T.L. Byorth in the Daily Nebraskan]

In 1986, when my son was born, his circumcised father and the probably circumcised doctor urged me to consent to having our baby boy altered in like fashion. Since I had grown up in Germany, where the practice of non-religious circumcision was virtually unheard of, I resisted on instinctual, cultural and ethical grounds.

Circumcision as a medical procedure was introduced in the 19th century as a prevention and cure for diseases like masturbation, epilepsy, insanity, hip-joint disease, involuntary nocturnal seminal emissions, phimosis, prolapse of the rectum and at least a dozen of additional illnesses. The procedure became quasi-compulsory during the Cold War era.

Since then, the supposed medical reasons for mass circumcision have been shifting often and substantially. A 1999 policy report issued by the American Academy of Paediatrics lists three main reasons for which circumcision is supposed to be preventive: urinary tract infection (UTI), penile cancer and phimosis. These are potential health hazards, indeed. However, the cited statistical incidence of these conditions looks to be extremely rare. We might as well be advocating that, instead of teaching our children how to properly clean their armpits, to surgically obliterate all of the sweat-producing glands right after birth. Or, if we remove the uterus from the bodies of all little girls early on, they will not contract uterine cancer later in life. But wait a minute! The human race would become extinct if we did that!

Today, and after carefully considering information for and against routine prophylactic circumcision, I have come to the conclusion that it is a cruel, barbaric, unethical and totally unnecessary American practice. Routine neonatal penile surgery is not found in Europe or in most of the rest of the world. It ranks among the vastly under-reported human rights issues of our times and should be declared illegal. It is a mystery to me how our American culture and even the United Nations can decry female circumcision elsewhere in the world, while doing nothing about male circumcision here at home.

Geoffrey P. Miller, in an article for the Virginia Journal of Social Policy & the Law, writes: "Every year, in hospitals across the United States, hundreds of thousands of newborn boys are strapped naked to a board and assaulted in their genitals by ritually attired practioners known as physicians." According to Miller, the procedure is painful, but performed without anaesthetic. The baby's cries serve as proof of healthy lungs, and the subsequent traumatised sleep testifies the procedure is not painless. Miller also asserts that pain memories may impair a baby boy's intellectual and emotional development.

Though the procedure is surgically safe, Miller contends, it is not without risks. Haemorrhaging, infection, and ulceration are the more serious side effects, according to Miller, but the penis may be bent, deformed, split, perforated, amputated, or burned off. Scar tissue may also accumulate in the urethra and even when the procedures are successful, as Miller writes: "Viewed from the perspective of normal human anatomy, he has been mutilated."

A conversation last year with my friend Richard Thoene, who died recently, had added a human dimension to my private investigation into the topic of circumcision. Richard was very open about many things outside of his war experiences. He once said that when he was circumcised for real medical reasons at the late age of 67, he lost about 30 percent of his sexual pleasure. He even encouraged me to: "Write a column about circumcision sometime! And be sure to quote me on what I just told you."

The statistical incidence and regional variations of circumcision across the U.S. are interesting. Our Midwest area has had the highest numbers of circumcised men since 1979, with 1999 being a peak year during which 81.4 percent of males endured genital mutilation during the first three days of their lives. In contrast, only 36.7 percent of males in the West went under the neonatal knife during 1999.

Circumcisions are robbing men of an essential part of their bodies, and of a large percentage of their potential physical and emotional pleasure. Not to speak of the rare but significant health hazards including death that can be by-products of circumcisions gone wrong. And then there are a range of psychological traumas some circumcised men suffer from later in life, along with the hopeful news that men can and have been working on restoring their foreskins. Someone needs to stop the atrocity of circumcision, and it might as well be a woman. We women, and our men, have sons to protect.

A Day With The Surgeon

[Article by Shem Suchia, Daily Nation, Kenya]

Although 'modernity' has watered down the Luhya circumcision rite, this rite of passage to adulthood is not about to disappear, which is why Isaac Arema Shiboya was recently anointed as a new village circumciser, taking over from his late father. Aged 48, Arema is probably the youngest traditional circumciser in the Western Province. And, it would appear he was cut out for the job. While his age mates struggled to chart out their future, Arema was being brought up to be a circumciser. So when his father died six months ago after 32 years in the profession, Arema was the natural successor.

As the mourners poured in to bury his father, some of them had other ideas: to use the occasion to bless the new village surgeon. Arema's father – reverently called 'Mshevi' meaning the circumciser – had cut hundreds of thousands of boys. And, as if fate wanted to test his son, 'Mshevi' died when the ritual was months away.

Not that precautions hadn't been taken. When Arema's father started ailing in the late nineties, the elders approached Arema to start preparing for a take-over in case his old man succumbed to his illness. It did happen so. Being the first-born son, Arema had no choice but to adhere to the dictates of tradition, which demand that he succeeds his late father as the new village circumciser. It all points to tradition and history. Tradition because according to the Luhya customs, one can only qualify to be a traditional circumciser when he has a son as the first-born child. History because circumcision runs in their blood starting from forefathers.

Arema thinks being a circumciser is a divine calling and therefore a preserve of few. "There is no specific school to train you for this kind of work. It all runs in the blood and has a lot to do with your interest in it," says Arema, himself circumcised in 1972 by who else but his father. So far he has done 3,000 cuts with no initiate bleeding to death or developing life-threatening side-effects, for which he thanks God. And as the circumcision season approaches, Arema is getting "divine signals" more frequently. "The beginning of the season comes after I dream of doing the actual thing."

After the dreams he directs his wife to prepare amalwa (beer), which is served outside their hut in a giant pot from which the elders drink using straws. As the party nears its climax, there comes the formal announcement of the beginning of the circumcision season. This is a men-only ceremony; women can only watch from afar. The candidates are taught the ways of the society and advised on what is expected of them ahead of the big day. Parents fork out Sh300 per child. A day before the cut, there is singing and dancing at the circumciser's home before the boys are taken into seclusion to spend the night at a central venue.

From here they are taken to a river, where the ceremony is performed very early in the morning. This is to take advantage of the cold, which numbs the initiates' bodies, minimising pain and bleeding. But the real spectacle starts when Arema arrives at the river draped in a leopard skin, his body painted with coloured mud. In tow are usually village elders, a drummer, the bearers of his surgical kit and one or two trainees. He must guard against coming face-to-face with another circumciser on his way to the river lest one of them dies.

To avoid such a disaster each circumciser's territory is well defined. The knives used in the operation are also different. The Idakhos, for example, employ a one-sided knife for the cut while the Kabras use a two-sided one. The explanation is that the former is thought to be a woman while the latter a male clan. "The work demands a thorough understanding of tradition," explains the surgeon. Watching Arema at work is not for the lily-livered. The cut itself is executed with lightning speed. As the drumbeat reaches a deafening climax, Arema's sterilised knife cuts off the foreskin of the first initiate, to the crowd's thunderous applause. He washes the knife in a basin of water laced with Jik and dabs it with methylated spirit before moving to the next initiate.

When all the boys have been circumcised, a herbal powder is administered on the wound and each initiate, now considered a man, is escorted home amid song and dance. Shortly thereafter, a huge party is held at the home of one of the initiates, where beer and meat are served in plenty and people dance and sing until the wee hours of the morning.

Healing is usually faster in younger boys and takes between three weeks and a month. Because circumcision is done during the August and December school holidays, initiates have enough time to rest and recuperate. During this time, Arema and his team make routine visits to their homes to evaluate their progress. He is however an unhappy man. Many parents are opting for the hospital, leaving him grossly under-utilised. Arema's consolation is however the lingering contempt for boys 'cut' at the hospital. When he is not on the job, village elder Arema looks after cattle and goats to supplement his income. Looking back at his life, the father of two boys and four girls doesn't regret dropping out of school after sitting for his Certificate of Primary Education in 1975. "It all has to do with fate. Maybe had I continued with my education I could be 'somebody else'. But with the little I had, I live well by village standards."

As he speaks, from afar there comes loud singing by initiates rehearsing for the big day. Hurriedly, the surgeon bids me farewell and disappears into the thick bush in the direction of the songs.

Retraction

I tried to train my foreskin back from when I was 10 or so. My desire to do so arose from having seen my father with a retracted skin and several cousins. It seems a common practice in Mexico for some reason. I was unsuccessful trying rubber bands, rolling the skin back, and tucking it under like an example I've seen elsewhere. My skin would stay back easily when hard and usually when soft so long as I didn't shrink too much or I didn't sit or bend over which would cause the shaft of the penis to pull inward into the body. Some guys appear to get a snug foreskin band or ring around the rim of the glans when they have their foreskin retracted which helps to keep it back. My foreskin has never had this ring.

What I eventually came to conclude, and this is from my own experience and some direct non hands-on observation, is that the ability to keep the foreskin back is primarily dependent on the glans one gets. I was not born with a large mushroom or bulbous glans. The corona is not flared out as it is on some guys that I have seen in photos. That conclusion came to me in the form of noticing how my glans would expand quite a bit during sex either through masturbation or more so with intercourse. The coronal rim of the glans would expand and stay expanded for a much longer time ensuring that my foreskin couldn't roll over the coronal rim. It could stay like this for hours and yes I could even sit down and not have it roll over. It wasn't like paraphimosis but just a loose foreskin staying back because it couldn't push forward due to the wall formed by the coronal rim. Quite remarkable for me and quite enjoyable since I do enjoy the exposed glans very much when I can get it. However I do not wish to get circumcised. From time to time, my foreskin does actually also roll back on its own inside my pants, usually when I get those unexpected or expected hard-ons or semi's.

Paediatrician Makes Case For Circumcision

[Article by Peggy Spear, Knight Ridder Newspapers,
28th September 2005]

Prince Charles is, but William and Harry aren't. Jesus was, but Diego Rivera wasn't. Louis XVI wasn't, and that caused all kinds of problems with Marie Antoinette.

Circumcised, that is. And you can bet none of their parents went through the bewildering debate that faces parents today. Here, in the 21st century, the most performed surgery in America is the subject of intense controversy and debate. Some people say it's a barbaric form of mutilation, medically unnecessary and extremely painful. Others say the simple operation is a lifesaver that helps stave off serious infections and even cancer and AIDS. No matter what side of the circumcision issue you're on, chances are if you have had a baby boy, you're saying something – or at least hearing it.

“Circumcision is a very contentious subject,” says Dr. Edgar Schoen, the former head of paediatrics at Kaiser Oakland, Calif., whose new book On Circumcision is reigniting the debate about circumcision. “After all, you’re talking about a subject that transcends psychology, medicine, religion and sex. It’s not merely a simple operation.”

Schoen is an outspoken proponent of performing infant male circumcision, and his new book is full of lively historical anecdotes and modern-day medical statistics that make the decision to have the operation performed seem like a no-brainer. “Circumcision lowers the cases of urinary tract infection, cervical cancer and even AIDS,” he says. In fact, he lauds a recent report by French and South African researchers that found that male circumcision reduces by 70 percent the risk that men will contract HIV through intercourse with infected women.

Circumcision – the removal of the foreskin of the penis – became popular in the United States as a standard medical procedure around 1870. It was a way to curb many diseases, including syphilis. Some also claim that at the time it was used as a way to curb masturbation. In America, however, circumcision rates have been on the decline since 2001. The National Hospital Discharge Survey says that only 55.9 percent of infant males left the hospital circumcised in 2003 (the last year data was available). Schoen says those statistics are skewed, however, because they don’t take into account infants who have the surgery performed a few days after birth at a paediatrician’s office, or those who are circumcised in a religious ceremony.

Whatever the rate, many groups say it’s too high. “There is no medical reason to put a child through that,” says Dan Bollinger, spokesman for the International Coalition for Genital Integrity. “Quite basically, it is a human rights violation.” His and other groups, such as NOCIRC and Mothers Against Circumcision, as well as medical experts Penelope Leach, the late Dr. Benjamin Spock and Dr. Dean Edell claim that the operation is unnecessary, especially in the United States. In fact, the United States is one of the only countries that has routine circumcisions of newborn boys. Even the American Academy of Paediatrics says that the “potential medical benefits” of infant circumcision aren’t significant enough to recommend it as a routine procedure. And that alarms Schoen, who actually chaired the AAP’s task force on circumcision in the late 1980s. “Once we started looking into all the research, it supported the medical benefits of circumcision,” he said. He believes that the AAP’s lukewarm position on the procedure is “political,” since the group came out against circumcision in 1971, “and they don’t want to admit they made a mistake.”

In addition to all of the medical advantages he cites, Schoen says that there is another major reason he supports circumcision. “It’s the American way,” he says. “Eighty percent of men in America are circumcised, and parents want their sons to look like their fathers.” He says that most of the men and boys who aren’t circumcised are immigrants, children of immigrants, or from poor families who are not insured for the procedure. Cultural differences played a huge role in the debate between Oakland mom Charlotte Axton and her husband, Brett Shellhammer, when their son, Raymond, was born three months ago. Axton, from the United Kingdom, did not favour circumcision. "I feel that a baby is born the way nature intended, and I didn't want anyone cutting my child." Shellhammer, who is circumcised, disagreed, wanting his son to look like him. "Things got pretty heated, but eventually, Brett realized that my feelings about it were stronger," Axton says. "So we didn't have Raymond circumcised."

Pearly Problem

[From The Times Paediatric Consultant Column,
18th February 2006]

Q: My two-year-old son has developed three large white/yellow lumps, about the size of a currant, under his foreskin. They are not sore, although he complains sometimes when cleaning at nappy change. We visited our GP who tried to move back his foreskin and it was very tight. She said that he may need a circumcision. Is this a common problem? Is the first priority to circumcise or treat the lumps? Should we see a specialist?

A: The lumps that you describe are sometimes called penile pearls. They are simply retained skin debris that gets caught under the foreskin. They shouldn't cause your son any problems and are unlikely to be an infection risk. The problem will resolve of its own accord as his foreskin begins to retract.

It's normal for a boy's foreskin to be non-retractable at this age. It should begin to retract naturally when he is older. For many boys this happens around the age of 4, but it can be later, up to the age of 10 or 11. If you are concerned that your son needs a further review after the attempted retraction of his foreskin, ask for a referral to a paediatric surgeon.

First Time In Decades

For the first time in six decades, the Russian city of Bryansk saw a brit milah – ritual circumcision – ceremony, and not only one of them, but eight in one day. The unique event occurred in late November in the Jewish community of Bryansk, 380 kilometres southeast of Moscow. Rabbi Ze'ev Wagner, who serves communities throughout central Russia, and Evgeny Adler, a young local Jewish activist, helped arrange the octuple ceremony.

The eight circumcised males ranged from newborn babies to youth and fully-grown men. According to long-time Jewish residents of Bryansk, a member of the Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia, these were the first britot in the town since 1945.

The mohel, or ritual circumciser, was Rabbi Yeshayahu Shafit of the Brit Yosef Yitzchak organization. He has chalked up hundreds of thousands of kilometres flying to britot all over Russia. This was the first time he performed as many as eight britot in one day. Rabbi Shafit was assisted by Dr. Albert Belenkiy, an active member of the local community. Rabbi Wagner attempted to convince Dr. Belenkiy to be circumcised as well, to no avail – at first. Moved by the reactions of the ‘patients,’ however, and impressed by Dr. Shafit’s skills, the 40-year-old physician soon agreed to be circumcised himself. He ran home to bring papers proving his mother’s Jewishness, and underwent the religious procedure.

Among the other newly-circumcised Jews were the three-month-old grandson of Irina Cherniak, who founded the local ‘Hesed’ (kindness) organization in 1995, the 22-year-old grandson of a Jewish World War II veteran who regularly frequents the Bryansk Synagogue, and local students. Following the ceremony, the adult Jews put on tefillin.

The Kindest Cut Of All

[From an article by Judy Siegel-Itzkovich
in the Jerusalem Post 17th September 2005]

Complications of ritual circumcisions are rare and in most cases mild and correctable, according to a team of paediatric urologists at Rambam Medical Center in Haifa, Dana Children’s Hospital in Tel Aviv, Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer and Schneider Children’s Medical Center for Israel in Petah Tikva. The team, headed by Dr. Jacob Ben-Chaim, reached its conclusions in a recent article in the English-language Israel Medical Association Journal (IMAJ).

It looked at the case records of nearly 20,000 baby boys born within one year in the four hospitals; all of them underwent brit mila by a ritual circumciser (mohel) or surgeon in the community. Of these, 66 suffered complications that required some medical treatment, 55 of them at the hands of a mohel and 11 whose foreskin was removed by a surgeon. The overall complications rate was a very small 0.34%.

Paediatric urologists are always consulted in hospital emergency rooms when a circumcision leads to complications, the authors write. Sixteen infants suffered excessive bleeding, which was treated by pressure and dressing or suturing. Excessive foreskin (initially hidden by a pad of pre-pubic fat) was the most common complication, while four babies suffered from shortages of skin or cysts; these were treated by surgical repair with the child put under general anaesthesia.

Even though most ritual circumcisions are performed in a celebration hall in front of an audience of family and friends – in a place that is clean but not sterile like an operating room – this delicate procedure is usually without complications when performed by an experienced professional, they write. “We attribute this low rate to the fact that usually circumcision is the sole or main occupation of the mohelim,” they conclude, “and therefore, most are professional and experienced. In addition, they usually work under strict regulations; being concerned about malpractice claims, they are obliged to adhere to high standards of performance.”

We are used to factual books about circumcision, usually written to propound the case for or against. We are even used to the occasional circumcision scenario within a novel. But a whole novel about circumcision – that is something new. Yet this is the theme of An Innocent Obsession by David Catesby which is reviewed in this edition. I guess that sales will be high amongst the Acorn membership. But if you are against circumcision in general, or routine infant circumcision in particular, be warned! This book may well give you apoplexy, since for most babies it is a case, not of if, but when.

Circumcision was also the subject of an hour-long TV documentary on BBC Three earlier this year. Despite the topic, not many penises, whether of the cut or uncut variety, were on display; but at least we got to know the status of every male participant. In contrast to the novel, it is the pro-circ lobby who will have been left fulminating this time. The programme came out firmly against circumcision, other than for medical reasons. But then, this is the UK. What else would you expect?

Circumcise me?

Is it better or not to be circumcised? This was the question which motivated the hour-long circumcision programme on BBC Three earlier this year. One cavalier in his fifties (?) recruited another in his twenties to investigate the prevalence and reasons for male circumcision. Their quest led them to Jews and Moslems, doctors and prostitutes, gay and straight, women and men. And did they end up on the operating table? What do you think!

There is a serious documentary to be made about male circumcision, but this wasn't it. A good documentary presents, analyses and debates evidence, illustrated by example. This film was all anecdote. Many opinions were expressed but few were substantiated with hard facts. Women were asked their views: bizarrely we started with a 92 year old woman – “the wisest woman I know” – who preferred uncircumcised because her first husband had been uncut. Two prostitutes were phoned: one told the researcher to “Fuck off”, the other preferred the cut model as being cleaner. The questioning of a few semi-inebriated women clubbers was inconclusive. But where was the research to tell whether in general women know the difference between circumcised and uncircumcised, whether they have a preference and, if so, its basis?

An elderly and rather pompous Harley Street doctor told the two presenters that they were missing out badly by being uncut and were likely to be prey to all sorts of diseases and infections. But two young doctors, one male (uncut) and one female, only favoured circumcision when medically necessary – it was not justified as a preventative measure against, say, penile cancer which was itself vanishingly rare.

As might be expected, the Jews and Moslems interviewed saw circumcision as a religious duty, which demonstrated commitment to the faith. Interestingly, Alan Yentob who is Jewish, although his wife is not, had insisted that his son be circumcised but he now views it as an unnecessary mutilation.

The film then switched to the USA. Circumcision rates in the UK had, we were told, plummeted from 50% to 3% over the past sixty years, whereas in the States, the rate was still between 60 and 80%. Just why were Americans so keen to bin the skin? Cue more anecdotes. It's cleaner and better, we were informed. A group of cut black guys told us that “cows don't like the extra skin on a dick”. And one gay told us he was proud of his circumcised cock and he needed little encouragement to unzip – “hey guys! I'm being dared to show my penis on BBC” – and display his thick, tightly cut, tool – indeed a specimen to be proud of! Even the male sex dolls had circumcised penises – theoretically they could be custom built with foreskins but there was no demand.

Young guys in a bar in North Dakota demonstrated just how much the routine snipping of baby boys is accepted practice. All were cut – there had once been this unusual guy in the showers who was uncut, but his state was subject to some derision. All would have their sons circumcised, although none could give any positive argument in favour – “that’s just the way it is”; “cos that’s what I’ve been brought up with”; “it’s the norm around here”.

Of course, not all Americans are pro-circ. One rather frightening woman demonstrated with a tube and stocking-covered rod how the exposed coronal ridge on a circumcised man scraped on the vagina whereas the uncircumcised penis glided effortlessly in and out. Jeffrey, her husband, who spent most of his time cowering in a corner (and who could blame him!) had been cut at birth but had had his foreskin surgically restored using the scrotum, since when “sex had been dramatically different”. Perhaps fortunately, this gentleman was not asked to expose his equipment.

No programme on circumcision would be complete without a passage on restoration. In fact, given that both presenters had foreskins, they showed little empathy with those whose foreskins had been removed without consent and who felt angry or traumatised by the loss. The mechanics of apparatus such as the tug-ahoy was described but those who resorted to such means were obviously considered a little weird. And so seamlessly we joined the anti-circumcision lobby. One woman had consented to her son’s circumcision but then appeared to be horrified when she found out that this involved an operation. “They strap the babies down” – but no-one pointed out to her that a baby’s natural leg movement might prove somewhat hazardous when a sharp instrument was being applied to his genitals. A Gomco clamp was displayed and we were shown with distaste how it was used to crush and remove sensitive tissue.

Finally back to the UK and to Michael Wilks, the chair of the BMA Medical Ethics Committee – himself uncut. He condemned routine circumcision as barbaric and completely unethical. It was performed in America on dubious medical evidence as part of a multi-million dollar industry.

And so to the summing up. There was no justification for circumcision either medically or sexually. It was practised for reasons of conformity as a tribal mark or a religious or cultural membership badge. So, should the uncircumcised baby shown at the beginning be cut? Their answer was an emphatic “No”.

Perhaps they were right – but based on this programme they will never know. Why could they not have included a few statistics on the degree to which circumcision decreases the rate of urinary infections, HIV infection etc, or supplied information on the numbers of boys and men requiring circumcision for medical reasons, or presented research results about the effect, if any, of circumcision on sexual performance? There could have been some analysis and debate about the effectiveness of circumcision and whether the downsides of excising the foreskin are sufficiently compensated for by any advantages resulting from the circumcised state. The case for or against circumcision is not clear cut, as the debate over the years within the American Surgical Association has shown. But such reasoned dialectic is now sadly beyond the BBC. Let us not risk the short attention span of the viewers by showing a few graphs or propounding a few serious arguments. Bring on more circumcised dolls and penis puppetry – this is entertainment, after all.

Like Son, Like Father

My son

My son, Balazs, is 8, and he got circumcised last spring. In fact, we had known for a while that he had a tight foreskin, but as it did not block him from peeing, we hoped that he might outgrow it, so we could spare the radical solution. Since it was tight, at the advice of the pediatrician we pulled it back when bathing him just as far as we could without any particular pain, and washed just the tip of the glans. As Balazs disliked it, we did not force it too much. The pediatrician also suggested putting some cream on it, and trying to pull it back step by step. This did not help too much, but at least it did not make the situation worse.

Last spring we realized that we cannot avoid the radical solution, and the pediatrician suggested a circumcision as soon as possible. We explained it to the kid in detail, and we also drew what would happen to him. He was very worried whether his willy, the favorite toy of every young lad, would live on. We could show him that only a little of the skin will be clipped off. Then he was relieved, and said OK, he didn't mind it, just as long as his willy was spared. We assured him that we would not like him not to have one either.

The circumcision was done by a close friend of ours, who is a urologist by training, but now works as a general surgeon. He did the operation in his office, after normal office hours, on a private basis. He did the surgery in general anaesthesia, and we could drive the boy home, as we lived nearby, and the boy woke up only the next morning.

Balazs healed nicely and quite quickly. It was bad for about a week, when we had to soak it in chamomile. By the end of the second week the wound was almost fully healed. He said it was quite odd for a while to pee without his foreskin, as he could not feel it so much, but there were fewer sprinkles around. It was different, but was not bad.

I am not aware if he had any problem in school with it. I mean remarks of friends, etc. I think there were none, otherwise he would have told us. Kids of this age are not so interested in comparing their genitals. My wife told him after he was done that I liked it too and I would get it done as well. He was very pleased and asked me if it was true. After my 'yes' answer, he said that he likes it very much and that I would like it too.

My own story

One year ago, I would have not thought that I would ever be circumcised. To the best of my knowledge, in my family no one was circumcised.

My wife and I together took care of Balazs' wound, and I saw that she liked the result so much. At night, we chatted, and she herself raised the issue and asked whether I was keen on getting circumcised too, as she thought it was so beautiful. Then I asked her if she would like me to get circumcised, and without any hesitation she said, yes. I decided at once that why not, if my wife would be happy about it, as it was not a bad thing.

I went to see that friend of ours who did the circumcision for Balazs, and I told him what I wanted. He was not surprised, but pulled my leg a bit, and asked if the result was that good for Balazs. I said very seriously that yes, he had a very good result, and I also wanted to have it done. The surgery was done right that week. Though I am very pleased with the result and his work, I cannot recommend him to others, because he does not regularly do circumcisions. He did ours because he is a close friend.

The healing process was a bit more difficult for me, and it took about two months. Well, for adults, the process is slower. I have been circumcised for several months now, and I have gathered lots of experience with its use as well. We 'inaugurated' it on the 43rd day after the operation, but I had two night pollutions before it, because of not using it. When you are circumcised, you need some more stimulation and longer foreplay, but you are in full control after it, and you can finish it when you want. My dearest had a series of orgasms, so I now understand why being circumcised is different and so much better.

He who opposes circumcision does not know what he is missing. At the beginning, I was also uncertain about the end result, but I am not disappointed at all. It was worth having it done, even though it was OK beforehand, but now, after having been circumcised, it is perfect.

Wrong Baby Circumcised

[From an article by Alexandra Paul in the Brandon Sun on-line,
19th November 2005]

St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg has suspended circumcisions of newborn boys after a surgery mix-up earlier this month in which the wrong baby was circumcised. Hospital president Dr. Michel Tetreault said the hospital is still conducting an investigation into the mistake. On 8th November, the identities of two baby boys on the same ward got mixed up, resulting in doctors operating on the wrong baby, the hospital president said yesterday. The doctors removed the baby's penile foreskin – a practice performed most often for hygienic or religious purposes – before his parents had a chance to consent to the surgery. The parents were considering the operation before it happened but the mix-up pre-empted their decision. Once doctors realised they'd made a mistake, they immediately told the parents of the error, the hospital president said. "As soon as we knew, we told them everything we knew. We apologised to them and promised them there would be a full review and that they would be part of that review," Tetreault said. The parents were reported to have appreciated that acknowledgment and they are said to be co-operating with the investigation.

Book Review — An Innocent Obsession

Erotic fiction by David Catesby, Published in England by Chimera, the imprint of Pegasus Elliot MacKenzie Publishers Ltd
UK Price £7.99

You are persuaded to peruse this book if only to identify the 'innocent obsession'. The cover depicts a nubile blonde lady wearing nothing but a thigh length white overall. A stethoscope is around her neck, with its button held provocatively in her fingertips, signalling she is a medic. Behind her stands a suited, bespectacled male, looking on happily. Their cameo image is slightly blurred, being the reflection in an elliptically framed mirror. Across the mirror is the word NORWICH written in lipstick capitals.

Perhaps you have to be of a certain age to appreciate that acronym. This reviewer certainly remembers it as an inscription often seen on the back of envelopes which were posted to wives and girlfriends by conscripted UK military. Read the book if you need further enlightenment.

Here is a short erotic fiction novel written by and in the time of a wartime baby boomer. Today, the author, David Catesby, is a retired professional man, a chartered accountant, with some very precise medical knowledge of a particular procedure. Although he doesn't exactly confirm it, that procedure was presumably performed on him as an infant, much to the delight and appreciation of his late wife.

Prefacing his fiction with fact, we learn that the author was very happily married to Kate until her death in an accident ended their loving relationship all too early. When grief subsided enough for David to look through Kate Catesby's wardrobe, he found a file of nursing college notes from his wife's days in training on the wards. There was also her diary of their monogamous courtship, marriage, and subsequent parenthood. Those writings, for which Kate had a gift, were the inspiration for this unusual book – a one off we gather, which has more than one purpose.

Do you know what an acuculphiliac is? No neither did I. It's hard to spell and even harder to say after a couple of drinks, but this book will inform you. In his excellent introduction, we discover as the widowed author did, that his dear wife Kate was one. Her disposition dominates the story you may care to read. Just where the legacy of fact from Kate's papers ends, and David's fantasy and mission begins, only he knows.

Growing up contemporaneously with him, I can vouch for its authenticity. A long, largely italicised chapter, records Kate's conversations with nursing colleagues on a particular subject. These pretty much match those my own wife reported from her days with office girly friends; same time, same topic. Events, opinions, attitudes, described do not stretch credulity. Then, unlike today, the 'obsession' wouldn't really be considered an obsession, except if that was the only thing that mattered in their lives, which of course in the book it is.

Britain from 1940-1960 was very different from today. We were shocked then to be told that at least a third of all brides before the altar had already lost their virginity. The corollary being that two thirds saved themselves for their wedding night. Before teenage magazines, computers and mobile texting, there were fewer preoccupations for growing girls other than helping mum. Today's girls live in worlds of their own, virtually eclipsing homemaking. Yesterday's girls learned more of childcare from their mothers. Like Kate in this novel, they were involved in bathing and changing their younger siblings. In the case of brothers, opportunities for mother to daughter male anatomy lessons were not lost. Kate Catesby had even more from her mother, a theatre nurse, who moulded her daughter's opinions on the book's subject matter as firmly as she had formed her own.

There are two parallel debates eternal at least for the last fifty years. One is the headline grabbing topic of abortion; concerned with cutting short a life in the womb. The other is male circumcision; cutting short a foreskin soon after its owner has left the womb.

Both arouse impassioned argument and fanaticism, but the latter is lower media copy. Strangely so in an age when every intimate detail of sexuality can be well ventilated. To mention one's circumcision status or ask about someone else's, is, even now, hedged with jokey embarrassment in mixed company. For most, it remains a frontier of personal disclosure not easily breached.

In this climate, ignorance has flourished. Something which cannot be discussed cannot be evaluated, and the opponents of circumcision have seized their assault platform. As David points out, they have been fortuitously assisted by the bean counters of the National Health Service whose short term cost cutting has resulted in far less foreskin cutting. Thus, in recent generations, circumcised boys have become something of a curiosity, if not an endangered species. However, as with other time honoured and proven treatments, the benefits of circumcision are on the threshold of rediscovery. The fact that recent research is running along the Damascus Road is encouraging to proponents.

As anti-circumcisionists start to write even more dismissively, exasperated enthusiasts wonder what they can do to counteract their influence. A few respected doctors have published good books aimed at educating parents and blowing the myths which currently prevail in the fashionable 'collective wisdom' that circumcision is a procedure past its time.

David Catesby is set to line up with the pro-circumcision doctors. He feels he too has a book of circumcision advocacy in him. But, not being a medical man, his credibility would be suspect. However, his late wife was a trained nurse, who often assisted professionally with this procedure, and as a mother arranged the circumcision of their infant son. Her hitherto unshared writings are a personal outlet for her intense conviction that circumcision benefits males and their female partners in health, hygiene and sexual eroticism.

His only regret was that Kate died before she had a chance to share her thoughts with him, as she had one day planned. Realising they were kindred spirits in their wish to see the current UK thinking on circumcision reversed and recommended, David has seized an opportunity to evangelise and create a memorial to Kate, both of which she would have approved.

Will it succeed? To write over 170 pages of fairly repetitive scenes on a very restricted theme is a brave attempt. As a circumcisee and advocate myself I'm not sure an erotic novel is the best vehicle to further its routine re-adoption. Too far into fetish territory some will say. Obsessive will be the verdict of others. But then the title tells you that, in all innocence.

Support Grows for Ban on Male Circumcision

from U.S. Newswire, 6th February 2006

John Soemer from New Jersey remembers the moment when he learned that a part of his penis was missing as if it were yesterday. "I am now 61 years old, but I was in fifth grade when I first found out I was circumcised," recalled Soemer. "I had seen an intact friend's penis when he relieved himself while we were out fishing, and when I asked him why his looked so different, he told me what had been done to me. Back then neither one of us knew the proper name for any of those parts, so he called his foreskin his 'funskin'. That gave me enough of an idea that I was missing out on something, and left me feeling very cheated."

John is not the only circumcised man who feels that he was robbed of his right to an intact body. While thousands of men are taking up foreskin restoration to reverse some of their circumcision damage, others are working with human rights groups to stop circumcision from being forced onto infants and children. Today, John and a group of activists from fifteen states joined this movement when they participated in the Third Annual USA MGM (Male Genital Mutilation) Bill Submission. Together they submitted letters and bill proposals via fax, email, postal mail, and hand delivery to more than 2,700 federal and state legislators in a single day – up from 660 legislators the year before. The proposed legislation, written by San Diego based MGMBill.org, would make current U.S. female genital mutilation laws gender neutral so that boys are legally protected from circumcision the same way that girls are protected.

Matthew Hess, President of MGMbill.org, said that infant circumcision is sexual assault. “Male circumcision permanently damages male sexual function, and it is done forcefully, without the consent of the child. Just as cutting off any part of a baby girl’s genital anatomy would be considered a criminal act, amputation of a boy’s foreskin for medically unnecessary reasons should be treated as a crime of equal stature. If a fully informed adult wants to undergo circumcision for cosmetic, religious, or other personal reasons, then that is a decision he can make after he turns eighteen.”

Chaz Antonelli of Quincy, Massachusetts, took a day off from work to hand out copies of the MGM Bill proposal to legislators at the State House in Boston. Like most American men born in the 1960’s, Chaz was routinely circumcised as an infant in a hospital. “As a newborn baby, I could not protect myself from being circumcised,” said Chaz. “While I support an adult’s right to alter his or her own genitals if that is their preference, forcing circumcision onto a helpless child is a clear human rights violation. I’m here today because I want Massachusetts to be the first U.S. state to ban routine infant male circumcision.”

Male circumcision legislation is also becoming a topic of discussion in several European parliaments. Sweden became the first developed country in modern times to regulate and restrict male circumcision on human rights grounds in 2001, and in 2003 the Denmark National Council for Children called on law-makers to ban the practice for the benefit of the children. In 2004, well-known Dutch Member of Parliament Ayaan Hirsi Ali called on fellow legislators to enact a similar ban, and she recently stated on a Dutch television documentary that male circumcision is “a form of mutilation” and that “the consequences can be worse for boys than for girls” when compared to some common types of female circumcision.

In addition to all 540 members of Congress, state legislatures that received MGM Bill proposals from their local residents today included California, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Utah and Virginia.

More On SenSlip

Well, it had to happen. The plethora of modern materials and the means to combine, mould and fashion them, gives birth to the artificial foreskin. What a brilliant idea – and I write that as a happily and fully circumcised man, for whom foreskins have not the slightest appeal. No, the good news is; we now have something to silence all those who continually bemoan the fact that they are ‘no choice, circumcised’.

Let’s wish the device every success and good luck to those buying it. Surely this is a situation in which every customer is guaranteed their money’s worth? If it delights and comforts them, and restores their self-esteem, and gives them the look and feel for which they’ve always yearned, then it’s going to be well worth the expense. Conversely, wearing it might well serve to convince some that foreskins are not, after all, the 'must have' they'd imagined. When the maintenance routine eclipses the novelty, they may remember the adage; 'a thing of beauty is a joy for a fortnight'. Any negative evaluation could then ignite a man's gratitude towards his parents for having him cut. If it only does that, it will have been well worth the outlay.

Yes, I have one or two questions like; what is your partner going to make of it? – "Do you want it 'wiv' or 'wivart', tonight, dear?" The financial projection for lifetime use is a bit daunting, but then it may prove quite durable and economical if you pay careful attention to the washing instructions.

"But it's not the real thing!" I hear some say. Ah, therein lies the bonus. It's not going to become phimosed or infected or bleed if it splits. It can be removed in a moment without pain or expense, and reinstated when you are in the mood.

As someone with valued black friends, I find it disappointing that they didn't launch the darker versions simultaneously. The manufacturer's rush to market justifies the claim that ethnic minorities are always an afterthought and don't receive equal consideration. On this point, surely the maker's market research would have told that their potential sales would be greater in some darker skinned male communities. Far more of them are cut, as a percentage of their ethnic group, than those amongst whites.

Even more amazing is to read that the company is located in Wiltshire. Presumably English then? One would have thought this need would have been spotted and exploited by an American manufacturer in the very land of lost foreskins.

SenSlip Resurfaces

In the last edition, C.P. told of his vain attempts to contact the manufacturers of SenSlip at their advertised premises in Wiltshire. He now writes as follows: "I have managed to contact Viafin Atlas in Salisbury regarding SenSlip for the circumcised penis. They are sending me their information pack shortly so I will pass on any information that I may receive. Their new number is 01722 411625".

The American Way

The latest Acorn newsletter (issue 1/2006) had several pieces that interested me, especially the Editor's column The Fate of the Frenulum. I have said before that I favour 'loose' or 'low' cuts with the frenulum (or should I say the frenular remnant) left. In fact, I sometimes feel a silent pity for those of my brethren who have had extremely tight or 'high' circumcisions, with complete removal of the frenulum. Dr J.L.M., the physician who delivered (and circumcised) me and my two brothers, began practising in the mid-1930s and was very much pro-circumcision. I don't know what technique(s) he used, but he generally produced neat looking clip jobs, with a noticeable scar and some loose penile skin. And during my school years I was able to observe a good many boys that Dr M. had 'amended'.

I believe (under correction) that frenulectomies are fairly common in Brazil. And, although Latin America is generally uncut, there are some exceptions and some 'pockets' where circumcision is commonly practised. One of these pockets is among middle and upper class families in Mexico City, and another (I believe) is among similar families in Sao Paulo, Brazil.

The views of Dr Edgar Schoen are interesting and, to me, congenial. His favouring circumcision, because among other reasons "it's the American way", will no doubt exasperate or infuriate the anti-cut crowd, and will annoy many politically correct, right-thinking people; but it makes sense; and it is shared (albeit silently) by many men and women in this country...

Medical Blunders by Robert Youngson and Ian Schott weighs in – intelligently and moderately – on the anti-cut side of the circumcision 'debate'. Dr Youngson has also written Scientific Blunders.

Lawrence's Penis Pain

Funnyman Martin Lawrence waited until he was seven until he was circumcised, because he spent his early childhood in Germany and his parents didn't trust local medics. The Big Momma's House star grew up in Germany, but had to wait until he moved to America before the circumcision – which is normally carried out at birth – was performed.

He says, "I guess we didn't trust the Germans with the knife. I had it done in America, just past the second grade. They had to get that extra meat off so I wouldn't be getting lint and particles up in there. I remember afterward I looked down and I wasn't as well-endowed. I went around showing the nurses."

Holocaust Era Survivor's Son Circumcised At Age 61

[From Israel National News 14th December 2005]

In Miami, a 61-year-old University professor whose mother raised him as a non-Jew has undergone a circumcision after discovering he is Jewish. His mother fled to the 'partisans' who fought the Nazis during World War II, and she then raised her son in Greece.

She named him 'Stephen' and refused to circumcise him in order that he would not know his religious heritage. The professor, having learned his true identity, asked to undergo the circumcision ceremony because he said he did not want to die as a non-Jew. After the circumcision, the professor also experienced the 'redemption of the first born' and a bar mitzvah, followed by a festive meal where he declared he is starting to observe the Sabbath and Jewish dietary laws.

No Longer Routine – Circumcision Rates Decline Nationally, Albeit More Slowly In Midwest

[From an article by Dennis Fiely in
The Columbus Dispatch, 15th January 2006]

For most central Ohio boys, life begins with cosmetic surgery. Shortly after birth, they are restrained, anesthetised and shorn of their foreskin.

Historically, circumcision has been a routine procedure in the United States, but the rate dipped to a 50-year low of 55.9 percent in 2003, the most recent figures available from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Nationally, the rate dropped 7.2 percent between 2001 and 2003. Health-care professionals attribute the decline to the lack of medical reasons for doing the procedure and a rise in the number of immigrants from countries where it is not performed.

In Ohio and the rest of the Midwest, the rate remains the nation's highest at 77.8 percent, although it is dropping slightly here as well. Central Ohio hospitals and paediatric practices report rates similar to the Midwest average. For example: "About 80 percent of the 1,200 boys born at Grant Medical Center each year are circumcised", said Dr. Craig W. Anderson, director of newborn medicine. "Five years ago, it was 90 percent."

Bob and Jane O'Shaughnessy chose not to circumcise their sons, who are 5 and 8. "There didn't seem to be any good reason to put our children through the discomfort and pain," said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, 33. "It seemed pointless to alter their bodies without any compelling medical benefits." Their decision was influenced by the American Academy of Pediatrics and other major medical societies that don't recommend the procedure. "I would say that all paediatricians in town go with the academy's party line: this is a cosmetic surgery. There is no medical reason to do it," said Dr. Nancy Hansen, chairwoman of Riverside Methodist Hospital's department of paediatrics.

Many families choose circumcision for cultural reasons, Columbus doctors said. "They don't want their boys to look funny in the locker room," Hansen said.

Justin and Heidi Green of Hilliard chose circumcision for their two sons, ages 3½ years and 10 months, although they concluded that the procedure is medically unimportant. "We wanted our sons to look like their dad," Mrs. Green said. Hygiene often plays a role in the decision, but "that really isn't a good reason to justify circumcision," said Dr. JoAnn Rohyans of Olentangy Pediatrics on the Northwest Side, and spokeswoman for the Ohio Chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics.

The declining national rate comes while recent research in South Africa indicates that circumcision might reduce the transmission of HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases. "Studies have shown that cultures practising circumcision are less likely to have HIV," said Dr. Michael Para, an infectious-disease specialist at Ohio State University Medical Center. "If we can say for sure that circumcision reduces the risk of HIV, then suddenly there clearly is a medical benefit."

For now, evidence is not strong enough to change medical-society policy statements. Decreases in urinary-tract infections among infants and penile cancer among adults are not significant enough to warrant the procedure, according to the American Medical Association.

Paediatricians consider circumcision to be a simple and safe surgery. The complication rate is less than 1 percent, according to the AMA. The most-common complications are adhesions, bleeding, infection and disfigurement. Seeing a picture of an infant strapped to a restraint board helped convince the O'Shaughnessys. "That was the last straw," Mrs. O'Shaughnessy said. "We were not going to have that done to our babies." Viewing an online video of the procedure troubled the Greens. "After seeing that, my husband was overwhelmingly against it," Mrs. Green said, although the couple later changed their minds.

During the past decade, the injection of numbing medication has helped ease pain and trauma. "About 75 percent of my babies sleep through it," Hansen said. Paediatricians do most central Ohio circumcisions, although obstetricians, urologists, family doctors and mohels (in the Jewish rite) can also perform them. "Parents have more knowledge and are asking more questions about it," said Anderson, of Grant Medical Center. He added that some insurers are refusing to cover the elective procedure. Medicaid, for example, has stopped paying for circumcisions in 16 States.

Bill Tulloss of the Cincinnati suburb of Evendale is lobbying Ohio to join the movement. Medicaid pays for one-third of Ohio births. "It is just crazy that Medicaid is spending taxpayer money on something that is not necessary at a time when Medicaid expenditures are bankrupting the state," said Tulloss, a retired college math professor and a member of the National Organization of Circumcision Information Resource Centers. The Ohio Medicaid program spent $4 million in federal and state money during the past three fiscal years to cover almost 62,000 circumcisions. "It's one of our smallest expenditures," said Dennis Evans, spokesman for the Department of Job and Family Services.

Dan Bollinger of West Lafayette, Ind. compiles circumcision rates from the CDC, hospital records and other sources for the International Coalition of Genital Integrity. His statistics have been cited in the Journal of the American Medical Association. "I have been showing a 1 to 2 percent annual decrease for the past 10 years, and I expect that to continue," said Bollinger, an industrial designer. "This is a steady social change that will be long-lasting."

Bollinger is not sure why the Midwest rate leads the nation. He speculated that it is related to hospital construction in developing industrial centres when circumcision was introduced in the United States during the late 19th century. While some parents can readily accept or reject circumcision, others are caught in the middle. "It was a big decision for us to make," Mrs. Green said. "We did a lot of research trying to figure out what to do. We didn't want to make the wrong decision because we knew it would have a lifelong effect."

What Is Normal?

[From the Sex Column of the Bard Observer, an undergraduate publication of Bard College]

Question: I constantly hear that the foreskin of the uncircumcised penis is supposed to slide down. However, personally this doesn't happen whatsoever, and when my girlfriend told me it was normal for it to do so, (and tried to make it so) it was incredibly painful. Also, after sex the foreskin will break and scab up. Is there anyway to prevent that?

Advice: The foreskin can get inflamed and swollen from smegma that collects inside the top of the penis under the foreskin and is not cleaned out because bacteria can collect and grow there. This can make the skin sensitive and cause it to be painful and to crack and scab up when the foreskin is disturbed by sex. When you are in the shower or bath gently pull back the foreskin and gently wash the head of the penis with soap and water. Rinse it thoroughly and when you get out of the shower dry it completely so the bacteria cannot grow. If this is the problem, then your penis will be less sensitive and stop cracking. Keep in mind that if the skin is inflamed it will be sensitive when you wash it and may burn. After the bacteria has been removed and your penis has a chance to heal it should be fine.

Some men do have tight foreskins that do not peel back easily. This is normal and would contribute to a painful situation if pulled back forcefully. Sometimes, this is called 'phimosis'. Tell your girlfriend that not all foreskins peel back and that she should not force them.

Using a condom with a bit of lube inside might really help you have a smoother and less painful sexual experience. One lube called 'Liquid Silk' has a built in skin conditioner and may help with the elasticity of the skin. But you should talk to a doctor if the pain persists.

Probe On Post-mortem Bungle

After a two-year struggle and the trauma of receiving the wrong autopsy results, Kim McCall has won the battle for an inquest into the death of her brother Wayne Brown. She initially received the wrong report after Mr Brown died in the back of an ambulance at Sydney's Concord Hospital on December 16, 2003. Ms McCall received an autopsy report that said her brother had died of a drug overdose – she had been given the results for another Wayne Brown. The real autopsy report seemed to have her brother's height wrong and said, incorrectly, that he had not been circumcised.

Editorial

It is a fact that Society meetings are not particularly well attended. Why? Are they in the wrong place, at the wrong time, focusing on the wrong topics? Or are most members happy engaging with the Society just via the newsletter? And what of the newsletter itself? Which are the articles which members enjoy, and which do they find uninteresting? What sorts of material do they want more of and what sorts less?

Currently we can only guess at the answers. So at the last meeting, it was decided that a survey of members should be carried out. Included with this newsletter, you will find two questionnaires. The first is focused on meetings and the Society generally. The second is specific to the newsletter. Please please fill these in and return them. It will take only a few minutes of your time and the results will be invaluable in determining the future direction of the Society.

In the midst of World Cup fever, I couldn't resist the story (page 15) of the Kenyan football match where one team did not turn up because the players were afraid they would be circumcised. I doubt that such hazards face the teams now congregated in Germany!

A Defect of Nature

When it comes to anatomical engineering, the foreskin is a superb artefact. Its primary function is to cover the sensitive glans, protecting it and keeping it moist. Yet the cover can be easily inverted for hygiene purposes; and the frenular attachment, the pièce de résistance, is precisely designed to bring about automatic exposure of the glans during sexual intercourse. Nature has certainly ensured that the human male body, in an area critical to the propagation of the species, has evolved to perform in an ideal way.

But, as in all production lines, not all models conform with the design. Defects occur. For many males, the foreskin just does not retract in the way that nature intended. They are suffering from phimosis – the inability to retract the foreskin and fully expose the glans.

Phimosis has two main causes – adhesions and narrowness of the foreskin opening. Adhesions are not acknowledged by many as a true cause of phimosis, but they certainly merit discussion. The development of the foreskin is not necessarily complete when a baby boy is born. The foreskin is often still fused with the glans at several points. The foreskin is stuck so that it cannot be retracted. This is a natural phenomenon and the majority of foreskins, left to their own devices, will gradually separate from the glans so that, over the course of time, the foreskin can be drawn back. There is some controversy as to what constitutes a reasonable time to wait and when, if ever, there should be intervention. In times past, intervention took place early and doctors and nurses would encourage mothers to pull the foreskin back gently as far as it would go at each bath time or nappy change. If this did not bring about the desired result in a few weeks or months, the doctor or nurse would intervene either with a probe to break down the adhesions or just by wrenching the foreskin back with brute force. Of course, such intervention can cause raw patches on the glans and foreskin and there is a danger that the raw patches will fuse together again, recreating the problem. But a little petroleum jelly applied to the glans and foreskin during the healing process is usually sufficient to prevent this.

But now the fashion is against intervention. Gairdner in the late forties suggested that the foreskins of most boys would be retractable by the age of five and that intervention should not be considered until then. Today, some advise that even adhesions which persist until puberty are not a matter for concern since the growth and maturing of the penis at that stage will ensure that the adhesions finally break down.

True phimosis occurs when the diameter of the foreskin opening is narrower than the diameter of the glans at its widest point, or where a circular band of constriction makes complete retraction impossible. The presence of true phimosis in a baby can often be identified when there is a ballooning of the foreskin on micturition. If the opening is too small to allow a proper flow of urine, it is unlikely to be sufficiently wide to go over the glans. If such ballooning does not occur, and adhesions are allowed to resolve naturally, it may be difficult to identify a true case of phimosis until the boy is four or five. And of course, just because a foreskin can be retracted pre-puberty does not mean that it will be equally retractable post-puberty. Teenagers who boast a well-developed acorn may well find that their foreskin opening is now too narrow to allow their manhood to be exposed.

In issue 2/2006, under the title 'What is normal?', the advice of a sex 'expert' was reprinted: "Some men do have tight foreskins that do not peel back easily. This is normal and would contribute to a painful situation if pulled back forcefully. Sometimes, this is called 'phimosis'. Tell your girlfriend that not all foreskins peel back and that she should not force them." This advice – that phimosis in the adult male is perfectly acceptable – is surprising, and misguided. An unretractable foreskin in an adult is unhygienic – smegma and urine remnants just cannot be washed away – resulting almost certainly in an unpleasant odour, irritation and possibly infection. Cancer of the penis is rare but a phimotic foreskin is often the underlying cause. A further downside is that lack of exposure of the glans during intercourse or masturbation is likely to reduce the man's pleasure considerably.

If true phimosis is present, what is the solution? Circumcision was and, more often than not, still is the favoured remedy. Theoretically, it might be possible to perform a partial circumcision and just remove the tip of the foreskin. However, a surgeon is likely to be concerned that, if the foreskin tapers too much, or if too much scarring occurs as the new opening heals, the phimosis may still be present. It is therefore usual for a full circumcision to be performed. If the foreskin is no longer there, it cannot cause any more trouble!

But for some, removal of the foreskin is too drastic a solution. We should perhaps pass quickly over Dr Michel Beauge whose therapeutic procedures are based on teaching the patient a correct masturbatory technique to stretch the foreskin. Setting aside the doubtful ethics of training pubescent boys in such matters, the technique itself would appear to risk paraphimosis, which is where a tight foreskin does at last retract behind the glans but immediately forms an over-tight collar around the sulcus with a consequent restriction of the blood flow and swelling of the glans. Such patients usually end up in Accident and Emergency.

Nevertheless, there are advocates of stretching to cure phimosis. First the foreskin is lubricated. The tip of the foreskin is then held between the thumb and forefinger of each hand and is pulled as far away from the body as possible so that the foreskin is stretched and under tension. This position is held for 30 - 60 seconds. The foreskin is then grasped at a point on the shaft just below the corona of the glans and is pulled hard towards the body so that the foreskin opening is stretched tightly over the tip of the glans. This position is also held for 30 - 60 seconds. The two exercises are repeated for several minutes a session, with two or three sessions of exercises each day. When the foreskin opening is large enough, a finger or thumb can be inserted and the foreskin pulled laterally tight against the finger until it is white with stretching. In due course, it should be possible to insert two or more fingers. The fingers tips are then pulled apart, thus stretching the opening still further. If no significant progress is made, steroid creams can be used. The cream is massaged into the tight part of the foreskin inside and outside, prior to the stretching procedure.

There is some disagreement about the effectiveness of this treatment. It certainly works in some patients where the phimosis is mild. However, there is a danger that stretching will tear the skin and that the resulting scarring will actually exacerbate the problem. There is also the possibility that a boy whose foreskin is stretched sufficiently to accommodate his glans pre-puberty will nevertheless revert to a phimotic state at puberty.

If a boy has a phimotic foreskin, his parents – and it is usually they who will be called upon to take the decision – have to decide between circumcision and more conservative treatment. Circumcision is a small operation causing some discomfort and inconvenience for a few days – but the cure is complete and permanent. The conservative treatment is more troublesome with application of creams and stretching over an extended period, with an unknown outcome. The prize may be the retention of the foreskin. On the other hand, despite all that time and effort, the boy may still need a circumcision. One has to ask whether, if a foreskin is phimotic, its loss to circumcision is such a sacrifice. After all, it does not accord to nature's design; should it not therefore, in accordance with good quality control procedures, be consigned to the reject pile?

Male Circumcision: Time To Re-examine The Evidence

Stefan A Bailis and Daniel T Halperin argue that the benefits of circumcision exceed the risks

Male circumcision, probably the oldest surgery known, continues to be relevant, with ever increasing evidence of its benefits published regularly in leading, peer reviewed journals. Preventive circumcision in newborn baby boys has been generally shunned in the British Isles since the 1949 publication of Fate of the Foreskin by the late British doctor Douglas Gairdner, who concluded from his review of the limited evidence at the time that there was no convincing reason for neonatal circumcision and therefore advocated a conservative approach. Medical students (among other professionals) and future parents should be aware of all the benefits and risks of circumcision – especially in the period up to about 3 months of age – when it is simpler, safer, less painful, faster healing, and cheaper than at a later time.

Uncircumcised boys and men – especially infants – are at greater risk of urinary tract infections. These occur in about 2% of uncircumcised infant boys, who have 12 times the risk as their circumcised peers. Long term sequelae can include bacteraemia, pyelonephritis, renal scarring, and death. Balanoposthitis, a painful infection of the prepuce and glans penis, occurs in about 4% of all uncircumcised boys. It occurs in about 12% of uncircumcised men but in only 2% of circumcised men. Inflammatory dermatoses are three times more common in uncircumcised men. One such condition, penile lichen sclerosus et atrophicus, also known as balanitis xerotica obliterans, is implicated in certain cancers of the penis. A recent study found 8.4% of men with genital lichen sclerosus et atrophicus showed premalignant or malignant histopathological features. The condition is found almost exclusively in men not circumcised as newborns and is difficult to prevent (except through circumcision) or treat. Although it has been thought rare by some – Shankar estimated the prevalence through age 15 to be 0.6% – a large study of adults identified lichen sclerosus et atrophicus in 4-19% of all prepuces, the severity varying greatly.

The prepuce is normally adherent to the glans penis and thus unretractable at birth ('physiological phimosis'). Phimosis has been defined in various ways, leading to much confusion. Difficulty in retracting the prepuce can be caused either by adherence between the glans and the prepuce or by a tight preputial opening. We define phimosis here simply as the inability (for whatever reason) fully to retract the prepuce easily at an age when 90% of the population can normally do so – typically by age 5. Some with a previously retractable prepuce acquire phimosis later. This may be due to a slower growth rate for the prepuce compared with the rest of the penis, posthitis (inflammation of the prepuce), or development of balanitis xerotica obliterans. Whether because of persistent physiological phimosis or acquired phimosis, cross sectional studies indicate retraction difficulty in older boys and men range from 9% to 14%. Phimosis prevents adequate hygiene, which in turn increases the risk of balanoposthitis, penile cancer, and other conditions. A related condition, paraphimosis, exists when a tight prepuce is retracted but cannot be brought forward again, thus creating a dangerous tourniquet-like condition. It is impossible at birth to tell which boys will develop phimosis or paraphimosis. Circumcision eliminates the guesswork.

Penile cancer in uncircumcised men carries an approximate lifetime risk of one in 600. Men not circumcised at birth have 22 times the risk. The largest risk factor for invasive penile carcinoma is phimosis, which increases the risk 11-16 times. Tobacco use, though not as great a risk as phimosis, is also a significant, independent factor.

Human papillomavirus (HPV), especially HPV16, has been implicated in penile cancer. The rate of infection is lower in circumcised men (odds ratio 0.37). Circumcision protects not just men but also reduces the risk of cervical cancer (odds ratios 0.18 for women with high risks, 0.50 for women with intermediate risks), chlamydia (odds ratio 0.18), and herpes (odds ratio 0.45) in female partners through reduced sexual transmission of the applicable virus or bacterium. The lifetime risk of prostate cancer is one in six; uncircumcised men have twice the risk as circumcised men.

Undoubtedly the most important finding in the past 20 years is the protective effect of circumcision against HIV/AIDS, particularly in heterosexual transmission from women to men. More than 40 epidemiological studies have found that circumcision reduces the risk of HIV by anywhere from twofold to eightfold, depending on the particular study. A recent randomised clinical trial in South Africa had to be suspended early when an obvious protective effect – an approximate 60-75% HIV risk reduction – made continuing it unethical. Two other randomised trials are currently under way in Uganda and Kenya. The main mechanism for the sexual transmission of HIV is immune system cells – especially Langerhans cells – which are highly concentrated in the inner preputial mucosa. In addition to HIV/AIDS, circumcision is effective against some other sexually transmitted infections, especially ulcerative types such as syphilis and chancroid; and new data from Uganda show that circumcision may also reduce transmission of HIV (and some other infections) from infected men to their female partners.

Current, well established techniques for newborns would include the use of one of several clamps – the Gomco, Plastibell, or Mogen – in the hands of a well trained operator. The clamps make sutures unnecessary and, although different in design, they help to maximise skin removal accuracy while minimising bleeding. Each clamp has its advantages and disadvantages. It is imperative to avoid electric cutting methods in conjunction with metal clamps as penile necrosis may result. Local anaesthetic methods such as the dorsal penile nerve block or ring block methods with lidocaine (lignocaine) provide good effect about 80% of the time. A very sweet, sucrose coated pacifier or gauze provides additional antinociception. Unlike Gairdner's time in the 1940s when general anaesthesia – then the norm – resulted in about 16 deaths annually, no deaths or serious complications have resulted from these local anaesthetic methods. Crucial to minimising complications is inspection for congenital anomalies such as hypospadias, which require postponement of the circumcision and referral to a paediatric urologist. Of equal importance is adequate aftercare instructions to the parents during the first week or so. Healing is rapid; seven to 10 days is typical.

The complication rate for neonatal circumcision using current techniques is 2-3%, nearly all of which are minor complications, most commonly excessive bleeding that can be staunched by pressure or other topical means, or local infection that can be treated easily. One in 500 cases may be expected to experience a more serious complication, such as bleeding requiring sutures, systemic infection, excess skin removal, etc. Most are successfully corrected. Deaths as a result of the surgery itself are extremely rare. From an economic standpoint, a large health maintenance organisation study found that it has neutral or even positive cost effectiveness.

A common criticism by anti-circumcision activists is that circumcision is sexually harmful. Most evidence implies otherwise. Circumcised men seem to have fewer sexual problems overall. In addition, sexual functioning and sensitivity are generally similar in both circumcised and uncircumcised men. Only a few methodologically sound studies of female preferences have been conducted. In all of them to date, such as studies conducted in Botswana, Kenya, and the US, most women – including those who had an uncircumcised partner and were familiar with both types – preferred the circumcised penis. Sexual hygiene was the most important factor cited. Some critics argue that circumcision is a form of mutilation that causes hidden trauma, which may in turn lead to a higher risk of post-traumatic stress disorder, rape, suicide, and even warfare, among other consequences. There are, however, no scientific studies to support such allegations.

Other critics argue that circumcision is done mainly for social, cultural and religious reasons. We believe that, although it is true that parents often choose circumcision for their infant son primarily on a social, cultural or religious basis, this in no way diminishes the value of circumcision as a preventive health measure. Moreover, some people are opposed to circumcision on a more philosophical basis – nature makes no mistakes – whereas others disagree, reasoning that the natural form is imperfect and that circumcision improves on nature. These philosophical arguments go back to the second century debate between the Roman governor of Palestine, Tinneius Rufus, and Rabbi Akiba ben Joseph. Notwithstanding the primacy of such non-medical, cultural, or philosophical reasons for their circumcision decision making, we believe that doctors should help parents familiarise themselves with the procedure, with the empirically demonstrated medical benefits and risks. This should be standard clinical practice.

Circumcision will continue to be a controversial subject. However, our review of the evidence shows that the benefits exceed the risks. Circumcision, when performed in the newborn period by a skilled operator using current, well established techniques (including effective local anaesthesia), produces lifelong benefits with low risk and minimal pain. We implore full disclosure of such information to prospective parents, in an impartial manner, as well as discussion of alternative approaches.

An Innocent Obsession – A Comment

This book is about circumcision and mainly from the female point of view. Lots of opinions on why male babies should be circumcised with the emphasis on male hygiene before aesthetics or appearance. Not particularly well written, nor does it deal with the female responsibilities on genital hygiene. It gives a very strong impression that only the penis carries infections. It neglects a woman's responsibilities to keep herself clean and free from vaginal odour. Circumcision serves to protect men from women as well as the other way round. There are more bacteria around the female genital area than anywhere else on the human body. This should be remembered by those like myself who are members of the pro circ fraternity. My re-circ is scheduled for later in the year.

Literary Extract – An Innocent Obsession

[In the last issue, we published a review of the book An Innocent Obsession. Here is an extract. The scene is a discussion between nurses on the maternity wing of a hospital.]

Pauline's husband had suffered an injury to his penis after they married. (Here Patricia, Marianne and I giggled, driving an indignant Pauline to deny that she had any part in his accident which resulted from an unfortunate encounter with a zip fastener.) As his foreskin had been torn, treatment for the injury was a circumcision. She thought that the circumcision had enhanced his qualities as a lover – he seemed to last longer before climaxing and that had helped her to attain orgasm more frequently post-op than pre-op – but there were improvements also in hygiene and appearance. Now he had a penis which was easier to keep clean. Gone was the elephant trunk like foreskin which had spoiled the pleasure she would otherwise have had in fellating him – something, however, she had done for his sake even though she did not enjoy retracting his foreskin and taking into her mouth a penis head which had lived in a perpetually moist environment under its hood. Its new look and flavour were so much better, and so was its appearance of always being ready for action. She much preferred it post-op. Actually, from her earliest days of training as a nurse she had liked the appearance of a circumcised organ better and on her wedding night when she had at last been able to satisfy her curiosity about her groom's status by actual inspection she had been mildly disappointed to find him intact. When (in pre-NHS days) they had a baby son she made sure he was among the 20% or so, mostly middle class, male infants circumcised before they left the hospital. Her husband was in total agreement and in arranging her baby's circumcision, she received good support from the ward staff, several of whom told her that they had had their sons done or planned to do so if they ever had boy babies. She had herself assisted the registrar who circumcised her baby at several circumcisions while she had been working in the maternity dept before her baby's birth, knew him to be particularly competent and she had asked him to perform the op himself. He had done an excellent job on her son. A nurse, who was a personal friend and a long time colleague of Pauline's, assisted the registrar at the circumcision. She collected Pauline's baby from her for his circumcision and later when she returned him to her after his short absence from the ward told her that when she had a little boy of her own she hoped that his circumcision would be as skilfully performed and as neat as Pauline's baby. Pauline said that she was very happy that both her husband and her son had been circumcised: if she had had another son he would have been done too – preferably by the same registrar.

Patricia said that the first man she had been intimate with had not been circumcised and she had been “absolutely fascinated” by the visually dramatic process of his erection – how his penis had become larger and larger and how as it grew the foreskin retracted itself to reveal the glans until she was confronted by what appeared to her as a teenager to be a massive throbbing truncheon with a large acorn shaped head.

Maybe it was vanity on her part but as a woman she thought that, even without her touching him, her mere proximity to a man could set in motion a process by which a small soft sausage-like structure with its end covered in skin could so dramatically enlarge itself, divest itself of its skin covering and metamorphose into a rampant battering ram specifically designed for entering her vagina thrilled her. Later she found that she experienced great pleasure in taking his flaccid penis in her hand and gently pulling the fleshy foreskin back to reveal the pink glans it concealed. She admitted that she was addicted to intact penises. Her first lover had been fastidious about cleanliness and she had never had any problems fellating him, only pleasure. Vaginal intercourse had been very satisfying and he could control the timing of his orgasm so that she could be sure of attaining her climax.

She said that if she had a son, she would be in a “real quandary” over circumcision. Although as a woman her own sexual preference was for an uncircumcised lover, she admitted that as a nurse she found the health and hygiene arguments in favour of circumcision “rather” compelling.

Marianne, at 30 younger than the other two, had very forthright views. She had experience of both circumcised and intact lovers and, other things being equal, much preferred the shorn variety. She thought the hooded kind looked “ugly, wrinkled and plain untidy”. When a penis had been circumcised properly – and she laid great emphasis on the skill and competence of the operator – it was more hygienic, looked better and, to her this was important, looked ready to make love to her even when it wasn’t erect. Whether as a nurse or a bed mate, she didn’t like an uncircumcised penis. She didn’t like having to retract something which she thought shouldn’t be there anyway. However carefully and frequently the owner washed himself, the glans underneath would be moist, possibly even slimy, and a prepuce was an ideal hiding place for debris. Although Marianne enjoyed fellating a man who had had a full circumcision with the glans permanently laid bare, she had found going down on an intact man much less pleasant and on occasion downright unthinkable. She would much prefer to marry a circumcised man, but if she fell in love with a man who hadn’t been done she would marry him although she wouldn’t promise not to try to persuade him to have the snip before, or even after, she got him to the altar. Besides, wouldn’t it be great to be able to boast to her closest friends that she had a husband who had proved his love for her by being circumcised at her request?

Frenulum Loss Is A Gain

Many thanks for the article on the frenulum (Editor’s column, issue 1/2006). Whether to keep it or whether to lose it is obviously a very personal decision; I chose to lose mine and have had great pleasure from its loss.

When I was cut I asked for a very thorough circumcision. This involved removing the frenulum. I explained that I did not want to return in ten years time for a revision (I am in my 60s). The surgeon did an excellent job.

What I did not expect was how much enjoyment I would gain from being circumcised. Once my glans had dried out (this took a couple of months, and you can’t get this sensation by taping your foreskin back for a couple of days) the sensations have been great. There is a lot of debate as to whether circumcision will deprive you of a lot of sensations by removing lots of nerve endings or whether it will leave you oversensitive. In my case the balance is just right. I never had a sensitive foreskin or frenulum, so don’t regret their loss. My glans is sensitive again but as the article points out, the V at the back of the sulcus is also very sensitive. I do not have a circumcision scar but where my frenulum was removed is extra sensitive, hence the pleasure. This is a bonus.

As is said in the article, all this is anecdotal; we don’t even know how many men are circumcised so we have to go with anecdotal evidence.

Some Cutting Remarks On Circumcision

An article by Devon M. Wiesend from the UWM Post

For the purpose of getting laid, it is extremely important to be aesthetically pleasing to your partner. This becomes a whole new topic when being 'attractive' demands surgery.

Foreskin, no? Most likely, you or your partner is circumcised. I have discussed this topic with quite a few of my girlfriends, and the results are shocking. None of my friends has ever seen an uncircumcised penis. It is the norm in America for parents to have their sons circumcised when they are newborns. This means that most women will never see a natural penis unless they see it on their newborn sons before they decide it's 'unsanitary' and have some skin sliced off.

I slept with a Bulgarian guy a couple of times a few years ago. Boy was he hot. Anyway, I will admit when we got undressed I was a little surprised that he wasn't circumcised, as I had never seen an unaltered penis before. I didn't even try to play it off, as I have always been brutally honest. I told him this was my first experience with this version and that it would take a minute for me to get used to it. The question in my mind is why should anyone have to 'get used to' the way any body part is naturally made? I quickly learned what was OK, what things I couldn't do, and to be honest, it was quite pleasurable once I got the hang of it.

Many American-written books on anatomy portray circumcised male genitals, and that just perpetuates the fear women have of encountering the all-natural male genitalia. Not only have most women never seen foreskin in person, many have never even seen pictures. It's not scary, it's real. This problem is continued through generations by parents fearing ridicule for their sons. I have a hard time with this, as I think that anyone who would chastise another's naked body should never have the privilege of seeing one. I have discussed this with my male friends, and they believe in circumcision as well.

Sometimes, people are misinformed enough to believe that circumcising a newborn is more sanitary. This is not true, as all body parts need to be kept clean and can be with regular bathing. Other people think of sending their son into the gym locker room unprepared and different than his classmates. Aren't differences what make each one of us special? Kids can be cruel, but they will be cruel no matter what a parent does.

Dating can be very difficult for men who are uncircumcised, as no man wants his date to be horrified when he drops his pants. Again, if someone is disgusted by this, they are too shallow to bother with anyway. Dating is difficult for everyone, as everyone has a part of their body that they aren't happy with. If we all started having surgeries to perfect every part of us that was wrong, individuality would go out the window, and we would all look alike.

This expectation of circumcision is akin to an expectation of high, round, perky, fake breasts on every woman. Most women would be pissed if a man said, "Oh, wow, your breasts are real? I don't think I can do this." Between Hollywood and porn, no one remembers what a natural, healthy body looks like. This is sad. Society puts too much pressure on the 'ideal' look, whether the casualty of foreskin or pliable breast tissue. Now, I am not saying I seek out uncircumcised men, nor do I discriminate against the circumcised. In the dating market, one can't have physical expectations anymore because there is no such thing as 'perfection' in penises, breasts, faces or physiques. Accept differences – show you're unbiased by screwing someone uncircumcised today!

Ask A Silly Question...

About half a century ago, when I spent a year at sea, the accolade describing 'supreme excellence' in any sphere was "Just the donkey's dick!" Whether the phrase is still current, I do not know.

With other crew members I was dragged – I suspect quite willingly in those days of my youth – to an 'Exhibish' in a sleazy den of vice in Alexandria, northern Egypt. There, two lesbians demonstrated a range of grotesque gyrations with the 'undercarriage', almost a foot long, of a donkey that appeared to quite enjoy the stimulation.

I wondered then, and still do, at the enormous length of its penis which appeared to emerge from a quite small fleshy orifice situated between its hind legs. The equine penis is a force majeure when it comes to thinking of the ultimate 'size queen'. But my silly question, like the donkey's dick, unfolds as follows: where does it unfold from? This great appendage, when sexually aroused, appears smooth – almost polished – and I can't make up my mind whether it is 90% penile shaft, with just a relatively small terminal glans, or whether the whole thing is a mighty bell-end with the true shaft still being hidden within that fleshy little hump which denotes the sex of the creature which sports it. If one ever wished to circumcise a donkey, where would its foreskin begin?

OK, OK... Ask a silly question, expect a silly answer!

Like Son, Like Father – One Year On

[In issue 2/2006, Adam reported how his son had required a circumcision, leading to Adam himself seeking circumcision. Now he updates us one year on.]

My experience is just about one year old, but I was very surprised to have no loss of sensitivity, as it was foreshadowed by others. There is nothing like that, nor any nuisance, just a little sense of dryness, but I've got used to it 110%. I do not go to public places, so I have no clue about who likes it in Hungary these days and who does not, but I do not really care. I know what I know, and now my wife does so too, and that is absolutely in favor of being circumcised.

Last year, two classmates of Balazs also joined our club of foreskin-free. (I wonder if they go to pee together in school. Quite likely. How could they otherwise know?)

I saw a new Hungarian circumcision group. In just three days, many new boys, and some girls as well, have joined. It seems now that men finally realise that it is worth having this short term inconvenience for the beauty and unbelievable delights that circumcision brings. Now there are a lot more men with a tight foreskin who are not ashamed to turn to a doctor to make the necessary steps to have a satisfactory sexual life at last. Internet groups and forums help them by getting rid of doubts about making the unavoidable decision.

I think that every boy should be circumcised at around 11 years of age, which would make them more manly in adolescence and later in life. The age of 11 as an ideal time for circumcision is not incidental. I think that 95% of the boys get into puberty after this age. I read many writings on the net, and I came to the conclusion that at such an age, boys are intelligent enough to understand what is to be done to them and why. At that age they already have a quite developed penis, which allows the surgery to be very precisely planned and carried out. Post operative care is also easier. I remember when I was a little boy, I had to pull back my foreskin when bathing, which was very unpleasant, if not painful. Even though my son got circumcised at a younger age, for healthy boys the 11th year is the ideal one. Naturally, if there is a medical reason for it, it could be done earlier.

I have a few ideas how we could make it more popular before the general public. For example, there could be a presentation stand dealing with circumcision at youth festivals, etc. I know it would not be easy, but it might help many people. If I had known about it as a child or as a teenager, I might have had it done a lot earlier.

Bigoted Dutch MP

In the latest edition of the newsletter (issue 2/2006), you quoted the then Dutch MP Ayaan Hirsi Ali who referred to circumcision as a form of mutilation. You did not, unfortunately, point out that she is a noted anti-Islamic bigot. She wrote the script for the film for which Theo van Gogh was murdered in 2004 by Islamic militants. Because she lied her way into the Netherlands, she has now felt it necessary to stand down from Parliament and leave the country and join a right wing think tank in the USA.

J.G. – Surrey

[Editor's note: The reference appeared in the article "Support grows for ban on male circumcision" and read as follows: "In 2004, well-known Dutch Member of Parliament Ayaan Hirsi Ali called on fellow legislators to enact a similar ban, and she recently stated on a Dutch television documentary that male circumcision is 'a form of mutilation' and that 'the consequences can be worse for boys than for girls when compared to some common types of female circumcision'."]

New Member Seeks Advice

I have always liked the appearance of a circumcised penis and have fantasised about being circumcised for years. I am finally thinking that I may get it done and I want to find out as much as possible about adult circumcision. Ideally I would like to speak to others who have had similar feelings and maybe had the job done.

Some Questions For Members

I have always had a special interest in circumcision. Being born in the 1940's it has been a fascination for me to speculate and hopefully later discover who was a cavalier and who a roundhead. Based on experience I found I got it right more often than not. That was not very difficult as anyone from a middle or upper class background was almost certain to be cut. The only exceptions were those with very liberal or unconventional backgrounds whose parents were not in the least bit interested in what was normal or conventional and approached the decision in an entirely logical way, thinking: "Who cares what it is fashionable to do to little boys' willies; I don't want my son's foreskin to be painfully removed." I was one such boy, growing up as a cavalier in a roundhead society. I did not thank my parents for that. I felt left out. I was envious of my friends' neat cocks and they seemed confident in their status and flaunted it whereas we few cavaliers were embarrassed about our state.

I was a member of Acorn some 20 years ago and with each issue enjoyed a thoroughly stimulating read. After a happy marriage ended, my interest in the subject has been rekindled and I have rejoined. Sadly it is a very different group. When I rejoined, I was given a summary of the members and was depressed to see how old we all are and how few cavaliers. I was also surprised to see how many members had been cut as adults. But I think I now understand what is happening and why the membership (and the contents) has changed so much.

Any one under 40 has had little contact with circumcision. His entire peer group is intact and the only cut ones are those who have had a cock problem (which is embarrassing) or are cut for religious reasons. They have no interest in the subject and so are unlikely to join in a debate. The few under 40 members all seem to be cut, because if you are not cut there is no possible reason to be interested in the subject.

All very sad. So what can we do to make the debate more interesting. Well I wonder if those that are left can do more to contribute to an interesting newsletter. Most of us are not going to sit in front of our computer and write a long letter such as this. But we may be prepared/interested in responding to questions. Why does not the editor pose 2 or 3 questions each issue and then report back the responses in the following issue?

We could all think of some interesting questions:

- * Of your best friends, how many are cut/uncut?
- * When you meet someone, do you wonder if he is cut?
- * When you meet a gorgeous woman, do you wonder if she prefers a cut cock?
- * Has your wife/girlfriend ever mentioned circumcision?
- * What was your wife's attitude to the possible circumcision of your son?
- * If you are uncut, how often do you peel the foreskin back?
- * What is the best way to masturbate cut and uncut cocks?
- * Can you tell whether the person wanking you is used to wanking a cut or an uncut cock?

Give it a try, editor.

Anon

[Editor's note: Anon has thrown down the gauntlet and I am happy to take up his proposal. So, there is a first list of questions above – let me have your comments. And if the idea takes off, I will pose a further list of questions each issue.]

Football Penalty

A soccer team from one part of Western Kenya refused to travel to Bungoma for a Kenya National Football League match against Nzoia Sugar at the Kanduyi Stadium 10 years ago.

Why? Because it was during the circumcision period and many of the players had not been circumcised.

They feared being forced to undergo the rite that is a must among the Luhyas. Nzoia were awarded the match and urged the Kenya Football Federation to take disciplinary action against them for 'deliberately' failing to make it – and as a result 'escaping the knife'.

Circumcision Battle Lands Parents Of Eight-year-old In US Court

from a report by Agence France Presse on 18th February 2006

A clash over of their son's circumcision has landed the parents of an eight-year-old Illinois boy in a US court where there is no apparent precedent. A Cook County judge ordered the mother in the case not to have her son circumcised until the court can hear arguments from the child's father, who opposes the operation, and decide if it is in the boy's best interest.

Jews and Muslims circumcise their sons for religious reasons. But this case instead involves shifting medical and cultural preferences, which have recently become a matter of debate in the United States. The mother, 31, is a homemaker from Northbrook, Illinois. She says two doctors recommended the procedure for health reasons. But her ex-husband, 49, a building manager in Arlington Heights, Illinois, has called the procedure an 'unnecessary amputation' that could cause his son physical and emotional harm.

In the 1900s, surgical circumcision, in which the foreskin of the penis is removed usually before a newborn leaves the hospital, was the norm in the United States. But the percentage of US babies being circumcised has plunged from an estimated 90 percent in 1970 to some 60 percent now, data show. The American Academy of Pediatrics no longer recommends routine neonatal circumcision but says the decision should be left to the parents. That has added fuel to the fire where until recently there was little debate on the issue at all among the US Christian majority.

Some staunch opponents of the procedure see it as akin to female genital mutilation. They argue that the procedure is medically unnecessary and morally wrong. Still others have launched support groups for those who have been circumcised and would rather not have been; some have even pursued surgical options for restoration. Legal experts however say that there are no published US opinions to serve as precedents in this case. As such it normally would be determined based on the best interests of the child.

When the divorced parents appeared in Cook County Circuit Court, Judge Jordan Kaplan got the two sides to agree that the child would not be circumcised 'until further order of (the) court'. He also ordered them not to discuss the case with their child. Tracy Rizzo, an attorney for the mother, said the father scared the child by telling him frightening stories about what might happen if he were circumcised. The father's lawyers, John D'Arco and Alan Toback, have argued that the couple's divorce agreement provides that the father must be consulted before any non-emergency medical care.

Male circumcision is much more widespread in the United States, Canada, and the Middle East than in Asia, South America, Central America, and most of Europe.

Editorial

Many thanks to the many members who returned the questionnaires distributed with the last issue. But if your forms are still languishing at the bottom of your in-tray, it is not too late to dig them out and send them to me – we really would value your views.

By chance, two members have written in to comment about their increased confidence in appearing naked since being circumcised. From their observations, they conclude that cut men are much more willing than uncut to leave themselves uncovered. In the locker-room of my gym, in a fairly cosmopolitan area, both cut and uncut abound. I have found that it is the culture of nakedness which is important. If a few men are happy to walk around without being draped in towels, the guys who at first insist on keeping a towel around their waists even to remove shorts or put on underpants, quickly abandon this excessive modesty. They may not remain undraped for long, but they nevertheless are no longer afraid to stand naked whilst drying themselves.

So, is it the fact of being circumcised or the culture of the changing room which is important? Views please!

The Circumcision by Gyorgy Dalos — A book review

As a Hungarian Jew, there is something unusual about Robi Singer – he still has a foreskin. Why was it not removed on his eighth day as laid down by Mosaic Law? His grandmother claims that he was premature, the winter was cold and he was far too puny at birth to undergo the procedure. This of course should have been no impediment to a later snip, but his father died in his first year of life, and for reasons never made clear, his grandmother has no intention of allowing him to be circumcised – she tells stories of men being dragged under the archways of houses, of their pants being pulled down to check whether they were Jews and, if so, of them being thrown into the icy Danube. This had happened during the war, and grandmother is convinced that the war is not over.

Robi is not the only uncircumcised 12 year old Jewish boy – Gabor Blum is similarly untouched by the knife. Gabor's mother claims she repeatedly arranged for the bris to be performed, but something always came up – there was an air raid, or the weather was too cold to leave the apartment. Eventually she forgot her promise to the boy's father as he was being deported to a labour camp to have the boy circumcised at the earliest opportunity.

As half orphans, Robi and Gabor live in an orphanage during the week, returning home at weekends. And Mr Balla, their teacher at the orphanage, is now on their case. Their Bar Mitzvah will soon be due but this cannot happen until they are circumcised. If Mr Balla has his way, their foreskins are doomed.

But this is not a uni-dimensional book and circumcision is just one motif. It is teaming with characters all sharply but fondly drawn. Gizike, the illiterate occasional maidservant, who waxes the floor in return for grandmother drawing up a petition; Uncle David who always brings two pounds of dried prunes when he visits under the mistaken impression that grandmother suffers from constipation; the alcoholic Uncle Vilmos, who his wife reveals is terminally ill with liver cancer, so that there is an embarrassed silence when he enters the room; and Mrs Fleischman who is so distantly related to grandmother that at every meeting they spend so much time in discovering which long-departed uncle or aunt had once been a more or less distant relation of someone in the family, that by the time they have identified the ancestor, they have forgotten the exact relationship and have to start again.

Robi's mother is an overweight neurotic hypochondriac who has at least twenty illnesses and a whole swathe of consultants to look after her. Yet she is sympathetically drawn and when she gets a boyfriend, it remains a secret between her and Robi – Grandmother must not know. Mother causes more confusion in Robi's life by taking him to meetings of the Jewish Brotherhood for Christ; so he is not sure what he believes and when his grandmother has palpitations and seems near to death, Robi prays to both Gods just in case. And Grandmother is of course the character who holds it all together, strong, resolute, overcoming a lifetime of troubles with strength and resignation. Only once does Robi find her with tears streaming down her face: "I can't take it any more."

So the book is about Robi coming to terms with all these people, and with himself and his life. He is beset by problems. Is spending his whole weekly allowance on liquorice and winter ice cream 'sensible' as enjoined by his grandmother? Dare he reach out and take the hand of his cousin Jutka, his first unrequited love? Most important of all, should he be circumcised? Gabor has a totally different philosophy with a light hearted, fatalistic attitude to life. "You always make such a problem out of everything," he says, and dismisses the problem of circumcision with: "What's so problematic about a small piece of skin." So when the rabbinical court asks Gabor and Robi whether they are willing to submit themselves of their own free will to the circumcision, Gabor immediately answers: "Yes, sir." Robi hesitates: "I need time to think."

His grandmother eventually takes him to a doctor who orders him to pull his pants down and lie on the couch. Robi looks apprehensively at the instruments lying around but the doctor reassures him that the circumcision will not be done today – he will have to go to hospital. The doctor pulls Robi's foreskin up and down repeatedly so that an erection ensues but, as the doctor says: "The troubles begin when it doesn't do this." He touches the uncovered glans with the tip of his finger and Robi hisses. "My, my, aren't we sensitive" comments the doctor. "If you weren't a Jew, I'd still recommend the circumcision, you know. But doubly so as things stand."

So, a short book, 140 pages, but funny, wry and beautifully written. It would be well worth reading even if it wasn't on a favourite subject!

Another Tale Of Son And Father

I am a 37 year-old father of one boy (Trevor, 5 years old) and another on the way (in June) and am happy to see that there's an alternative to all the shrill, fanatical anti-circumcision stuff that's on the Internet.

I myself was not circumcised as a newborn (my parents are from Europe, where it's never been the custom), but when Trevor was born my wife allowed me to decide on that matter and I opted to have him done. Personally, I never had any health or hygienic problems as a result of being uncircumcised, but the medical benefits in regards to infections, UTIs, phimosis, penile cancer and STDs seemed so significant to me that I really couldn't think of a good reason NOT to have my own son circumcised.

Truth be told, the only major trepidation I had of having Trevor circumcised was the fact that I wasn't and that this meant we wouldn't 'match'. My wife and I aren't exactly nudists, but we have what might be considered a 'European' attitude towards the body and don't believe it promotes good body image to children to always be hiding behind towels and such. I was worried that when he would inevitably see me changing or stepping out of the shower it might cause him some confusion or problems with sexual identification. However, I'd heard of fathers who'd had their son's snipped solely to 'match' them and thought that was silly – after all, kids are smarter than we give them credit for and I didn't see why I couldn't explain that difference to him when the time came.

The procedure was done by my wife's CNM before she and the baby checked out of the birth center and it went great. I was there and watched the whole thing and it was nowhere near as gory and horrible as the anti-circumcision crowd make it out to be. It was VERY quick and he healed in a matter of days.

Anyway, when Trevor was about four years old we were sharing a bath when he finally noticed 'the difference'. I explained to him matter-of-factly why our penises looked different and thought that would be that, when he said: "I wish mine looked like yours". You can imagine my distress! Little boys, of course, idolise their fathers and always want to be like them. I responded by telling him that I actually wished mine looked like his. He seemed to accept that, but I could tell the difference still bothered him.

So I found a simple solution: I got circumcised myself! My wife and friends thought I was crazy, but I figured that if he couldn't 'match' me I could still at least 'match' him. Besides, it was something I had thought about since my teens. I had it done with a local at the urologist's office, which wasn't bad at all. It was pretty rough going for the first week, but after that pain wasn't the issue so much as having to wait two months to resume 'relations' with my wife.

Once I was completely healed, I took another bath with Trevor and he noticed the difference right away. "Oh!" he cried. "Yours looks like mine now!" I just explained to him that I wished mine looked like his and so I went to a doctor and had him snip the skin so that it would. He seemed very impressed by this and it seemed to completely dispel any issues he'd had before. He's very proud of his penis now! [Maybe a little TOO proud, if you catch my drift. :-) ]. So while I think the whole 'matching' argument seems silly on the surface, I think there are real issues there that need to be taken into consideration.

From the internet

Pride

I had always noticed in the past that cut guys were far less self conscious than uncut men. A bit after I was cut a couple of years ago I found that I was forgetting to take my towel from the showers into the locker room, or vice versa. Previously I had been careful to drape myself in it for the short journey. So maybe there is something in the observation.

Showing Off

Having read the many experiences of Acorn members over the past few years, there is a trend in attitude that is hard to ignore. The writers frequently refer to their envy of others who sport circumcised cocks. This is all well and good, but it is the perceived view of the effect that circumcision had on the objects of admiration that crops up with intriguing frequency. It is the view that those who were circumcised enjoyed their status so much that they consciously or unconsciously wanted others to admire their cocks because they were cut. Phrases like “They seemed so proud of their circumcised cocks” and “Taunting those of us who were not [circumcised]” indicate that a sense of superiority was prevalent due to their cut status. Other views of the envious relate to the fact that circumcised boys at their school were always the most popular, confident and good at sports – an attitude that often continued into adulthood. The writer frequently feels inferior due to his (then) uncut status and cannot avoid being jealous of his cut peers.

Of course this doesn't always happen, but is the apparent ease of social nudity among the circumcised brethren the case? In an earlier article of mine, I wrote that I attended an all-boys' school where swimming lessons were done completely in the nude (masters as well as boys). Whilst the circumcised boys were in the minority it always seemed to me that they frequently were not in the least embarrassed by baring all and seemed to be just that bit superior in attitude to the rest of us uncut boys. Maybe I'm sounding snobbish, but there seemed to be a definite correlation between the social status of the boys and whether they were circumcised or not. Perhaps the higher up the scale you are, the more confident and assured you felt with others, even when naked. A few of the younger masters at the school participated in swimming in the pool and as far as I can remember, they were circumcised to a man. The fact that they were probably all born in the 1930s or early 1940s makes this a not unlikely event.

Even though I am now fully circumcised (at 23), I still cannot avoid checking out the circumcision status of any man that I have the opportunity to (furtively) look over. There is without doubt a strong feeling of solidarity when I view another permanently bare knob. Not long after my circumcision, I became an enthusiastic regular at the pool of the local YMCA in the last days when it was still men only and swimming trunks were strictly forbidden. There was a notice at the entrance of the pool that stated ‘Gentlemen only beyond this point’ long after it became a mixed and (sadly) clothed facility. But back then I was quite shameless in my desire to be seen as a proud roundhead. It was clearly the case that the majority of the men in the pool were of the circumcised brigade though once again, the age of those participating must indicate that this would be very likely. But to me, it seemed obvious that the roundheads present had no problem in allowing the world to see their shorn cocks and that the uncut minority in those days seemed to be much more modest in their rush from the changing rooms to get into the water. The circumcised members seemed much more inclined to walk around the pool and sit casually on the edge in no apparent hurry to take the plunge.

Now I am not as young as I used to be, I attend the gym of a private health club in order to try and maintain some fitness. My cock watching experience reveals inevitably that the majority of the men in the changing room are uncut and that my comrades in circumcision are almost definitely going to be over 45. Again there seems to be a strong link in the attitude of nudity of the two groups. The cut (older) men have no problem undressing and walking naked to the showers whilst many of the younger, uncut, men seem to be astonishingly shy. They hurriedly wrap a towel around their waists as they walk all of three or four yards to the showers and cover up again for the return journey. The few young men who are circumcised don't seem to show any reluctance to hide their status, though the numbers are so limited that it is difficult to spot a strong trend in their case.

This is a difficult subject to discuss with other men, but others who I have broached the topic with have used expressions like 'pride', 'esteem' and 'self-respect' to indicate their delight in having a circumcised cock. And whilst they are at it, what's the harm in flaunting it a little (as long as it's legal!). There doesn't seem to be any significant difference in attitude of men routinely circumcised in infancy and those who achieved their ambition as an adult. Perhaps it's the very fact that when naked, you can show off to the world that every bit of you is bare and that your status symbol is clear for all to see. As for me, I always feel a slight thrill of satisfaction on undressing in the changing rooms, that anyone who sneaks a peek at my cock will see that I am a well-circumcised man and that I am very happy about it. You may think this smug or even a little strange, but there is nothing wrong in feeling just that bit better than the unlucky ones – and the good thing is, that it will last forever!

Loss Adjusting

You were right about the problematic prepuce! The narrative and illustrations in the Editor's Column (issue 3/2006) demonstrate that nature doesn't always get things right. Foreskin problems can indeed be distressing, even hazardous to health. But it must be remembered that the overall majority of foreskins are retractable by the 5 year old owner. By ten years of age, the troublesome element is about 1.5%. This cannot justify the widespread routine circumcision that continues in the USA, bearing in mind that almost 50% of the penile nerve endings are removed with the foreskin. In addition, the permanently exposed glans surface becomes thickened and desensitised.

Some Eastern people, notably the Japanese, retain the retracted foreskin with a string, so that eventually the glans remains permanently uncovered. 'Kawakamuri', skin covered, can cause great offence as a mark of bad taste in the communal bath, medical examination or locker room. Here is a circumcised appearance without loss of skin or nerve endings.

Jewish circumcision removes most of the outer layer, leaving most of the glans covered with inner membrane. This is torn and reflected behind the glans, retaining most of the inner layer with the sensory nerve endings. With other circumcisions which leave most of the inner membrane, the scar line is well down the penis shaft, and most of the sensory potential is saved.

My radical circumcision in 1945 entailed the removal of all foreskin and frenulum except for a thin ribbon of skin edges to suture behind the glans. Gone with the foreskin were about 1,000 nerve endings, half the erotic capability I was born with. Though it has taken almost a decade for me to restore glans cover by skin expansion techniques, I still had that nerve ending deficit. (My mother once told me that circumcision was an advantage!) Currently my glans has become more sensitive, moist and membranous with a dramatically reduced coronal flare. As I use a hair dryer on the surfaces prior to restorative tensioning each day, there is no smegmatic accumulation to offend, only a slight masculine muskiness whilst drying. Though I feel confident covered, no longer exhibiting that threateningly flared glans and ugly scar, I still have only 50% of the erotic potential. (If my foreskin had survived into adulthood, it would be 15 square inches unfolded.)

If constant glans exposure can be achieved without tissue loss, the erotic potential is unimpaired. Where surgery is necessary, the Jewish shield guided technique sacrifices only a little of the sensory capability in terms of nerve ending loss.

Though I believe that the decision to be circumcised should be by the person involved, if it has to be done in childhood, the parents should insist that, in successfully baring their son's tiny glans, the nerve ending loss should be minimal. Perhaps surgical techniques should be modified to ensure this result in every circumcision. The glans can be bared without inflicting a lifetime of sensory deprivation. This loss adjusting would be of great 'assurance'.

Balanitis And Medical Examinations

I came across this question and answer in Doctor Feelgood's advice column in Scotland on Sunday. There is certainly no reluctance on the part of this doctor to recommend circumcision.

"Q: My five-year-old son had to be prescribed cream for an infection on his penis recently, yet he bathes regularly. Why did he get this infection?"

A: This sounds like balanitis, which is an infection boys commonly get affecting the foreskin. Balanitis (not to be confused with a balalaika, which is a triangular musical instrument from Russia) often appears because the foreskin is a bit tight, so maintaining good hygiene is really important. Careful washing should be encouraged and should form part of the bedtime routine.

Any infection should always be treated promptly. A few days of applying an antibiotic cream will usually do the trick. If it recurs, and balanitis sometimes does, circumcision is often advised. This is a really straightforward little procedure for boys, and will sort out the problem."

I was interested in the recent article about the medical inspection of schoolboys and the idea that the penis should be examined from the side to check the frenulum. I met a 19 year old English guy two years ago and he told me about his school medical in York. After an examination of his testicles and penis standing facing the doctor, he had to turn sideways while the doctor retracted his foreskin – presumably to examine the frenulum.

I remain amazed that the medical care of our young men is so patchy in the UK. Young men from abroad – from Holland to Brazil – expect genital examination during school health checks and circumcision is performed if required. Even if the foreskin is easily retractable and the frenulum does not distort the penis, such examinations provide an ideal opportunity for a short illustrated lecture on the importance of penile hygiene.

Conservative Treatment Of Primary Phimosis In Adolescents

[Editor's note: Several members have asked for more details about the masturbatory method of curing phimosis which I briefly referred to in my Editor's Column 'A Defect of Nature' in the last edition. Here is a shortened version of the original paper by Michel Beaugé MD, translated by Dr J. P. Warren]

Introduction

Being in charge for over ten years of the routine examination of college freshmen as part of the preventive medicine programme of the university, I diagnose a significant number of phimoses among older children and young adults. Among this male population aged 18 to 22, we have observed that nearly 10% have various degrees of tightness of the foreskin, ranging from total inability to expose the glans to a simple ring which gets stuck in the sulcus. In this report the word phimosis is used to mean the diameter of the inferior preputial ring is smaller than the diameter of the erect glans.

The conventional treatment of phimosis is surgical: circumcision which removes the foreskin, or simple plastic surgery which preserves the fold of skin but widens the orifice. For a number of reasons I have come to reject this therapeutic procedure. Instead, remodelling of the foreskin should be considered.

Masturbatory Techniques

The study of observed cases reveals that adolescent or young adult subjects suffering from phimosis have habits of masturbation different from others. Conventionally the pursuit of solitary pleasure is done with the dominant hand closed over the penis making alternate back and forth movement over the shaft, the hand going down towards the pubis, uncovering the glans which the index finger or thumb may now and then stroke lightly, reproducing the sensation of intercourse. This exercise results in moving the penile skin in the same way as will occur in vaginal intercourse, and therefore it is a preparation for adult sexual relations.

I have established a classification of the other methods of masturbation and have often seen them among patients with phimosis.

- 1 Some boys never masturbate! We may doubt their assertions, but the tightness of their phimosis suggests their statements are correct. Ejaculation takes place during sleep (nocturnal emissions), and more rarely spontaneously while awake prompted by stimulating events, among those subjects who attach guilt to contact with the penis.
- 2 Others stroke the glans through the foreskin in the usual way, but attempt to pull the skin towards the tip of the penis instead of pulling it back toward the pubis. We find among these boys the persistence of a long tubular foreskin such as is seen in infants.
- 3 In some cases the boy rolls the penis between two palms or between one hand and another surface such as the abdomen, the thigh, a table, the edge of a chair (in particular the toilet).
- 4 Mechanical stimulation without use of the hands is perhaps found most frequently (perhaps causing less guilt). In general, the boy, flat on his face on his bed, labours as if for intercourse with the help of his pelvic musculature, and rubs his penis against the mattress, the bolster or a pillow.

The Treatment

Faced with a man suffering from phimosis, I propose:

After analysis of the patient's method of masturbation, it is necessary to explain to him the roles of masturbation during adolescence. The discussion has the advantage of removing feelings of guilt, if necessary.

Next it is advisable to instruct him on the technique that seems to be most useful, attempting thus to pull back the foreskin by exposing the tip of the glans. In fact it is only rarely possible for a boy who has developed for himself a method that leads to orgasm to replace it initially by another. Generally the new method fails to give pleasure and may even tend to impair the quality of the erection. This could explain why boys fail in their first attempts at sexual intercourse; a man who has become accustomed to rotational movements on his penis for several years will be quite unable to use this technique in the vagina. Therefore I 'prescribe' alternating a few pleasurable manipulations known to be stimulative with the remodelling manipulations. It is of course essential that the preputial opening be stretched round the circumference of the fully erect glans. This technique meets the requirements of the kinesitherapy of soft tissues, gradual stretching. In some cases I have recommended instrumental dilatation with the use of a dilator in patients who agree to this procedure, or I have advised the introduction of two fingers into the opening of the foreskin to stretch it.

It is the erect glans acting as a mould (or mandrel) which dilates (and models) the orifice. Thus the boy can progressively expand his foreskin until the diameter is equal to that of the erect glans, allowing him subsequently to proceed to sexual intercourse without risk of paraphimosis.

During the course of this remodelling there will come a time when the foreskin is sufficiently dilated to uncover the distal part of the glans but is still too tight to go over the proximal and larger part; due to the conical shape of the glans we can then imagine that a strong enough pull might succeed in sliding the ring into the sulcus, but that the reverse movement might be impossible, causing paraphimosis during masturbation. This appears to me unlikely since the manipulation is done under the visual control of the subject who is well able to detect the degree of tension in the foreskin, unlike the situation during sexual intercourse, particularly when it occurs for the first time.

Results

I recommended this treatment for 30 to 40 boys annually and therefore have observed several hundred cases. Follow-up in preventive medicine is not usual and many were not seen again. However about half did return to report a satisfactory outcome.

In a few cases patients agreed to be photographed with the foreskin stretched on the erect glans at the start, with a second photograph taken four weeks later. These demonstrate that retraction of the foreskin was achieved as a rule within this time. I did not come across any failures, but this does not mean that they did not occur since such cases may have failed to re-attend. It should be pointed out that an attempt at conservative treatment does not prevent subsequent recourse to surgery should this prove to be necessary.

Circumcision: Did You Know?

[from the weekly column of Daniel Cullen, a non-degree student in liberal studies, in The Daily Barometer.]

The debate about neonatal non-religious circumcision is over. According to the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP), neonatal circumcision is the result of ignorance, bad medical practice and American social and cultural pressure. Regarding the three most commonly cited justifications for neonatal circumcision (penile cancer, venereal disease and penile hygiene), the AAP now states that the benefits are negligible, which means that the majority of American men are walking around without foreskins for no good reason. Yet, the barbaric practice shows no sign of abating, and for this reason I plan to shed some light on the cultural dark spot of circumcision.

The U.S. stands alone as the only country in the world (including developed, developing and undeveloped countries) where neonatal nonreligious circumcision is routine for physicians and their unwitting patients. In contrast, 80 percent of the planet does not practise circumcision, and since 1870 no other country has adopted it. China, Japan, Belgium, France, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Scandinavia, Holland and Russia have never condoned the practice (except for religious purposes), and of the other countries that do practice neonatal nonreligious circumcision (Canada, Australia and Great Britain), there has been a regimented decline in circumcisions by about 10 per cent per decade in accordance with the advice of each country's own respective medical institutions.

If we take a look at the latter group of English-speaking countries, the statistics show just how wildly disproportionate the U.S. endemic is when compared with its English speaking cousins. In the second-highest-instance countries, Australia and Canada, the amount of neonatal non-religious circumcisions is estimated to be about 30 per cent, compared to Great Britain where only 1 percent of males can expect to have their foreskins cut off before they have even acquired one-word language acquisition to be able to say "No!". In the U.S., however, the number of circumcised males is estimated to be approximately 80 percent. Only in America has medical science taken a back seat in the fight for the foreskin.

As Edward Wallerstein aptly points out in Circumcision: The Uniquely American Medical Enigma, "[i]n 1971 and 1975, the American Academy of Pediatrics Task Force on Circumcision declared: '...there are no valid medical indications for circumcision in the neonatal period'." Subsequently, this decision has been endorsed by The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in 1978 and by the AAP in 1999. And yet, Wallerstein highlights that "[t]he 'firm' declarations should have caused a marked drop in the United States circumcision rate. They did not." The truth is that neonatal circumcision is deeply rooted in American culture: so much so, in fact, that many American parents actually believe they are doing their sons a service, when, in only one foul slice, the dangers of penile cancer, venereal disease and bad hygiene are purportedly quashed (along with premature ejaculation, masturbation, and general ugliness). But American parents have been grossly misguided.

The AAP affirms that the majority of reported benefits by which parents justify circumcision are groundless hearsay. Notably, penile cancer might be preventable through circumcision of the foreskin, just as the potential for most diseases is eliminable by the complete removal of the vulnerable body part – I bet I could guarantee you would never contract Hotchkiss brain disease if you let me cut your head off too – but the fact is that the foreskin is an important, healthy and irreplaceable part of a child's body, and in the absence of overwhelming medical evidence proving the link between retention of the foreskin and penile cancer, the AAP has had no choice but to disregard this cultural claim.

Furthermore, as far as the argument that circumcision reduces the risk of contracting venereal diseases goes, Wallerstein crucially highlights that 'health' circumcision originated in 19th century England, where the theory emerged that masturbation was responsible for such things as asthma, hernia, gout, kidney disease, rheumatism and even alcoholism. The Victorian aversion to all acts sexual was fertile ground for genital mutilation to take root and, since the English cultural practice stormed the U.S., beliefs about the purported benefits of the practice have barely changed, while Great Britain has become a born-again circumcision virgin. Consequently, the link proposed between any disease and the foreskin is outdated fallacy – including venereal diseases. In fact, the AAP even produced a recent report that states that circumcised men are more likely to engage in oral sex to compensate for the loss of sexual pleasure that circumcision causes, which actually increases men's chances of contracting venereal diseases.

As if that was not enough, the AAP also states that "there is little evidence to affirm the association between circumcision status and optimal penile hygiene". Consequently, parental supervision of the foreskin is a far more appropriate measure for reducing the chances of infection in a boy's penis than a radical surgical procedure, especially when the short-term effects of circumcision can include anything from changed sleeping patterns to psychological disruptions in feeding and bonding between mother and infant, profuse bleeding, subsequent infection from surgery, and even death. Moreover, the AAP recognises that circumcision causes extreme pain and trauma for infants, since circumcised infants exhibit deterioration in pain threshold as much as six months later when receiving mandatory vaccinations, while the long-term physical and psychological damage is undocumented.

In short, the idea that neonatal circumcision is the answer to all of men's ills is erroneous. Like the Jewish religious practice of circumcision, American non-religious circumcision is dependent on the acceptance of cultural beliefs, and the sad truth is that Americans hold to the norm as tenaciously as they hold to the scalpel, although they do not entirely know why because they are not being told. But American men are missing out on a world of sensation, and for what? So that the threat of penile cancer might possibly be removed, maybe. So that Victorian ignorance toward venereal disease is perpetuated, definitely. So that the possibility of penile infection is avoided by sundering one of the most sensitive parts of the male body. And so that the normal act of masturbation can be substituted for a lifetime of misspent Vaseline.

Religious circumcision is one thing, but circumcision for no good reason ... well, what is the sense of that? There is none! Removal of the foreskin is a forgivable cultural mistake, but a mistake nonetheless, and I hope that on reading these facts you will break the ghastly cycle if the choice ever becomes your own. It's about time the foreskin became sacred too.

Children In Wait For NHS Treatment

[by Helen Puttick, Health Correspondent,
Scottish Herald, 10th April 2006]

Children face longer waits for operations because of a massive backlog of religious circumcisions. Requests for the procedure represent one in 10 referrals to surgeons at the Royal Hospital for Sick Children in Yorkhill, Glasgow. Hundreds of infants are on a waiting list for the procedure, a rite for Jewish and Muslim families. Consultants fear it is becoming near impossible for them to deal with the workload, saying the queue of 400 would occupy a surgeon for a year.

There is also concern that, if the hospital abandoned the procedure, it would be done in the community by people without medical training. Every year Yorkhill is said to treat a handful of infants suffering complications after circumcisions which have been performed outside the hospital. Peter Raine, who retired as a general paediatric surgeon from Yorkhill hospital a week ago, said: "Most of us are a bit concerned that we are being less than totally clear about what we are doing. We are saying, 'Yes, we will put you on a waiting list', but thinking it can never be done. We are agreeing to something that we cannot see ourselves doing. That is quite serious. We might be storing up quite a lot of bad feeling there."

The issue has been brought to light due to a shake-up of the way waiting lists are managed. Religious circumcisions are one of a number of non-urgent procedures excluded from waiting time guarantees but this system is being scrapped from the end of next year. By then, the Scottish Executive expects waiting times for all procedures to be cut to 18 weeks. Mr Raine said: "There are so many of these (religious circumcision) cases that we would be perpetually dealing with those at the expense of medically driven cases. There is no alternative if circumcision cases are not given some sort of exclusion."

Surgeons based at Yorkhill have written to NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde about the issue and are said to be frustrated at the lack of response. Mr Raine said the paediatric surgeons did not want to encourage anyone else to do the operation. He said: "We see a handful a year where the circumcision has been done outside the hospital and the child turns up with an infection or bleeding or an unsatisfactory result. There are people whose lives have been ruined by having a badly done circumcision in childhood."

Bashir Maan, Scottish representative for the Muslim Council of Britain, said: "They have got to do something to deal with the backlog. The health board should look into this. It is not the fault of the doctors. There are obviously not enough doctors there. If they had enough staff it would not have happened in the first place. I think they should encourage people to come to the medical centres and discourage people to get it done in the community because that is dangerous."

Dr Mona Saddiqui, senior lecturer in Islamic studies at Glasgow University, said she believed that medical operations should take priority. She also questioned why GPs could not perform the procedure, saying: "If you can find a GP or a practice where it is safe and you know the doctor and they are qualified to do the operation then how is that different from taking the child to hospital? In fact, it is less traumatic." Health authorities covering the Lothians, Tayside and Grampian, which also offer the procedure, indicated that they did not have significant waiting times for religious circumcisions. A spokesman for NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde said: "This procedure is a matter of low clinical priority. However, circumcisions are still being carried out and we have increased capacity at Yorkhill to ensure any child waiting for this procedure will receive treatment by December 2006."

While members of the Jewish community believe that the procedure should be carried out shortly after birth, the Muslim community is less strict about this.

Ask The Sexpert

Dr Mahinder Watsa answers questions about foreskins and circumcision in the Mumbai Mirror

I am a 20-year-old boy. I experience a little pain during masturbation, when too much pre-seminal fluid gets collected at the urethral opening. But this pain is occasional. Kindly suggest a remedy.

Move your foreskin daily up and down to loosen it up enough to slide it back up to the base of the head of the penis.

I had a pea-sized growth on the area that connects the foreskin with the head of the penis. Doctors diagnosed it as a cyst and asked me not to worry, and I underwent a minor operation to remove the same. After the surgery, the pleasure that I experience during an orgasm as well as my sexual desire has reduced to almost half. What can I do about this?

The area that has been removed is where the most pleasure-nerves are. Try different positions to ascertain what will be most pleasurable. Try stroking more vigorously. I believe the sensation will improve with time.

I am a 17-year-old boy. It seems that I have an infection on my penis. The foreskin itches and some red rashes have appeared all over it. There is no burning sensation. The itching gets unbearable at night and also early in the morning. The itching had once healed when I applied Candi Derma cream on my foreskin, but now it has resurfaced. Please suggest some remedy to cure this problem completely.

Please do not try to be your own doctor. Consult a doctor who will be able to suggest a simple remedy to your problem. Meanwhile, apply the same cream.

I am a 27-year-old man. I will be getting married soon. How important is circumcision for a healthy and satisfying sexual life? I have had sex several times using a condom. I can easily pull my foreskin back. Is it necessary to have it done before having sex without condoms?

If you can easily slip your foreskin up and down over the head of the penis then you do not need a circumcision.

I am a 30-year-old man and will be marrying soon. I masturbate three to four times a week. My problem is that the veins on my penis show clearly and the skin on its tip does not stretch back beyond an inch. What should I do so that it does not affect my sex life?

You seem to be normal. Consult a doctor and he will clear all your doubts. You may need a circumcision.

Since the last one week I have been finding small, paper-like, pale yellow substance on the tip of my urethra. Initially, the deposit used to be less frequent. It does not hurt me, but the presence of these particles makes me very uncomfortable. Could these be kidney stones? I drink three glasses of milk every day. So, could it be excess calcium?

Send some of the deposit and a morning urine sample to a pathologist and get them tested. It is possible that it is smegma – a normal secretion that deposits under the foreskin. Do you retract your foreskin and clean it daily?

I am a 35-year-old man. I had sex a year back, which resulted in cuts on my foreskin. Ever since I have developed some white spots on my foreskin, which, I suppose, is vitiligo. Even the skin does not retract like before. What should I do?

Kindly consult a doctor. It could be more than vitiligo.

I am 21-year-old boy. In one of your replies to a query in this column, you had mentioned that it is normal if the left testicle is lower than the right one. But in my case it is the reverse. Is this normal too? Also, is it necessary that the foreskin retracts while having sex? I have had sex a couple of times but my foreskin does not retract. Is there something wrong?

It is as normal to have the right testicle lower than the left and vice versa. If you are able to have sex successfully without the foreskin retracting, then that's absolutely normal too. But later a tear may occur due to vigorous stroking and that can be painful; so please consult a surgeon.

I am a 55-year-old healthy and active man. I wish to get myself circumcised. Is it harmless? If yes, from where can I get it done?

Circumcision is harmless. If correctly done, it can be very useful during sex. It also helps avoid infection if one has a tight foreskin that cannot be pulled back. It is a simple surgery that any good surgeon can perform.

I am a 20-year-old boy. My girlfriend and I recently started enjoying a good and healthy sex life. Both of us are able to enjoy as well as give each other pleasure. Earlier my foreskin could not retract at all but now it goes back completely when the penis is flaccid. However, when erect, it does not retract fully as the circumference of the skin is less than that of the penis. The foreskin is attached to the skin within. Is this why my foreskin does not completely retract? How can I make it do so? I don't want to be circumcised. Will stroking the penis hard help?

The foreskin is naturally attached at the lower base of the head of the penis. You need not worry about this till the time you experience any pain during intercourse. Do not do anything except slipping back the foreskin gently every day.

I am a 25-year-old man. My foreskin is attached to the tip of the penis and is quite tight. Do I need to undergo circumcision to have an active sex life or will it get detached on its own during intercourse? What are the disadvantages of not having it detached? I have never masturbated.

I would suggest that you consult your family doctor in this case. If you have a tight foreskin it might need a simple surgery.

Editorial

This edition contains reports of two circumcisions carried out by Dr Zuhair Zarifa. One was an adult revision circumcision; the other was on the 8 year old son of one of our members.

Dr Zarifa practises at the Custom House Surgery in East London (<http://www.circumcisions.co.uk>). Many parents wish their sons to be circumcised, whether for personal, social, cultural or religious reasons. Unlike so many doctors, Dr

Zarifa respects such wishes. He is also sympathetic to those adult men who recognise the hygienic and sexual advantages of circumcision and elect to undergo the procedure. He therefore carries out circumcisions on patients of all ages; from babies of a few days old, through to toddlers, schoolboys, teenagers and adults. What is more, his fees are reasonable, certainly compared with many cosmetic surgery clinics who charge exorbitant amounts for what is a relatively trivial operation. And all the reports of his work are good, with many satisfied customers (including our two members).

NHS doctors have virtually closed down circumcision as an option. Dr

The Silent Problem

Two issues ago, my editorial concerned a defect of nature – the phimotic prepuce. My editorial this time concerns another foreskin problem – balanitis.

Phimosis is a well-recognised condition and the parameters for treatment are clear – either a conservative stretching technique, possibly with the aid of a steroid cream, or the removal of the foreskin by circumcision. Phimosis varies in severity but in all its forms it probably affects about 10% of men.

Balanitis is a condition which receives far less attention but it is more insidious than phimosis and probably affects many more men and boys at various stages in their lives. In short, it is inflammation of the foreskin, or the glans, or both. It is usually accompanied by severe itching and discomfort, and can be particularly troublesome in hot or humid conditions. Here is a typical case:

Balanitis has three main causes – bacterial infection, yeast infection and contact dermatitis. Because the area under the foreskin is moist and warm, environmentally it is an excellent bacterial breeding ground. A bacterial infection can result and this needs treatment with antibiotics. The other common infection is candida or thrush – a yeast related infection. Treatment is by a course of anti-fungal cream or tablets or both. Thrush can be passed during sexual intercourse so if the female partner is infected and remains untreated, the thrush can easily be passed back to and re-infect the man.

The inner foreskin, being mucosal in nature, is particularly vulnerable to contact dermatitis. Inflammation can be caused by the latex in condoms, by the chemicals in lubricants, by the perfume in soaps, by the detergent in which underclothes are washed. This is more difficult to treat. Whilst steroid creams may help, these have to be used extremely sparingly since they can thin the skin, and the skin of the glans and inner foreskin is already delicate and sensitive and therefore susceptible to damage. A cure can only be effected if the irritating agent can be identified. This requires a process of elimination which can be as difficult and time-consuming as identifying a food allergy, and can be equally unsuccessful.

How many boys and men are affected by balanitis? Any estimate is likely to be an undercount. Men are notoriously bad about seeking medical advice. How much more hesitant they are likely to be when the problem is genital. Doctors may have seen and heard it all, but it's still embarrassing to say: "My foreskin is itching" especially if the doctor is female. So it is probable that many men suffer in silence – hence the silent problem of my title. Nevertheless, it is estimated that 11% of cases seen in genito-urinary clinics are diagnosed as balanitis. If such clinics are mainly concerned with sexually transmitted diseases; if the cases of balanitis referred to the clinics are only the most persistent, with the majority being treated by the GP; and if anyway only a small proportion of men go to their GP; it can be seen that the disease is an enormous iceberg of which the men appearing in GU clinics are only a small tip.

We have to recognise the potential of the foreskin to create an unhealthy environment. In a recent report by a team from Ealing Hospital in London the presence of "sub-preputial penile wetness" was noted. The researchers studied clinical reports of 386 uncircumcised men who were free of genital lesions or discharge. Physicians who examined the men observed approximately 80 per cent of the men had a slight degree of wetness around the penis, 19 per cent were judged to be wet, and 2 per cent to be very wet. In contrast, only one of 36 circumcised men they examined had wetness.

This is why a rigorous hygiene regime is necessary for uncircumcised men and boys. An uncircumcised boy or man should be meticulous about cleanliness, retracting the foreskin at least once a day to wash thoroughly the inner foreskin and the glans. The area should then be dried completely before the foreskin is pulled forward again to cover the glans – otherwise moisture can be captured under the foreskin. For urination, it is preferable that the foreskin be fully retracted, otherwise it becomes soiled by urine and remains damp. If hygiene is neglected, then debris and smegma collect under the foreskin and this can cause a rash and irritation.

Yet how many males are even aware of this hygienic necessity, yet alone observe it. They are taught to wash and bathe by their mothers, who may not be aware of the intricacies of penile anatomy and are anyway warned against trying to retract the foreskin in early years. Full school medical examinations are a thing of the past so the foreskin remains unchecked and, in many boys, undisturbed. Such boys grow up completely ignorant of how the foreskin functions and it is sometimes a complete surprise when the foreskin withdraws for the first time, perhaps only at puberty – or even later.

For some men, balanitis is a one off occurrence or an occasional nuisance. The condition responds to improved hygiene, supplemented by treatment of the area with an antiseptic cream. But for others, however meticulous their hygiene, whatever prescriptions or palliatives they try, the condition is at best kept under control. Outbreaks are frequent or almost continuous – they have chronic balanitis. They live for long periods with unbearable itching and a red, sore foreskin and glans. For such cases, circumcision is the best answer. In the vast majority of cases, as soon as the foreskin is removed, the problem ceases. When can a case be viewed as sufficiently severe to warrant circumcision? Two bouts in fairly frequent succession is a warning. Three bouts, even spread over a period, indicate that the foreskin is susceptible to balanitis – circumcision at this point will save an almost certain future of periodic suffering.

Of course, foreskins vary in length. Whilst in some uncircumcised men, the foreskin just covers the glans, in others there is significant overhang with a rosebud ending. A long overhang virtually guarantees that there is a closed environment under the foreskin with little opportunity for air to circulate and with all the potential for a warm damp breeding ground to be created. It is boys and men with this type of foreskin who have a high probability of suffering from chronic balanitis. For example:

“When I was born in Canada in 1958, my ‘revolutionary’ doctor decided that I would be left intact at a time when more than 90% of my peers had what I came to call ‘dinks with skin cut off’. What followed were years of chronic infection of the glans and foreskin (balanitis), the humiliation of exposing my foreskinned member to medical practitioners, and repeated trips to the pharmacist for creams and antibiotics.”

I shall immediately get letters from Acorn members telling me that their rosebud foreskin has never caused a moment's problem. Of course, many long foreskins do remain problem free but there is a high degree of risk that this will not be the case.

Is the risk sufficiently great to justify routine circumcision for babies or boys with long foreskins? At one time, doctors used to refer to a long foreskin overhang as “redundant foreskin”. This was often used as a reason when referring patients for circumcision. Whilst this is not a strict medical term, doctors from their experience probably knew that such foreskins were a potential source of problems and were better removed. Of course, it is no longer politically correct to recommend circumcision for prophylactic reasons. But then, how PC is an irritating foreskin? Another case to end with:

“I have developed an itchy and sometimes stinging foreskin. My partner and I haven't had sex for some time because of my problem. When soft my foreskin can be very itchy, and urination can have a short-lived but painful stinging effect.”

I bet he now wishes that a little snip had been arranged for him earlier in life.

My Muslim Son – Part III

Long term Acorn readers may recall how I came to the decision to have my eldest Anglo-Indonesian son circumcised (My Muslim Son – issue 2/2003) and then went ahead with it in Jakarta in July 2003 (My Muslim Son: Part II – issue 1/2004) accompanied by my then wife.

The journey I took with his younger brother could not have been more different. The starting point with him was in 2005 with my village GP who seemed sympathetic to my concerns that at the age of 7 my younger son should at least be able to retract his foreskin a little, and therefore referred us to Mr Martyn Williams, a paediatric urologist at Addenbrooke's hospital, Cambridge. It became so very clear that this NHS urologist only wanted to know if there was any ballooning on urination to which my son said "No", and remarked that the foreskin would be retractable through masturbation by the time he needed it for sexual intercourse. If I had still wanted him circumcised, it would have to be done privately, and he would have done it for about £1000 by general anaesthetic!

Undeterred by the discouraging but predictable response from the NHS, I deliberated and checked that I still had my ex-wife's consent (her view has never changed; all Muslim boys are routinely circumcised in Indonesia). Finally, I made the decision to go ahead on the grounds of conformity (his grandpa, dad and brother are cut) and because there was no way of being able to clean under his foreskin without causing discomfort. I felt that at the age of 8 it was the right moment and the start of the summer holidays the best time.

Through the recommendation of Acorn member Douglas, I made contact with Dr Zuhair Zarifa, a Palestinian Christian of Custom House Surgery in London's Docklands. Along with my two sons, we arranged our appointment for Monday 24th July at 1 pm, when the surgery was closed for NHS but open for private procedures. Apparently there were to be three other circumcisions that lunch hour; two boys of Bangladeshi parentage and an African baby so the pace in the waiting room was brisk. Having signed the consent form, paid £240, gone through a leaflet entitled Circumcision Aftercare Instructions: Babies and Boys, with the Office Manager stressing the need to remove the dressing within 24 hours, and given a tube of anti-bacterial powder called Cicarin to apply lightly after the first bath, we were finally ushered into Dr Zarifa's room by the practice nurse, Ms Pat Monroe.

The big moment had arrived for my youngest son. Shaking like a leaf, he was asked to lie on the awaiting couch and strip below the belt. The good doctor breezed in, asked why my son was going to be circumcised and proceeded to tell my son that there would be a sharp scratch and then he would feel nothing. I could see that he was well used to nervous, jumpy children and my son was quickly seduced by a small bag of sweets. The doctor asked him if he wanted me to hold him, so during the whole operation I embraced him whilst my other son looked on. The operation went smoothly despite my son's initial screams at the injection and his wish to watch his bloody member being reshaped. Dr Zarifa used a freehand technique, cauterizing the bleeding from the wound as necessary.

After a night without having to administer painkillers, the following morning saw me guiding him gently into a warm slightly salted bath at my flat where the aim was to allow the dressing to soak for a long time before removal. It was at this point my son showed his desire to be in control and I proudly watched him gradually and gently lift it off, an experience which all Acorn roundheads will know is unpleasant.

Two months on all has gone well. During the healing there was only one occasion when there were a few spots of blood around a suture. There is complete exposure when flaccid, a ring of inner skin behind the glans and apparently the frenulum was cut. And the reaction of my son? Throughout our post-operative holiday he constantly examined himself. In the showers of our local swimming pool he confidently washes naked with me, flaunting his knob without a care unlike his shyer brother. At school he tells me a classmate asked why his willy skin had been chopped off: and his reaction: "It's none of your business!"

My Re-circumcision

Monday 21st August 2006

The day I had been waiting for had arrived. I made arrangements to meet Vernon Quaintance over the internet. He kindly volunteered to escort me from Euston to Custom House. The journey took under one hour.

I entered reception and stated that I had an appointment with Dr Zuhair Zarifa. From there, we were directed upstairs and waited for Sylvia Nicholas. She took my particulars and payment for the procedure, after which she gave me a phial of Cicatrin powder, with instructions on when to apply.

Shortly afterwards, I shook hands with Dr Zarifa and sister Pat. Vernon asked if he could watch the procedure, I said yes. We waited a little longer, then I was ushered into Dr Zarifa's office for the consultation. I told him my reason for requiring a re-circ. He examined me and drew a diagram of my penis with an explanation of the procedure. I was then asked if I wanted to continue – I said yes and signed the consent form.

From there we immediately crossed to the surgery, where I was introduced to Pat again. I slipped off my shoes, socks and briefs. I lay back on the bed, lifted my shirt and waited for Dr Zarifa to commence. Dr Zarifa cleaned and disinfected (if that is the correct term) the appropriate area. He then administered local anaesthetics and after a short period my re-circ began. I lay back with my hands at the back of my head while Vernon watched my circumcision.

There was nothing to worry about, Dr Zarifa diligently setting about his business. Even the smell of cauterised skin did not bother me. In no time at all, Sister Pat was assisting. Later, bandages were applied, Sister gave me a pad to place in front of my penis for extra protection. Dr Zarifa advised wearing tight briefs for support. I was then advised to rest a while, he gave me 500ml of water and told me to drink plenty. After about ten minutes we left with handshakes and best wishes. I thanked Sister Pat for her role in my re-circ. Vernon and I went for a meal across the way, then back to Euston to say farewell.

Saturday 30th September 2006

It is now five weeks since my recirc. My penis is healing well, although the shaft is a little swollen especially underneath where the frenulum was removed. The overall result looks good and I would recommend Dr Zarifa to any boy or man requiring circumcision.

During my circumcision, I commented that the number of men being circumcised for whatever reason could start a fashion trend. Obviously he saw nothing wrong with that. If the information and comment provided by the internet is anything to go by, then I would deduce that circumcision is practised now more than ever before. Men don't seem embarrassed by the subject as they used to be when I was first done. Perhaps organisations such as the Acorn Society can take some credit for that. Having regard for what I have just said, I am very aware of organisations opposed to male circumcision and they are entitled to protest – however, I am glad that I don't possess a foreskin.

Nudity And Circumcision

One of the recent and excellent newsletters raised the subject of, and solicited comment about, nudity and circumcision, and the apparent sensitivity of some gents who are not circumcised and their awkwardness over their undressed bodies. It is quite noticeable here in the USA where most men are circumcised, especially in more affluent communities. I laugh at the comments of those who say that in all their travels they have never seen an uncircumcised man in USA locker rooms or shower rooms; certainly these gents are not seen because they avoid being seen. I was not circumcised until I was 30 years old and know what it is like to be in situations where almost everyone is circumcised. In the US Army I was one of the few uncircumcised guys in my unit. I was very embarrassed when I was put in a Military physician's circle and the physician made us form a circle of perhaps 20 to 30 guys. My group were almost all African Americans and there I was the only guy with a foreskin. While minority men were more likely uncircumcised, a minority among the minority guys were circumcised in the Army while overseas but I never sought the operation when in service. Wish I had!

While in the service, I arranged to shower later at night when there weren't so many people using the showers. I had what is known as a redundant foreskin and in the USA it is easily noticeable among the roundheads. It is so rare and odd looking that stares are possible and one Jewish guy went ballistic seeing what he obviously had never seen before and shouted about my difference. Over the years, I learned to suffer in silence and make huge efforts to avoid scrutiny.

So, with that as a background and as a fitness swimmer for the last 30 years, I definitely notice the discomfort of the uncircumcised. They make huge efforts to either avoid the shower room or to even shower with their swimsuit on and then carefully hide in some corner to dress. I generally try to engage them in conversation to comfort them as I wish others had comforted me in my embarrassment so long ago. No words are passed about the other's difference; it is the weather etc. which is discussed out of courtesy to those who are uncomfortable.

But in perhaps the last few years, a big change is very apparent. As I finish in the locker room, a group of young boy swimmers will sometimes arrive and curiously all dress under huge beach towels. For me, it is a reflection on what I would have done had the culture allowed back then. It called more attention to oneself than if you simply moved fast and perhaps went unnoticed. (Redundant foreskins cannot be kept retracted back successfully.)

I would love to know the beginnings of this practice. But asking why would not be cool, so I simply notice the change. I suspect it is caused by the feminist movement which has lumped together female and male circumcision and brought about the feminization of the American male, with perhaps some well meaning mom dictating even how boys should avoid being seen. Perhaps some of these young uncircumcised guys commented to mom about their embarrassment and thus a regulation is born. It is a creepy feeling to be around people who dress thus and the practice is now spreading to some of the young adult swimmers.

On the subject in general, I was surprised to see a men's magazine, GQ, advocating that good manners dictate that guys use a towel wrap in the locker room. Feminization again. The male body need not be hidden among other males in my view. When vacationing this year, I found it so odd to see all the men in huge swim suits which of course hamper swimming and the young women in bikinis revealing their entire bodies. Sometimes, I purposely wear the briefest of swim suits to my workout just to force the debate about changing of standards for men and women. When some fool mentions my suit, I generally say that if the gals can show their bodies, why can't I?

One of the swimmers who is uncircumcised will not use the locker room and I am sure there are others who also handle their embarrassment by going home to shower. When I noticed my difference in Kindergarten, my mother told me to not let the other boys see. Hide!!! By the way, I once frequented a large public pool where many Europeans and their children would use the locker room. Dads let their little girls move around in the men's shower room a lot more than Americans like. It would be nice if their attitudes toward nudity were more prevalent here. Then, again, there isn't a lot of difference among their men. Well, I avoided being noticed as the odd man out for many years and hope that no one I know has to suffer such discomfort.

Don't believe that circumcision is on the wane here, it is still about 85% in affluent California suburbs. The large influx of Mexicans and Central Americans whose cultures have not yet adopted circumcision affects statistics much as in affluent London areas. There is even a trend among that group in SF General where one in three boys is circumcised even though their parents are immigrants from Mexico, etc. Eventually, everyone assimilates and wants their boys to be comfortable in their adopted culture. Anti-circ people try to prevent the poor from being circumcised here by excepting the practice from state and federal medical coverage. I hope they are forgiven their stupidity.

Swimming

In the last edition, the editor questioned whether circumcised men were really more confident about appearing naked or whether it was all a matter of locker room culture. In my opinion, it's the culture that's most important.

At the school I went to, a minor public school, in the fifties, you weren't allowed any inhibitions. There were no partitions between the showers or the urinals; there weren't even doors on the toilet cubicles, although that might have had more to do with discouraging smoking and sexual dalliances. But it was swimming which set the culture in stone. Unless it was a gala, with outside visitors, no-one was allowed to wear swimming costumes. This applied to masters as well as boys and the games masters who took the swimming periods were probably the first men I had seen properly naked. They were circumcised to a man. They would have been born in the twenties or thirties and no doubt their middle class parents enthusiastically agreed to the doctor's recommendation to have their foreskins snipped. Certainly from then on, I associated the cut penis with manliness and virility.

I can remember the first swimming period when all the boys were lined naked along the edge of the swimming pool, with hands clasped over their genitals. The first order from the (naked) master was: "Everyone put your hands on your head." Of course, this meant uncovering ourselves. "Now," said the master, "just look around at everyone else." We did this shyly and blushing. "What you will have seen" said the master "is that everyone is the same. Everyone has private parts just like you and so there is no reason for you to hide yours. So, no more covering with hands or towels. Just forget that you are naked. Then everyone else will forget you are naked and you will forget everyone else is naked." Of course, this statement was incorrect on at least two counts. Everyone was not the same – some endowments were larger than others, even if none were yet of adult size; some had the start of pubic hair; and most importantly for me over the coming years, some were covered in foreskin and some had knobs exposed.

But the regime at the school certainly meant that you learnt not to have inhibitions about being naked and this has lasted all my life. Whether in locker room or doctor's surgery, the thought of other men seeing my tackle has never given me a moment's concern. Of course, I expect that nude swimming has long since ceased even in the few all boys schools that remain. I am sure that helps explain the timidity of many of today's youth about being seen in the buff. More's the pity, I say. Your naked body is something to be proud of, even if you still have the disadvantage of a foreskin covering.

Well Circumcised

No doubting the status of the four men featured in our photo gallery this issue. All display the bared glans which is the sign of a good circumcision.

Is Circumcision The Right Decision?

[By Aly Murphy and Elena Gaudino, The Daily Campus, University of Connecticut]

If you are interested in hopping into bed with an exotic stranger from abroad, be prepared for a certain party flavor that most males on campus do without. And though accents are a lovely flavor, it's the foreskin that makes most of these Europeans different from American males. Foreskin is the attachment of skin that covers the head of a penis in uncircumcised males. Though many of us, United States and Canadian citizens, think of uncircumcised males as an ancient breed, there's been a growing trend, even in the United States, to avoid the cut and to embrace nature.

According to cirp.org, male circumcision is the most common surgery in the United States. However, the popularity of undergoing the snipping procedure has been on the decline since 2000. The rate of circumcised males has seen a significant change starting from the national average of 95 per cent decades ago, to the fluctuating per centage in the 1980s in the North Central region of the United States and 70 per cent in the Northeast region in the 1990s, down to the present day statistics of 77 per cent in the North Central region and 64 per cent in the Northeast region. The most startling statistics derive from the Western region of the United States that boasts a low 31 per cent of circumcised males. These dropping statistics can be attributed to the growing resentment against unnecessary surgery to newborns.

Though male circumcision started up as a cultural tradition, it's now progressed to not only a social standard for some, but a hygienic procedure as well. And though the sensitivity that comes along with uncut members appeals to certain crowds, some factors dealing with an uncircumcised penis can leave others heading for the mountains. For instance, according to University of Columbia's sexual education web site, the cocoon of space between the foreskin and penis can create a breeding ground for bacterial growth as dead skin cells and secretions from small subcutaneous glands (formally known as 'smegma') can easily get stuck there. This creates the perfect recipe for various infections and can even promote yeast infections in males. Therefore, uncircumcised penises require a bit more hygienic attention when it comes to penis up-keep.

However, foreskin, according to net.indra.com, isn't just a useless flap of skin over the head of a penis, which is what a majority of the population who haven't seen or dealt with an uncircumcised penis believes. In fact, the foreskin is anything but useless – at least when it comes to sexual pleasure. The web site states that the foreskin is an extremely sensitive continuation of skin that covers the shaft of the penis. It's not only praised as a protector of the head and natural lubricant for friction, but also a tool to create a more delightful sexual experience for the male as foreskin is filled with nerve endings called stretch receptors that are set off when stretched, rolled or massaged.

According to the same site, circumcision actually hinders the sexual experience for men since, without the protection of the foreskin, the mucus membrane of the head thickens where the nerve endings are, therefore desensitizing the head. Another minus attributed to circumcision is the partial or full removal of frenulum, a Y-shaped web of skin on the underbelly of the penis – the most sensitive part.

So what's the big deal when it comes down to sex when it comes down to the question of cut or uncut in males? While some may have heard the rumor that uncircumcised males can actually enhance sexual pleasure in females, according to cirp.org the opinion or difference still remains a mystery. "To date no study has investigated whether this dramatic alteration in the male genitalia affects the sexual pleasure experienced by the female partner or whether a woman can physically discern the difference between a penis with a foreskin. The impact that male circumcision has on the overall sexual experience for either partner is unknown," according to cirp.org. Christina Bainton, a 5th-semester English and broadcasting major and official UConn Sexpert, also said there is no major technical difference when it comes to their partner, but can be handy for the male himself. "To be circumcised or not to be... it really doesn't matter," Bainton said. "In the long run, they are exactly the same. Their partner will not feel a major difference while the men that are uncircumcised will have more sensitivity, which will increase pleasure. This doesn't mean that circumcised penises don't feel anything. The package is the same, it's just wrapped differently."

You Are Not Alone

I thought members might like to know about a lesson in foreskin hygiene which features in a 1979 Danish film called You Are Not Alone, recently issued on DVD in the USA. It's a very dated-looking drama about the close friendship between a 14 year old boy at a Danish boarding school and the 11 year old headmaster's son – played by Anders Agenso and Peter Bjerger respectively.

In one scene, the two boys – who are both uncircumcised – have a shower together, and the older boy asks the younger boy if he washes his penis, adding "I mean... under the foreskin and everything". The younger boy replies: "Do we have to?", to which the older boy replies: "Yes, otherwise we smell bad".

That section of dialogue has no relevance to the plot, so it seems likely to have been incorporated merely as a lesson in genital hygiene for Danish boys.

The DVD is available from www.amazon.com and other US online mail order companies.

Doubtful Ethics?

In his column in issue 3/2006, the editor, in writing about a correct masturbatory technique to stretch the foreskin, used the phrase: "Setting aside the doubtful ethics of training pubescent boys in such matters". Why "doubtful ethics"? Surely such matters should be part of a normal sex education course, something we are very bad at in this country given our rate of STDs and teenage pregnancy.

Last week a close friend dropped in to show me a message on his mobile. His prostate cancer is being closely monitored in case he should need surgery. The message was from his 24 year old niece in Australia and said "Please masturbate often. It will be good for your health." I don't know whether this is good advice or not, but certainly regular exercise won't do him any harm. I don't know his habits, and don't feel I can ask a 67 year old married man about this. As we swim together I know that he is very thoroughly circumcised so maybe a few tactful questions and a few tactful hints will not come amiss.

But well done the niece, and may we have better sex education in this country.

I Was Scared But I'm Proud

[From The Electric New Paper: 6th June 2006]

Asyraf Danial Abdul Latiff, 5, was thinking of just one thing – a new bicycle. That was the reward promised to him by his father for undergoing circumcision, the traditional rite of passage for Muslim boys. Asyraf attended a mass circumcision ceremony together with 13 other boys at the Al-Iman Mosque in Bukit Panjang yesterday. "He cried during the half-hour operation," said his father, Mr Latiff Razali, 45.

Mr Latiff said he will keep his promise and reward his son. "He was very eager to go through it after his cousin received many presents after being circumcised last year," said his mother, Madam Adhimah Abdul Rahman, 43. Circumcision is the surgical removal of the foreskin – the flap of skin that covers the tip of the penis. Muslims consider it desirable, as it preserves cleanliness.

The boys, aged five to 13, were decked out in their finest clothes and treated like royalty for the day. Before undergoing the operation, they took part in a procession around the mosque accompanied by a group of kompang (traditional hand drum) boys. After witnessing a silat (Malay martial arts) performance, a short prayer was said for them before they were led to a room to be circumcised by a Muslim doctor. While waiting for their turn, most of the boys did not seem to fully comprehend what they were about to undergo. Most of them were relaxed and fooled around with each other.

Each boy was given a certificate and there was food for about 100 friends and relatives who attended the event. Their parents had signed them up for the ceremony after word spread that the mosque was holding the ceremony for the first time. One of them, Mohd Naquiuddin Mohd Wahid, 11, said: "I ate a lot of fried chicken yesterday because my mother said I wouldn't be able to eat it for a while or I won't heal properly." The oldest participant, Muhd Effendy Moktar, 13, was the first to go under the knife. He screamed in pain even though he had been anaesthetised. It was the most painful experience he had been through, he said later. "I was a bit scared, but I'm proud that I went through it," he said.

His younger brother, Muhd Raihan, 11, who was next, cried after the operation. According to his grandfather, Mr Hamzah Yusof, the anaesthetic numbs the area but they can still feel some pain. He was in the operating room with his grandchildren. Said Mr Hamzah: "They were a little tense. But I talked to them and held their hands to calm them down. I'm very relieved and happy for them." The boys will have to wear a loose sarong for a week.

The mosque's secretary, Mr Jamari Mohtar, said circumcision is a symbolic transition from boyhood to adolescence. But nowadays, most families hold the ceremony on a smaller scale – either at home or by taking their children to clinics and hospitals. Said Mr Jamari: "Some parents find it's neater and more convenient to have it done in hospitals or clinics, but then they miss the cultural aspect." He said the mosque wanted to recreate the festive spirit that used to mark the ceremony back in the kampung days.

Precision Circumcisions

[Article by Marc Abrahams, Guardian, 25th October 2005]

Bryan B Fuller is the world's top expert on skin colour in human foreskins.

Professor Fuller's foreskin research is based at the University of Oklahoma, where he is an associate professor of biochemistry and molecular biology. A research paper he co-authored with four colleagues in 1990 is the most-cited study on the topic. The paper, "The Relationship Between Tyrosinase Activity and Skin Color in Human Foreskins", appeared in the Journal of Investigative Dermatology. It makes lively reading. The scientists pre-select their foreskins on the basis of race. The paper explains that "The race of the child was determined from the race of both parents. Foreskins were only used from children whose parents were either racially Caucasian or black. No foreskins from racially mixed marriages were used."

The Fuller process of preparing and utilising a foreskin is complex. Seen from the point of view of a foreskin, this is a many-stage adventure. First, the foreskin is surgically removed from its birthplace. Then it is placed on a gauze pad that has been saturated with a fluid called "Hank's balanced salt solution". It is then trimmed and sliced into five-square-millimetre chunks. Then each chunk is homogenised three times. It is then sonicated three times. (You may not be familiar with sonication. Sonication, in the words of the Hielscher company, which makes sonicators, is "a very effective method for the mixing, homogenising, emulsifying, dispersing, disintegration, and degassing of liquids by means of ultrasonic cavitation".) The foreskin bits are then frozen, centrifuged, and sonicated once more. By this time, the foreskin has been through a lot. But the adventure is really just beginning. Now, at last, the foreskin bits get analysed, but that is a story for another time.

Fuller's patent (US 5589161) for using foreskins to test skin-tanning solutions is the ne plus ultra on how to use foreskins to test skin-tanning solutions. One of his main aims, his website informs us, is "to develop skincare products that can stimulate melanin production (tanning) in fair-skinned individuals". Five of his 11 foreskin-related patents, though, are about how to make skin become lighter. The newest, called "Method for Causing Skin Lightening", features a 1,300-word exposition about foreskins.

Scientists of an earlier generation fondly recall D.A. Pious and R.N. Hamburger's study of 50 cultures of human foreskin cells, published in 1964. Pious and Hamburger, however, had little to say about the colour of the foreskins. And of earlier times, there is little on the record. Most disappointing is the fact that foreskin colour is not mentioned at all in Frederick M. Hodges's instant-classic of a report on "The Ideal Prepuce in Ancient Greece and Rome", which was published in 2001 in the Bulletin of the History of Medicine. A Fuller account is wanted.

Baby Needs Recircumcision

[Article by Chain Klir in ynet news.com]

Eighteen months after A's circumcision ceremony, his parents had to have their son re-circumcised under anesthesia after the first mohel "didn't cut off enough." The parents sued the first mohel, and won NIS 45,000 in damages.

'A' was born in springtime. Eight days later, in keeping with one Jewish custom observed by nearly all Israelis, he was circumcised by mohel (ritual circumciser) Rabbi Shalom Ma'atuf. But when the boy was two-and-a-half months old, his mother noticed his penis seemed uncircumcised. The frightened mother called Ma'atuf and asked him to examine the baby, but Ma'atuf never appeared. "Be patient, things will work out themselves over time," he told the mother.

At seven months, she called Ma'atuf again and expressed her concern. "Is the boy chubby?" asked Ma'atuf. The mother confirmed that was the case, and was told once again not to worry. "Once he loses some of the 'baby fat' you will see he is circumcised. Eventually, your kid will be normal," assured Ma'atuf. The scene repeated itself several more times, but Ma'atuf refused to examine the boy, maintaining that things would "work out".

Fears confirmed

When the boy was a year-and-a-half old, his mother finally took him to a urologist, who confirmed her worst fear: the boy was not circumcised properly, and his foreskin was almost completely intact. Dr. Kessler then proceeded to circumcise the boy under full anesthesia. The parents say the surgery put the family through a terrible ordeal. "From a pleasant and smiley baby, our son became a frightened boy, often in pain, and constantly subject to anxiety attacks. We couldn't do anything about it," they told Justice Dalia Ganot of the Rishon Lezion Magistrates Court.

Conflicting opinions

Justice Ganot said the relevant issue was whether or not the boy required corrective surgery. This is where opinions differed. Dr. Kessler, an expert witness for the plaintiffs, claimed that there was excess foreskin, a condition that can only be treated by surgery and not “over time”. But Dr. Atias, an expert witness for the mohel, disagreed. In his opinion, the boy suffered from “hidden penis phenomenon”, a condition that would have corrected itself as the boy grew up.

Kessler said it was possible to determine that there was excess foreskin by pulling the skin back, towards the penis's shaft. But Atias claimed such an examination can only be done while the penis is erect, and therefore it was not possible to make that determination.

Heavy fine

After reviewing photographs of the boy's penis taken before the surgery, the judge awarded the boy NIS 45,000 in damages for emotional distress, and said the boy should be compensated for all future expenses – psychological therapy, increased diaper usage, medical treatments, etc. “Even to the untrained eye, there is no doubt the penis was abnormal, and that it does seem uncircumcised (from the photos),” said Ganot. “Moreover, while Dr. Kessler is a surgeon specialising in child urology, Dr. Atias is a gynecologist that operates on women. What does a women's doctor know about penises? We live in a Jewish state, where the majority of citizens – both Jews and Muslims – circumcise their sons. Had the boy grown up with a penis that seemed uncircumcised, he would have been considerably different from his friends. There is no telling what psychological impact that would have on his character and personality.”

Siriraj Hospital Names Songkhla Doctor As The ‘Finest’

[from a report by Arthit Khwankhom in The Nation, Bangkok]

A doctor who dedicated his life to improving health care in his hometown, the predominantly Muslim district of Thepha in Songkhla, has been named finest rural doctor of the year by the prestigious Siriraj Hospital, the nation's oldest school of medicine.

One of Dr Suwat Wiriyaongsakij's remarkable successes came from his integration of modern medicine and religious practices. “Penis infections and bleeding were common among Muslims because circumcisions were not being carried out properly”, said the 41-year-old director of Thepha community hospital. A Muslim must carry out the circumcision, although often no one within a community had the skills to carry out that most delicate of operations. He said some people were also not concerned about the medical problems that arose from badly performed circumcisions.

In response, Suwat organised mass annual circumcision rites, encouraging the community to come to the ceremony where he gathered qualified Islamic medics to provide proper circumcisions. The doctor also trained Islamic nurses in the procedure and the number of circumcision bleedings and infections was reduced dramatically.

Merry Christmas! I hope that this newsletter will provide some interesting and stimulating reading over the Festive Season. Unfortunately, also enclosed is an equally seasonal but less welcome gift – your membership renewal form. I do hope that you will have enjoyed membership sufficiently over the past year to make renewal a no-brainer. Get your cheque book out now!

In this edition, a former member of Acorn challenges the Society to become active in promoting male circumcision, including routine infant circumcision. In other words, do we want to talk or act? I would be interested in your views which I will print next time. On the subject of RIC, I reprint an article by The Times Doctor which, unusually for a UK medic, comes out heavily in favour of circumcision. But, in another column in The Times, a doctor colleague puts a contrary view – leave the foreskin alone! And in another contribution, an American mother bewails having been talked into having her twin baby boys circumcised twenty years before. But what do her sons think now – we aren't told.

In other words, the debate rages on – which is what this newsletter is all about.

Just what is the purpose of circumcision?

What is the purpose of the circumcision operation? This may seem an odd question to ask about a procedure which has been in existence for thousands of years. Nevertheless, there are in fact two distinct and separate reasons for performing circumcision. Some classes of circumcision are undertaken to remove the foreskin; there is a completely different set of classes where circumcision is undertaken to expose the glans. The fact that each is a by-product of the other does not alter the fact that the two purposes are very different in motivation.

Let us first consider those circumcisions whose main purpose is to remove the foreskin. Falling primarily into this group are circumcisions carried out for medical reasons – phimosis, balanitis, frenulum breve. In such cases, the foreskin is defective in some respect – the opening is too small to allow retraction, there is a propensity to irritation or bacterial infection, the frenulum is so short that it causes pain and threatens rupture. The offending piece of skin is surgically removed and the problem is solved. The fact that the glans is thereby exposed is purely a by-product of the operation. In fact, some surgeons adapt the surgical procedure to retain as much foreskin as possible. The dorsal slit is an example, where phimosis is cured by making an incision in the foreskin from the tip roughly to the glans and then suturing the two sides of the incision separately. This leaves the foreskin in two flaps to cover the glans. Frenulum breve is sometimes dealt with by frenoplasty, a technique whereby the frenulum is lengthened rather than it and the foreskin being excised.

Also into this category fall circumcisions carried out for prophylactic reasons, usually in infancy. Prophylactic circumcision first became popular in Victorian times when it was seen as a cure for, amongst other things, masturbation and epilepsy. Nowadays, apart from religious reasons which are considered below, routine infant circumcisions are usually carried out “to save trouble later”. If the foreskin is removed, the boy is future proofed against all the normal foreskin ailments listed above. The boy also gains some protection against sexually transmitted diseases. It is well documented that circumcised men are less prone to such diseases as syphilis and gonorrhoea. Now there is increasingly overwhelming evidence that circumcision provides some protection against the HIV virus. The inner foreskin contains large numbers of Langerhans cells which are particularly susceptible to outside agents. The removal of the foreskin and hence the vulnerable area decreases the penetrative powers of the virus. For the full benefit, of course, a low circumcision removing virtually all the inner foreskin is optimal.

In all the above cases, the removal of the foreskin is the sole motivation and the resulting exposure of the glans is an inevitable but not sought after by-product.

There is however another class of circumcisions where denudation of the glans is the primary purpose. First consider the Jewish people. It was a commandment from Yahweh to Abram that he and all the men folk of his tribe should be circumcised of the flesh of the foreskin. The purpose of the ritual was to expose the glans of the penis and thereby give all males a mark which would distinguish them from all other males. This was a sign of the covenant between Yahweh and the Jewish people. This covenant continues to today and even in families where most Jewish rituals have fallen into abeyance, circumcision of baby boys on the eighth day of life is still observed. Indeed, there are sometimes anguished accounts of Jewish men who have married non-Jews but are still desperate that their sons should be circumcised, often in the face of resistance from their wives. Of course, to be effective, the sign of the covenant must be apparent. There are therefore rules of procedure for a Jewish circumcision to ensure that the glans is fully exposed. Indeed, at one stage in their history, there was concern that some Jews were stretching the remnants of their foreskins to appear non-Jewish so that they could, for instance, appear naked in the Baths or Greek games. To eliminate such possibilities, a more radical form of circumcision was introduced whereby the inner foreskin was stripped away as part of the ritual.

In times of persecution for the Jews, circumcision has provided proof of identity and has effectively signed the person's death warrant. Nevertheless, circumcision has continued and where, as in the old Soviet Union, the practice was suppressed and forbidden, as soon as freedom came or the men emigrated, they immediately arranged for the circumcision of themselves and their sons.

Whilst Islam does not demand circumcision, it is a tradition which most Muslim males observe in honour of the Prophet. The age at which boys are cut varies from country to country and can be at any time from birth up to puberty. Again the circumcision is symbolic in nature and this demands the demonstrable sign that circumcision has taken place. Hence it is the exposed glans that is again of paramount importance. In many African tribes, circumcision is carried out as a rite of puberty as the boy crosses into manhood. The ceremony itself is an ordeal which the boy must endure stoically. The resulting naked glans is a powerful symbol of the new man's virility, signifying that the penis is stripped for action and fully capable of fulfilling its new sexual function.

Such puberty rites are not just ceremonial. They are carried out in recognition of the benefits to sexual function which denudation of the glans conveys. There are three main benefits. First, the glans in its covered state is hyper-sensitive. This is a consequence of the evolutionary process. The original purpose of intercourse was to fertilise the woman. Therefore, as the penis entered the vagina, it was advantageous for orgasm and ejaculation to be triggered immediately. The glans was designed in its super-sensitive state to achieve this. Nowadays, conception is the objective in only a minority of sexual couplings – pure pleasure is more often the reason. Prolongation of the process is therefore advantageous and some diminution of the hair-trigger reaction of the glans desirable. This is where dehooding the glans can be beneficial. The permanent exposure results in keratinisation of the skin of the glans – the glans becomes accustomed to contact with clothes and does not therefore react so uncontrollably in a sexual situation. However, the man does not sacrifice any pleasure – research has shown that the ultimate sensitivity of the glans and the intensity of the male orgasm is unaffected by circumcision. It is rather like the contact lens process. The eye of a contact lens wearer accommodates to the presence of the lens; this does not mean that the eyeball is any less sensitive.

The second benefit sexually occurs in intercourse. The whole surface of the glans of the circumcised penis is fully exposed to stimulation – in particular the very sensitive rim of the corona and the V-shaped sulcus (especially if the frenulum has been removed). In the uncircumcised man, these areas can become covered by the foreskin on the retraction stroke (the man is partially withdrawing into his foreskin) and thus the stimulus to the coronal ridge is less. The third benefit is the aid to conception where this is desired. The fact that the urethral opening is entirely unobstructed by foreskin means that the semen is ejaculated as far as possible into the woman's vagina without hindrance. With an uncircumcised man, there is the possibility of at least some of the ejaculate being caught in the foreskin.

A further purpose in exposing the glans is aesthetic. Many men and women prefer the appearance of the penis when the foreskin has been completely removed and the glans stands proud and bare. With the glans permanently stripped apparently ready for action, the sexuality and the virility of the male is excitingly on display. This has been compared favourably with the uncircumcised penis where, especially when the foreskin is long, the appearance of the flaccid penis can be almost prepubescent.

The two distinct purposes of circumcision are probably not recognised by surgeons, especially in the UK. They circumcise predominantly to cure medical defects. The removal of sufficient foreskin to cure the immediate problem is the purpose of surgery. This means that they are usually conservative and remove as little foreskin consonant with their primary objective. This leads to loose circumcisions, sometimes with sufficient foreskin remaining to cover the corona. For those undergoing circumcision mainly to gain the benefits of a permanently exposed glans, this can lead to disappointment. Such an aim is only achieved by removing sufficient foreskin (and probably the frenulum) to result in a tight cut. Such radical circumcisions are foreign to most UK surgeons.

But of course this discussion is essentially artificial since a circumcision performed to remove the foreskin automatically confers the benefits of an exposed glans, and vice versa. In this respect, circumcision comes as a two-for-the-price-of-one offer – lose your foreskin and gain the advantages of a denuded glans; expose your glans and dispense with all future foreskin problems. So it's a bonus package and a cut price offer on which there is no time limit. But this is no reason for delay – with the dual benefits that circumcision brings, why hesitate?

The Direction Of The *Acorn Society

Members may recall that, two years ago, I no longer felt that the Acorn Society was going in the direction I wished it to take and so, with much reluctance after some 10 years of membership, I resigned. The Editor was kind enough to print my Letter of Resignation at that time (issue 3/2004).

Moving on a couple of years to October 2006 I have just been visited by my very good friend and Acorn member R.W. – Surrey who, like me, is extremely pro-circumcision and who introduced me to the Group all those years ago. R.W. brought with him a number of date-stamped envelopes each containing a year's worth of past Acorn magazines so that I could catch up on my reading matter and see what I had missed!

I have to say that, while some of the members' articles were of interest – plus the increasing numbers of extracts from the Internet – in my opinion by far the best written and most interesting articles were from the Editor. Indeed, without exception, on concluding the reading of his foreword and especially his page two and three missives where he deals with related topics in some detail, I was left stimulated by his well researched works which were very interestingly constructed, with excellent use of words, grammar and punctuation.

In particular I enjoyed the leading article in issue 3/2005 which dealt with the very positive effects of circumcision on the reduction of the transmission of HIV. Again the article was very well researched and I found it extremely interesting. Then, to my utter horror, I turned to the following issue to discover that both the Editor and his article had been annihilated by Acorn's past leader, David, who until then I had always respected for his apparently unbiased views on circumcision. So incensed was he that he 'publicly' resigned over the article the Editor had so skillfully written – and all praise to the Editor for publishing such condemnation! Surely this is all a bit extreme of uncut David ... or maybe he was just looking for a reason to resign from the organisation? Perhaps Acorn had become too pro-circ for his liking?

It has been frequently commented that the majority of Acorn members are circumcised – or wish to be – and, as I read in Acorn, with fewer active members at meetings and a generally falling membership (as David acknowledged), the time must now be right for the Acorn Society finally to come off the fence and declare itself as a PRO-circumcision Group. In this day and age of pathetically few male circumcisions, there are regrettably no organisations dedicated to furthering the practice in the UK, whereas there is a plethora of groups dealing with foreskin restoration.

We, the small percentage of circumcised males in the UK, are the ones who have taken positive action (or, in cases such as mine, whose parents have thankfully taken action on our behalf) to enable us to achieve a circumcised organ of which we are proud and it is we who will benefit from a support organisation. Males who have chosen to remain with their foreskins, with all the disadvantages, have not taken any positive action and so do not require organisational support. Put another way: You wouldn't enroll ordinary (non-pierced) people into a club for people with body-piercings!

After lengthy discussions, R.W. and I are proposing that Acorn, with all its excellent infrastructure, should as soon as possible become an organisation which enthusiastically promotes male circumcision, including RIC if the parents agree, here in the UK, and makes the many positive advantages of circumcision available to all who wish to know about them (including mothers of male babies). It's time that the tide was turned and, with reborn Acorn's help, male circumcision, with all its advantages both to men and their partners, will again become the norm in the UK.

If the Acorn Society decides to continue on its present path of self destruction and not become proactive and pro-circumcision as R.W. and I (and others) would wish, we will take matters into our own hands and form a new Pro-Circumcision group ourselves.

Think about it, Acorn Society, if you wish to be here in five years time!

J.H. – Dorset

[Editor's note: I would be interested in members' reactions to J.H.'s proposals. To date, the Society's objectives have been centred on informing and supporting members on issues concerning circumcision and the foreskin. How many members would wish to add the promotion of circumcision (including routine infant circumcision {RIC}) to the Society's aims; and how many would object to such a move?]

The Times Doctor Praises RIC

[The following question and answer appeared in Dr Thomas Stuttaford's health column in The Times on 9th November 2006]

Q: A Hertfordshire reader has written about circumcision. She is just back from America, where she read that it is advantageous and she wonders why it is not done routinely in Britain.

A: My opinion, which I have been propagating for many years, is in accord with that of David Ferguson, a research worker from the Christchurch School of Medicine, New Zealand. Ferguson has followed the case histories of more than 500 newborn New Zealand boys until they are 25. He has kept a close check on their sex lives as well as their sexually transmitted infections and has related the incidence of the latter to whether they were circumcised. He has made suitable allowances for every known eventuality: the number of sexual partners, their background and whether they used condoms. He found that circumcising baby boys at birth reduces their chances of transmitting sexual diseases, not only HIV, by a half. It has already been indicated that the likelihood of catching HIV from an infected person is reduced by a greater ratio than this.

Circumcision not only reduces sexually transmitted infections but also the number of urinary-tract infections in early life – a time when they may do lasting damage – and also of penile cancer and balanitis xerotica obliterans (BXO), a reasonably common condition of the penis that causes a chronic skin problem with shrivelling of the end of the penis so that the meatus (orifice) may become fibrosed and closed.

Jay Berkelhamer, president of the Paediatrics Society, has suggested that the policy of paediatricians towards circumcision laid down in 1999 in the US should be reviewed. He has been supported by other paediatricians in this plea. Colleagues, including Dr Edgar Schoen, of the Kaiser Permanente Medical Centre, California, have said that they would like parents to be told by their doctors that the benefit of circumcision now far outweighs its risks.

Thomas Wiswell, a professor of paediatrics from the University of Florida, has made the point that I have been supporting since the early 1970s when I started to practise genito-urinary medicine. It is that, despite increasing evidence of the advantages of circumcision in adult life, so far as STDs are concerned, any decision about circumcision is left to the paediatricians. Paediatricians are concerned only with a child's genitalia and urinary function, whereas it has other uses for the 60 adult years of a man's life.

Circumcision Fear

[From a question and answer feature with Dr Jane Collins,
The Times, 30th September 2006]

Q: Our eight-year-old son's foreskin will not pull back over the top of his penis. Our GP says he will need to be circumcised, and that it is better to get it done soon. Is there an alternative?

A: All boys are born with non-retractile foreskins. In the vast majority of boys, the foreskin will retract by puberty. There is a great deal of data suggesting that, in most cases, boys have a retractile foreskin by 4. But for some this won't happen until 5, 8, even 10 or 11, and this is nothing to worry about.

Don't be tempted to do anything to encourage the foreskin to retract. Eventually the adhesions holding the foreskin in place will begin to break down and it will gradually retract. It would, however, be reasonable to see a paediatric surgeon or paediatric urologist for advice. In the vast majority of cases the foreskin will, in time, retract naturally, without the need for surgical intervention.

Literary Extract

[From After the Victorians by A. N. Wilson]

One of the most striking ways in which the British male of this date expressed a feeling of kinship with the Jews was in the popularity of circumcision. "It is a curious fact," wrote Ronald Hyam in his masterly Empire and Sexuality, "that outside the traditional circumcising communities (Jewish, Muslim, Melanesian, Amerindian and some African) the only Westerners to adopt it as a common practice were the English-speaking peoples." The plot of George Eliot's last great novel, Daniel Deronda, published in 1876, had hinged upon the discovery by the central character that he was Jewish, a fact unknown until his mature years. An American critic of our day remarked that "Deronda had only to look". But not, in 1876, if he had been of Jewish origin, but brought up from birth as if gentile.

In the later generation, there would have been much greater opportunities for confusion. Circumcision became popular among the medical profession in the 1890s. Some attribute this fact to the pioneering skills of a Jewish doctor named Remondino. Others think that circumcision became popular in army medical circles, especially in India. The periodical literature in the Edwardian period is extensive. For example, the British Medical Journal of 15th June 1907 contains a learned lecture on the subject by J. Bland Sutton, FRCS, who outlines the history of the custom among Jews, Muslims, the Masai and the Kavindondos of East Africa. Clearly, there were circumstances where British doctors had undertaken the operation for the treatment of specific disorders. Dr Bland Sutton gives as an example: "The Museum of Charing Cross Hospital contains a prepuce removed from a man of 35 years of age, with an orifice so narrow that when urine escaped from the urethra it ballooned the prepuce to the size of an orange and it was then expelled by squeezing. Micturation required fifteen minutes." But this was the consequence of congenital phimosis. The practice of circumcision upon males whose religion did not require it was, for Bland Sutton, a modern development. He notes that in 1906, 54 children were circumcised at his own London hospital, the Middlesex, while at the Hospital for Sick Children in Great Ormond Street in the same year a striking 874 patients were circumcised.

In our own day, once more, something like 1 per cent of the male population of Great Britain is circumcised, and this almost always for ritualistic reasons. In the period of the Empire's heyday, however, especially among the professional and officer classes, the proportion was high. In the 1930s, a survey suggested that two thirds of public school-boys in Britain were circumcised. As the Empire declined, so did the circumcisions. In 1946, a survey of boys born on 4th March found that 38.8 per cent of the professional and salaried families had circumcised their sons, with 29.9 per cent of manual and unskilled workers. The separation of Cavaliers (uncircumcised) and Roundheads at private schools, from the Edwardian period to the early years of Elizabeth II, was something with which every privately educated British boy would have been jocularly familiar. Dr Remondino had believed that evolution would eventually lead to the disappearance of the prepuce altogether. Certainly, gentile doctors pointed to the much lower incidence among Jewish children of infant mortality, and there was a belief that circumcision was more hygienic. It is certainly remarkable that the British adoption of the habit coincided with the period, roughly from the 1890s to the 1950s, of the sand and heat of the Empire, though it is hard to see exactly why the popularity of this observance, hitherto in history of unambiguously religious significance, should be seen as "primarily an imperial phenomenon".

When Do You Want Your Sons Circumcised?

[By Diane Mason, The Globe and Mail, Toronto]

It's only a piece of skin. It shouldn't upset me so much. Anyway, there's nothing I can do about it now. Besides, the experts said it was the best choice; in 1986 when my twin sons were born, the operation was de rigueur. Back then, circumcision was performed on 85 per cent of North American boys.

I got the whole spiel from the medical folk. I have no religious requirements respecting the procedure, so circumcision was unnecessary in my case – but not according to the hospital staff. If I didn't have my sons circumcised, I was told, they'll be plagued with infections. They'll get cancer of the penis. They'll give their wives vaginal disorders. What's more, since their dad is circumcised, they'll be confused by the difference, and suffer psychological problems. The nurses assured me it was painless, and over in a flash. The message was: do your duty, mom, and get those little boys snipped!

I wish I could claim total ignorance. But even then there was discussion about circumcision being unnecessary and painful (although it wasn't a very loud discussion). Men – perhaps since they'd forgotten what it felt like to have it done – didn't speak out against it, and women seemed more concerned with “women's” issues. But even though there wasn't enough objection to make me halt the procedure, I was suspicious about the claim it didn't hurt. How could it not hurt, to have a piece of skin lopped from your genitals?

Not trusting my own judgment, I agreed to it. Shortly after the operation, however, I was in the hospital nursery, and happened to see the plastic frame used for the procedure. It was a small device (for babies are small) with a moulded form for the boy to be tied to, so he could be held down easily during the circumcision. I pictured my babies in that device, and instantly recognised what I'd done. Too late. Had I seen that thing earlier – had the hospital shown me what they were really doing – I never would have let them near my children.

Nevertheless, I put the matter aside. It was easy to forget what had been done and the boys healed up, of course. But recently, I've done some reading on the subject, and the whole question of circumcision came back to me. I wouldn't do it to my sons now, how could I do it to my babies?

There is evidence that circumcision is a devastating event that can have intense psychological repercussions. The foreskin is a complex and sensitive tissue, not just an appendix-like, superfluous tag of skin. It has functions. I had no idea, for instance, that the head of the penis is normally a mucous membrane that is permanently changed by the removal of the protective sheath. What remains is arguably scarred tissue. Yet because no baby says: “Hey, don't do that,” and no man circumcised in infancy knows what it's like to have a foreskin, the procedure continues.

Yet this procedure does damage. Why do we imagine that babies don't suffer and don't remember? How dare we take such a risk with their feelings, and their potential, as to do them such an injury? Looking back, my own weakness in the face of the status quo astounds me. But what astounds me more is that years later, this is still going on. We are still letting this happen to our boy babies.

Years ago, when we women suffered ignominy and unnecessary procedures in childbirth – shaving, enemas, being tied down while in labour – we banded together and said no. We changed things. We should be changing this, too. We women in particular should be advocating for our boys. These are our children, and later they become partners and lovers and friends. A man or a boy with the power to declare his choice would not agree to be tied up and submit to an unnecessary operation, without so much as an analgesic, with its attendant psychological, sexual and even physical repercussions. Surely we cannot believe our speechless babies have fewer rights.

We are the agents of our children's choice. I wish I had remembered that, when – as I held my new little boys in my arms – I was approached by the doctor who asked me, “When do you want them circumcised?”

The answer, of course, should have been: never.

Responses:

Diane Mason's essay rankled me, for all sorts of reasons. As a man, because I find the idea of circumcision-induced trauma to be preposterous. By the logic adduced by the writer, even something as superfluous as the umbilical cord shouldn't be cut, since it might cause undue physical strain on the infant. Should the coming generation of children be forced to walk around with a two-foot long tube of tissue coiled up inside their shirts?

I imagine that Ms. Mason's sons will read her article and express a collective “Huh?” to her argument. I have no doubt that they are perfectly well-adjusted boys, and will have healthy and happy sex lives, and might one day choose to have their own sons circumcised. Their mother should just relax.

Colin Krivy, Toronto

As a happily circumcised male, I am constantly chagrined at the preponderance of anti-circumcision articles in the media. These articles are, for the most part, written by women, who have no idea what it really is like to possess a penis. When Diane Mason uses phrases like “a devastating event” and “intense psychological repercussions,” and when she infers that the circumcised penis head is “scarred tissue” – I say, what claptrap! The only function the foreskin served was to protect the penis head from injury in the prehistoric days when men ran naked through the jungle.

From my experience, circumcision is a one-time, harmless improvement on nature.

Madonna's New Row Over Tot

[By Thomas Whitaker in The Sun, 6th December 2006]

Madonna is embroiled in a new row with the natural father of her adopted African son. The pop queen aims to have baby David Banda, one, circumcised. But dad Yohanne Banda, 32, says that this flies in the face of Malawian tradition.

The wrangle arose because Madonna, 48, wants to raise David in her Kabbalah religion – and circumcision marks the formal entry into the Jewish community. But potato farmer Yohanne said David had been baptised a Christian. He said last night: “This goes against the Christian religion and is not something we would ever consider in Africa. We don't ever get circumcised here. I would urge her to think again.”

Madonna and hubby Guy Ritchie, 38, are locked in a legal battle with human rights groups in Malawi who have won the right to scrutinise the adoption.

Foreskin Restoration

Whilst I am very pro circumcision and have been circumcised twice myself, I do appreciate that some members do lament the loss of their foreskin and wish they could restore it or at least some semblance of it. These members may therefore be interested in the following advertisement that appeared in the November 2006 edition of H & E naturist:

“CIRCUMCISED? NON-SURGICAL reversal of the procedure using simple but effective device to increase sensitivity and other benefits. Full details from Cavalier Products (H&E), PO Box 160, Lindford, Bordan, GU35 5AN”

As I have no wish to restore my foreskin and consider the sight of the fully exposed glans is far more attractive, I have not approached Cavalier Products. However I would welcome the views of any members who decide to try the product, preferably through the newsletter so that we all can benefit from their experience(s).

Court Rules Circumcision Of Four-year-old Boy Illegal

[from an article in Helsingin Sanomat]

Finland's first court ruling on male child circumcision has been handed down by a Finnish court. A Muslim mother faced charges of assault in Tampere District Court for having her four-year-old son circumcised. The incident was reported to the police by the boy's father, who had not been consulted. The court found that the mother's action was illegal. However, it did not assign any punishment. The mother defended her action by saying that she thought that circumcisions performed by doctors were legal in Finland. The case will now go to the Court of Appeals.

The mother said that the procedure is part of the family's religion and cultural heritage. The court found that interfering with personal inviolability could be allowed only in cases specifically permitted by law. “There is a perception in Finland that only girls' circumcisions are banned by law. There is no specific legislation about them; both types are illegal under the same criminal law. After all, in both procedures, part of healthy genitalia is removed without medical foundation, or competent consent”, says local prosecutor Jouko Nurminen. Nurminen says that the “misconception” may have arisen in connection with the drafting of the new constitution, at which time only the circumcision of girls was part of the debate. In its decision, the court notes that not even a long religious tradition justifies protecting the bodily inviolability of boys to a lesser degree than that of girls.

A working group of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health proposed a few years ago that circumcisions performed under medical supervision in hospitals should be allowed. The working group wanted to avoid complications from operations performed at home, and to reduce the suffering of the child. Legislation is somewhat vague on the matter, and practice varies in Finland. For instance, a report drafted by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health in 2004 notes that male circumcision is permitted in all countries. “There is no legislation on male circumcision, but there is also no prohibition. The operations have been performed on the basis of common law”, says Riitta-Maija Jouttimäki, a lawyer for the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health.

Rash Decisions

[From Love Bites by Sasha, Eye Weekly, Toronto]

Question: I'm an uncircumcised guy who occasionally gets dryness and irritation under the foreskin. I've stopped soaping the area when I'm showering (I just use the hot water and a bit of friction so things don't get skanky), and that does help, but I'm still uncomfortable from time to time. Would there be any potential hazards in moisturizing the area, or is it just like any other skin on my body? DRYLY CURIOUS.

Answer: You'll want to have a doctor look at the irritation to see if it's eczema or psoriasis, both of which can be treated (though not cured) with either pharmaceutical or herbal medication. You may certainly moisturize your penis, something many men do with great thoroughness. Some even discover localized allergies to various products this way. Perhaps you recall a letter writer from a few years back who realized he had a petroleum intolerance when his foreskin would swell after he applied Vaseline to it. My favourite part of this story, aside from his vivid description of it looking like “a cinnamon bun,” is that he continued to “sometimes use it to swell [his] penis (just a bit) for show.” As a seduction technique, I must say I found it rather uncommon, sort of like a child trying to impress the bigger kids by showing them the dead raccoon in the field behind the gas station.

When it comes to epidermal products, I would be inclined to give some special consideration to the penis, the skin of which is thin (making absorption easier) and contains lots of sensitive nerve endings. One balm you may find suitable is Stroke It, designed with male masturbation in mind, by the Lilith Moon Company.

Lily Fawn, the owner of Lilith Moon/Earth's Herbals, says the plants contained in Stroke It (calendula, chickweed, plantain, comfrey, sage) are considered antimicrobial and soothing. Roger Lewis, a chartered herbalist at Thuna Herbals (298 Danforth), confirms that all these plants are used in salves designed to heal cuts and abrasions and are also recommended in salves for women who have cracked nipples from breastfeeding. Your only real concern, after ruling out eczema or psoriasis, would be an allergy to beeswax, which is one of the emollients in Stroke It. If this is an issue, simple shea butter would also be appropriate, also available at Thuna.

If you don't use latex barrier protection with a partner, Stroke It also makes a handy vaginal (and anal) lube, especially since there's no glycerin or sugar in it.

The Story Behind The Pictures

When I completed and returned the latest questionnaire, I suggested that members might be prepared to forward photographs of their own (or a consenting friend's) penis for inclusion in the picture gallery. I submitted a few photographs of my penis and the Editor suggested that I might like to write an article giving some background about my circumcisions.

I did write an article 'Childhood Wish Fulfilled' that was included in issue 3/2000 in which I gave a fairly full account of my history. However, in order to give some narrative to the photographs, I will give a further very potted history.

Born in 1948 I was partially circumcised (according to my mother) at ten days old when I had a dorsal slit, in which my foreskin was simply sliced apart along the top of my penis for about half its length; no foreskin was actually removed. It had been my parents' wish that I be fully circumcised but the doctor would not do it. So I ended up with a penis where my glans was partially exposed when flaccid and I had a large amount of baggy foreskin draped around it.

When at school I was the only boy who had been cut like this: all the others were uncut or very distinctly circumcised. The split was about 50/50 circumcised to uncircumcised and of the cut boys two were very radically cut and had fairly high scars i.e. about half way up the shaft. They also had very taut skin on the shaft and very prominent totally exposed heads even when flaccid. The balance were generally loosely cut. Although there was no conflict/bullying etc between the roundheads and cavaliers, there were occasions when one was asked what your status was. I always said I was a roundhead, mainly because my closer friends were roundheads although to look at my penis it was obvious that I had more foreskin than any other roundhead.

I lived with my penis like this until 1988 when after a series of problems I decided, with my wife's full support, to have a revision circumcision to remove all the redundant foreskin. I had a private circumcision at the Surgical Advisory Centre (only cost £190 in those days) and although I asked the surgeon for a tight cut, the result, as you can see from the photographs, is fairly loose.

I am not particularly happy with the result and have made enquiries about having it tightened up considerably. However, costs for circumcisions and revision circumcisions seem to have spiralled out of all proportion and I am reluctant to line the pockets of greedy surgeons who are prepared to carry out the procedure. I note from issue 5/2006 that some members have suggested using a clinic at Custom House and quote it as being reasonably priced. When I looked on the internet the price for an adult redo circumcision was £800; hardly what I call a reasonable price. I would really like to see a full makeup of how this price is arrived at. Another factor that I have to consider is the time my penis will take to heal up and return to "normal" after the operation. As I am a life model, and am only paid when I work, I would not wish to decline too much work because of a swollen and bruised penis; I would also like the cut areas to have settled down before I expose my penis to students, artists, etc.

Ideally I would like a penis like the one shown on the internet – Circlist Splash Page – How Tight Should I Be Circumcised – Tightness. I would not mind having the body as well but at my age, dream on.

Noel Coward Advises Circumcision

The following anecdote appeared at the end of an interview with Derek Jacobi by Sally Vincent, reported in The Guardian on 19th September 2006.

Coward and Jacobi spent an evening together in 1966. They went to the theatre, then back to the Savoy for dinner and up to Coward's suite for late night drinks.

The gossip was riveting. It grew late. It was half past one in the morning. Green as grass, young Mr Jacobi rose to leave. "Derek," said the great man, "might I ask you a very personal question." All atremble lest the lovely evening be spoilt by a lunge, he stood his ground. "Are you circumcised?" "No, no, no," he answered. "Why do you ask?" Coward replied: "What a pity. What a great pity. You're a very fine actor, Derek, but you'll never be a great actor until you're circumcised." "Why?" he asked, edging for the door. "Freedom, dear boy," Coward explained mystifyingly. "Freedom." Jacobi was out the door and away.

Next day he wondered: Noel Coward must know something...maybe he should check himself into the London Clinic immediately. He did so want to be a great actor. As it turned out, he decided to risk it.

Bridling

The bridle is a device to rein in a horse. But when used as a verb, the word means to curb or control, and in this article it is restraint of the male sexual appetite which is under consideration. This was a matter of great concern in Victorian times and still exercises some people today. The ideal is sexual abstinence before marriage, sexual moderation within marriage. Any form of self-stimulation is of course completely forbidden.

Circumcision was seen as a very powerful tool in the bridling of sexual extravagance. If this resulted in some loss of sensitivity, and hence of sexual pleasure, this was something to be applauded as a means to the greater end. Below are some writings which encourage this point of view.

Every boy should be so circumcised that the remaining foreskin can never cover the corona, nor even the coronal sulcus just back of it. The frenulum and inner foreskin should be removed. This produces a complete or total circumcision. If the inner foreskin is turned back on the shaft rather than removed the full benefits of a total circumcision are not obtained.

A total circumcision provides the maximum protection against disease and maximum reduction of erotic sensations that lead to masturbation in children and uncontrollable sexual urges in youth and unmarried adults. Sufficient glans sensitivity remains, however, for healthy marital sex. Some doctors do hurried, sloppy, incomplete circumcisions. Be sure your doctor knows you want the frenulum cut, the inner foreskin removed and sufficient outer foreskin excised so that the sulcus behind the glans will never be covered. If your doctor is not in full agreement with this, get another doctor. The ideal time for circumcision is eight days after birth, but it can be done with benefit at any age.

Even adults benefit from circumcision. Much of the ejaculate of an uncircumcised man is lost under the foreskin. An infertile marriage is often corrected by circumcising the man. I recommend that any uncircumcised man whose wife is pregnant immediately gets circumcised (totally) to reduce the stress of abstinence during pregnancy. He will learn first hand the many benefits of circumcision and in nearly every case will want his sons circumcised. It is very unfortunate for the human race that the circumcision rite of the Hebrews did not become also law or custom among all races. Among Christians, it appears that the influence of Apostle Paul took precedence over Apostle Peter with the result that circumcision became an option rather than a requirement for Gentile Christians. Today the health and spiritual benefits of circumcision are well established. Some parents, however, unwisely refuse to have their male children circumcised because it causes a little pain and temporary soreness. In so doing the parents harm the child, subject him to great temptations, to health and hygiene problems and often ruin his life.

For the treatment of masturbation in the male, circumcision is undoubtedly the physician's closest friend and ally. To obtain the best results one must cut away enough skin and mucous membrane to rather put it on the stretch when erections come later. There must be no play in the skin after the wound has thoroughly healed, but it must fit tightly over the penis, for should there be any play the patient will be found to readily resume his practice not begrudging the time and extra energy required to produce the orgasm. It is true, however, that the longer it takes to have an orgasm, the less frequently it will be attempted, consequently the greater the benefit gained. The younger the patient operated upon the more pronounced the effect, though occasionally we find patients who were circumcised before puberty that require a resection of the skin, as it has grown loose and pliant after that epoch. But if we make sure that the skin is stretched tight during erection, then masturbation will become almost impossible and certainly unrewarding.

“Some people believe that circumcision is to remove a defect in man’s formation”, said Moses Maimonides, “but anyone can easily reply: ‘How can products of nature be so deficient as to require artificial completion, especially since the function and purpose of the prepuce to that organ is so evident – to protect the glans and thus preserve its voluptuous sensitivity?’”

“The commandment of circumcision has not been enjoined as a complement to a deficient physical creation, but as a means for perfecting man’s moral shortcomings. The bodily injury caused to that organ is exactly what is desired. It does not interrupt any vital function, nor does it destroy the power of generation. Circumcision simply counteracts excessive lust.”

*****

The glans gets tanned and loses most of its sensitivity through an early circumcision – and especially if the greatest possible amount of skin is removed – and great care should be taken to excise the delicate inner mucous membrane as totally as possible – thus we can get rid of the most sensitive and exquisite nerve endings. This reduces the penis’ erotic sensitivity and arousal the most, and the removal of the freely moving skin deprives the boy of the ability to masturbate. It is also advisable to cut through the frenulum, as this reduces the sensations of lust even further. Also, in the treatment of seminal emissions, circumcision is the best means of curing that disease, as the glans’ irritability is greatly diminished by the operation.

*****

The reduced genital eroticism will help your child live a chaste life. This will be particularly helpful during his teens when sexual temptation is great. When he marries he will be slower in reaching orgasm, a benefit to both him and his wife. Moreover, his wife will always know his penis is clean, and never fear contracting cervical cancer from him.

*****

A total circumcision removes the erotically hypersensitive inner foreskin and exposes, toughens and desensitises the glans. The freedom from genital irritations and the lowered erotic sensitivity will protect the child from the temptation to handle his genitals. It is highly unlikely that he will ever discover masturbation on his own. Even if introduced to masturbation by an evil (uncircumcised or only partially circumcised) companion, a totally circumcised child with no freely movable skin will most likely find the act unrewarding and not acquire the habit.

Editorial

Circumcision cuts the risk of HIV infection by half. That is the welcome news from a recently published research study in Africa. Indeed the results were so emphatic that the study was ended early – it had become unethical not to offer the intact men in the trial the greater protection afforded by circumcision. I shall return to the implications of the results for Africa and beyond in a later issue of the newsletter. But for now, in countries ravaged by AIDS, the study offers not just a ray but an enormous beam of hope. No wonder that men are already queuing up to get cut.

My Editor's Column reports on the responses to the newsletter questionnaire distributed with issue 3/2006. The very good return rate indicates a high level of interest amongst members. Now please reflect that level of interest by renewing your membership! Many of you have already done so – my grateful thanks. For the more dilatory amongst you, a reminder is enclosed. Please do renew – otherwise unfortunately the Acorn Society now has to bid you farewell.

Editor's Column

Your newsletter – what you think

Forty seven members completed the newsletter questionnaire distributed with issue 3/2006. This is an exceptional response rate and I am very grateful to all of you who took the time to return the sheet.

On the front page of the questionnaire, you were given 27 types of article or feature that appear in the Acorn newsletter and you were asked to indicate your degree of interest in each – Very interested, Interested or Not interested. I have ranked the types of article in order of interest (giving greater weight to Very interested than Interested) and the rank order is shown in the table.

The clear winner is Circumcision techniques. This is interesting as the newsletter under my editorship has contained little on this topic. Perhaps this dearth has caused the interest! Anyway, the message has been taken to heart and I will try to make circumcision techniques a regular topic in future. I start in this issue with the forceps guided method (see page 14).

Images of cut penises featured second on the list. Amongst the additional suggestions, which I will come to later, was the proposal that members should submit photographs of their own equipment for publication. In this age of digital cameras and remote control or delayed action, this is a simpler task than when films had to be processed by Snappy Snaps. The photos can be taken in the privacy of your own bedroom and can then be downloaded to your computer; or the camera card can be taken to your local Boots and you can print off the photos personally. Ideally there should be different views – front, side, flaccid, erect, foreskin (if still present) forward and back etc. It would be marvellous if these were accompanied by a short account of when you were circumcised (if indeed you are) and your opinions/feelings about your present state. On the principle that I should not ask others to do what I am not prepared to do myself, it is your editor that features on page 5. Now I can really challenge you all – can we keep “A Member’s member” going as a regular feature?

Third and fifth on the list are members’ accounts of their circumcision and members’ childhood reminiscences and experiences. I am in your hands about this – I will publish what I receive but, apart from a few stalwarts to whom I am eternally grateful, my appeals for material usually fall on barren ground. I am hoping to start a telephone interview process but I need to set myself up in terms of recording equipment first. More on this in a later issue. In the meantime, I have reproduced on page 15 an account from the internet of a tonsillectomy that turned into a double operation.

The level of interest in many of the topics is high. Even as far down as Religious circumcision, over 70% are either very interested or interested. It is at this point in the table that the emphasis turns from circumcision to the foreskin, and it has to be admitted that the level of members not interested shows a sharp increase from this point onwards. Nevertheless, even the final topic in the list attracts a 36% level of interest. This is a large minority, and the overall results would certainly not justify the newsletter becoming a foreskin free zone. So I shall retain what I hope is an eclectic mix, but I shall try to ensure that the balance reflects the degree of interest shown by members.

The second part of the questionnaire gave you the chance to list other ideas for features or articles in the newsletter – and many of you took the opportunity. Some themes emerged. The idea of compulsory circumcision seems popular whether for entry to preparatory or public school or whilst in the armed forces. On a similar theme, circumcision to discourage masturbation also got a number of votes. (The article ‘Bridling’ in the last issue should have appealed to this constituency.) There were several requests for a contact corner where members can advertise their willingness to enter into correspondence. This will be revived from the next issue and will continue to appear for as long as I receive entries from members. Please let me have your advertisements now!

There were suggestions that the newsletter should also cover hoodectomy – the removal of the clitoral hood in women; that is, female circumcision (although that term is now widely misused to describe female genital mutilation involving excision of the clitoris itself and parts of the labia). But I have taken the view that Acorn is about male genitalia. This doesn't of course preclude the female voice being heard within our pages. This would be attractive to many of you, so if any member wishes to encourage his spouse or partner to write about foreskins and circumcision from the female point of view I would be happy to print her contribution. And since Acorn is a discrimination-free zone, I would equally like to hear from male partners.

From my point of view, the exercise has been well worth while. It has provided some validation for what has been appearing in Acorn under my editorship but it has also shown the emphases that you, the readers, would like in the future. I shall certainly use the table to audit the make up of the newsletter over a series of issues to ensure that I am covering all topics of interest.

But remember, many of the topics can only be covered with your help. Why not make 2007 the year that you write, as well as read, about your favourite subject?

Circumcision Etc – Some Personal Comments

My late father was a doctor, but I don't think he entered into any discussion about my circumcision with the obstetrician who delivered me. I had a high shaft foreskin amputation which left a considerable section of my penis denuded of prepuce and a long white scar. If father had had any collusion on the style of cut, I'm sure it wasn't his intention to discourage masturbation in later life. He never actually sat me down and taught me how to do it but during my adolescent years, whenever I was in a stropky mood, he would consign me to my bedroom with the not-to-be-disobeyed instruction to "go and toss yourself off – you'll feel in a much better mood afterwards!" ...Sound advice which I have followed ever since into my 74th year.

I started masturbating in earnest at the age of nine but couldn't ejaculate until I was about 15. I recall that my circumcision was never commented upon by my school friends though the late appearance of my pubic hair fascinated them to the extent that I began shaving it off as soon as it began to appear, to give me an excuse for having so little. I have remained shaved, incidentally, to this day! Being "cut" never interfered in any way with my masturbatory activities. I have been at least a twice-a-day man since the outset and that, as an aside, represents 14 wanks a week, or 628 a year, or 30,164 in the 48 years since I could first "cum" at 15. Turn that into approximately 4 ml of ejaculate per time, and that represents over 120 litres of my semen that have flowed under the bridges of time.

But I am not a "big man" down under. I could never manage more than about six and a quarter inches and I have sometimes wondered whether the tightness of my circumcision scar along the shaft of my penis has had a splinting effect which has constrained its size. After all, they used to bind the feet of Japanese Geisha Girls to keep them small and petite.

The status of my penis has never been of the slightest concern to me. Apart from a teenage craze for creating various rubber gadgets by cutting the ends off sausage balloons and condoms to fit over my glans to see what it might feel like to have a foreskin, I've never bothered one jot about my cock. If other guys don't like it they can lump it! Cut or not cut – I couldn't give a toss!

A Member's Member

Unfortunately my mother was opposed to infant circumcision so I remained intact during my childhood. By my late teens I had decided that I preferred the cut look but circumcision on demand was just not available in those days. It took several years and feigned medical problems to persuade a surgeon to operate and I eventually lost my foreskin in my mid-thirties.

The cut was very neat but quite loose – bunching around the corona and particularly on the underside in the frenular region. By this time the Surgical Advisory Service was advertising circumcision and I underwent a revision at the hands of Mr Hassan. This removed all the excess foreskin and my frenulum so that I now have a radical, low, tight cut. The photos reflect this.

I have always been pleased to be circumcised, both physically and psychologically, and have never suffered the loss of sensitivity that circumcision is claimed to cause. Having been both intact and cut during my sexual maturity, I can speak from experience! Consequently I am very supportive of men who wish to be circumcised as adults.

Snip That Saves Lives

from an article by Sarah Boseley in the *Guardian

Circumcision can halve the risk of a man acquiring the HIV infection that leads to Aids, US scientists reported in December. Two major trials, in Kenya and Uganda, have confirmed what doctors and campaigners have suspected and hoped for several years. The results have major implications for the fight against the AIDS pandemic raging in Africa and Asia.

Kevin de Cock, head of the World Health Organisation (WHO) HIV/Aids department, said it could cut the numbers of infected men by “many tens of thousands, many hundreds of thousands and maybe millions over coming years”.

Participants in the trials were randomly selected either to be circumcised or not. All participants were counselled on other HIV prevention methods. In the Kenya trial there were 69 infections among the 2,784 participants, 22 of whom were in the circumcision group and 47 of whom were not. In Uganda 65 men out of 4,996 were infected with HIV, 22 of whom were in the circumcised group and 43 in the uncircumcised group.

The two trials should have gone on into next year but were called to an abrupt halt by the funder, the National Institute of Allergies and Infectious Diseases (NIAID), after an interim review of the data showed a halving of the risk of infection among those circumcised. Now that the point is proven to the satisfaction of scientists, it would be unethical to continue. All the uncircumcised participants will be offered the procedure. With a vaccine still decades away, the circumcision results are the best news in a long while out of the AIDS pandemic. But there are questions still unanswered and a lot of work still to do.

Anthony Fauci, director of NIAID, said the 48% reduction among men in the trial in Rakai, Uganda, and the 53% reduction among those in Kisumu, Kenya, “could be negated by small reductions in condom use or the addition of additional sexual partners". It was vital, he warned, that people understood the need to continue to protect themselves by condom use and safe sex. Circumcision dramatically cuts the risk of HIV infection, but Mr de Cock said: "It is not a magic bullet." There was no sign that the 2,784 men in the Kenyan trial and the 4,996 men taking part in Uganda had become reckless in their sexual practices, said Dr Fauci, "but now the announcement is out, we are cognisant that there could be [an effect]".

Mitchell Warren, executive director of the AIDS vaccine ASdvocay Coalition, said the results were "a milestone in the history of the AIDS epidemic" but urged that circumcision be rolled out only in the context of other prevention measures.

There are other serious issues. Circumcision was carried out by skilled medical professionals in the trials and all those involved had aftercare in case of complications. The WHO intends to tell governments to ensure that circumcision is carried out in a similar hygienic and skilled fashion. But that will necessitate setting up clinics and giving staff the skills to carry out the surgical procedure and follow patients up. It is likely that, now the good news is out, a booming trade in adult male circumcision will develop among those who have no medical qualifications with potentially harmful consequences.

There are also cultural obstacles to overcome, because for some groups circumcision is not normal practice. In India Muslims are circumcised while Hindus are not. At the International AIDS Conference in Toronto in August Bill Clinton warned that if the trial results went the way they have: "We will have a big job to do. It is important that as we leave here we all be prepared for the green light that could have a staggering impact on the male population but that will frankly be a lot of trouble to get done." Scientists say there are several biological reasons why circumcision may decrease the transmissibility of HIV. The mucosal surface of the foreskin contains large numbers of cells particularly susceptible to being targeted by the virus and the area under the foreskin is moist.

A further study continues, investigating whether women whose partners are circumcised are less likely to become infected.

No Skin Off My Dick

A report of the anti-circumcision conference in Seattle by Dave Maass in the Seattle Stranger, 31st August 2006

The Ninth International Symposium on Circumcision, Genital Integrity, and Human Rights is part academic conference, part anti-circumcision rally. This year's symposium, running 24–26th August, is in Seattle, home to the national organization Doctors Opposing Circumcision. DOC's executive director is local attorney John Geisheker. He's busted his balls bringing the event to the University of Washington.

The International AIDS Conference was held a week earlier in Toronto, where Bill Clinton voiced support for controversial HIV research involving circumcision. The report claimed that men with foreskins are 60 per cent more likely to contract HIV than circumcised men. In reaction, a petition is circulating around the symposium entreating the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to pursue a vaccine instead of “embroiling Third World citizens as test subjects in a giant experiment that has already proved a failure in the U.S.”

The lobby is filled with books, videos, T-shirts, and “Not circumcised? Lucky stiff!” bumper stickers. There are more than 40 presentations, including anthropological data, gruesome medical reports, legislative and judicial updates, stories of desperation and inspiration, and a musical lament for the foreskin by local songwriter Jess Grant: “Every time I go to the bathroom to take a pee/I’m holding the evidence of what they did to me...”

Many of the attendees are males, or mothers of males, who were damaged physically and psychologically by circumcision. They claim they won’t surrender while boys are still being subjected to the same trauma. “One of the deepest instincts we have is to protect our reproductive organs. If someone did it to you right now, you’d hunt the bastard down,” says William Stowell, the first American adult male to sue a doctor over neonatal (newborn) circumcision. He’s counselling Arthur Coons, a 19-year-old student at UW who’s contemplating a similar lawsuit. “That was my mindset. It’s not anymore.” I ask whether Coons’s circumcision was “medically successful” or “botched”. “Is there a circumcision that isn’t botched?” he replies. “I’m a runner and it hurts like hell. It’s not comfortable, a lot of problems came from it. So, no, I don’t think there is such a thing as a medically successful circumcision.”

On Friday, I see Dr. Paul Tinari, an intactivist celebrity and last-minute presenter: At age 8, priests at Tinari’s boarding school circumcised him as punishment for masturbating. Earlier this year, Tinari became the first Canadian to have his provincial health service pay for foreskin-replacement surgery. I follow Tinari to a basement classroom where 17 grey-haired doctors are gathered for box lunches and a strategy discussion. Tall, gaunt, and furious, Tinari hijacks the meeting. “Everyone I hear are waving their arms and saying we don’t have a stick big enough to hit back at this issue,” Tinari announces. “I’ve come to the conclusion, after years of studying, that no appeal to morality will ever end circumcision. You have to make it so financially painful that it ends by punishing practitioners. How do you do that? I may have the tool that we’ve been looking for.”

Tinari’s big stick is “nanobacteria”, a slowly replicating pathogen that is transmitted in the same ways as HIV. In a letter to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Tinari links nanobacteria to everything from Alzheimer’s disease to breast cancer and claims nanobacteria enter the body through neonatal circumcision. Thus, the door is open for lawsuits against doctors and hospitals. Tinari’s fiery-eyed delivery energizes some doctors, especially the delegation from England. Others, including Dr. Fleiss, are sceptical. Tinari’s doctorate is in engineering, not medicine. In Canada, he’s “Dr. Future,” a futurist who once told the Vancouver Courier that cyborg insects will one day be used for military reconnaissance. Geisheker tells Tinari he doubts the plan’s feasibility, considering the prohibitive legal costs. Geisheker has funded several cases out of his own pocket. “I find it weird,” he tells me later. “I’m perfectly open to the idea, but I need to see the science before I run it up the flagpole.” Later, Tinari contributes his strategy for combating Islamic circumcision: “You casually say ‘show me the verse in the Koran which calls for circumcision.’ There is none. Then you can really hit them: ‘Well I guess you want your kids to look Jewish.’” The doctors burst into hysterical laughter. Especially the Jewish ones.

I sneak off to bum a clove cigarette from Primus Lake, an Indonesian STD researcher whose stumbling English keeps him from mingling. As we talk and smoke, he presents a conundrum. Imagine you’re out in the Indonesian drylands, educating non-Muslim men about the dangers of their adult-circumcision ritual, which requires them to screw three women to purify their open circumcision wounds. They already believe the rite makes them impervious to disease. Now, imagine that globally recognized authority figure Bill Clinton announces that circumcision can prevent AIDS. “It will be a disaster,” says Lake, who attended the Toronto conference. “Logically, [HIV transmission] is connected to our behaviour. If you’re having risky sex and don’t use a condom, although you are circumcised, you are still at risk. “I told them, ‘we can help people do it the right way, but don’t promote it!’”

The Direction of *The Acorn Society

In issue 6/2006, an article by J.H. of Dorset urged the Society to become exclusively pro-circumcision and adopt a more campaigning stance.

Here are the responses of members.

Become pro-active

I am very pro-circumcision as you will have realised from my paper describing my experiences – A Clean-Cut Young Sailor – published in two parts (issues 2/2005 & 3/2005).

However I wouldn’t go to the extent of buttonholing strangers in the street to try to convince them of the benefits. Nevertheless, since there is overwhelming anti-circumcision propaganda – in print and on the internet, I think it would be a good idea if our Society changed its policy of even-handed neutrality to become pro-active.

Money well spent

J.H. has mentioned me in his article and my views agree with his. It is a great pity that Great Britain does not emulate Israel and institute neonatal circumcision for all males. I am convinced that it would be money well spent by the NHS in saving a lot of later expenditure on the huge range of problems a foreskin can cause – HIV, STDs and cervical cancer to name a few.

I genuinely feel that Acorn can help to bring this about if we get off the fence and actively preach the gospel.

R.W. – Surrey

Fanaticism is dangerous

I wholeheartedly disagree with J.H.'s views on the direction of the Acorn Society. The great joy of reading the magazine is the balance of views expressed and the ability to consider both sides of the issue of circumcision.

Having been cut only a few years ago, I am well situated to understand the multitude of sensations and emotions that are involved. Although I had a desire for circumcision from boyhood onwards, it was only by becoming entangled in a virulent pro-circ on-line group that I took the final steps. The result has not given me sex "a million times better", as the group was claiming, but on the other hand I am not bitterly disappointed. On balance, I have no real regrets, but do feel that the benefits of circumcision were grossly over-played.

Fanaticism in all its forms is dangerous, as the world has witnessed in recent years. It is far more constructive to take a balanced view of everything, whether in matters of religion or politics or general attitude to life. One must never forget that the other person's view might be right. If the Acorn Society becomes one of these fanatical groups, then this will be my last subscription.

D.B. – Askham, Newark, UK

A forum for debate

I would like the Acorn Society to remain as it is; a forum for discussion by both circumcised and uncircumcised men. Even if the membership slant is pro circumcision, I feel we will lose the ability to debate issues if we exclude the uncircumcised views. I am pro circumcision and said so in the article I wrote for the last newsletter. However I also sent news of a foreskin restoration facility advertised in H&E Naturalist. If we exclude from the Society the uncircumcised members who wish to retain their foreskins, how many members will the Society lose? I would quite like to know how many members there are currently – I have sent a cheque for £12 for 2007; have all the 2006 members re-joined and if not why not?

I would like some details of how J.H. proposes to promote circumcision to the "masses" in the UK. I thought the Gilgal Society were promoting circumcision and have been for some years; I have not noticed them having much success. I note from The Times article reprinted in issue 6/2006 as 'The Times Doctor praises RIC' that the surgeon was keen to see circumcision make a comeback and he put forward some compelling arguments; but I do not see much support for this action elsewhere in the UK. I wish there was.

Another point I have noticed is that Parenting and Baby books these days do not even mention circumcision as "an option" when talking about care of the male child. These books used to discuss the reasons why circumcision is carried out: religious, social, medical, but tended to advise against the procedure. Now, it seems, the authors of these books feel they have so removed the thought of circumcision from the knowledge of most parents where circumcision is not a religious requirement that they no longer need even to mention the operation. Consequently circumcision appears to have been relegated to the shelf to be brought down only if there is a medical problem; much the same as any other operation for “childhood medical” problems – appendectomy or tonsillectomy. These operations are not considered to be in the routine category and available to parents on request, and circumcision, so it seems, has now joined the list. Whilst I agree parents should have the right to decide whether they have their son(s) circumcised, information about the procedure and reasons for it seem to be withheld.

In addition the cost parents are going to have to pay for a circumcision may be prohibitive to many, particularly if as a result of the birth the mother’s income is going to be lost or much of it used for nursery care etc. For single mothers, paying for a circumcision is, I would suggest, not only far from their minds but financially totally prohibitive.

With the NHS in its strapped for cash situation it is unlikely that free circumcisions will be available to the masses. Politicians are looking at ways to save money not increase the burden on the Service. Look at the way NICE is trying to block some drugs which are proven to help a number of mental disorders, bone diseases, arthritis etc purely on the grounds of cost.

I would suggest that unless the pro circumcision lobby can show to the NHS that paying for the circumcising of young boys will show significant monetary savings to the NHS then it is very unlikely the procedure will again be made generally available. A very sorry state of affairs to the likes of me and others. But I am a realist and unless J.H. has some ideas of how to change the minds of the ‘Powers That Be’ I cannot see the situation changing.

C.B. – Cornwall

A dedicated organisation

Although I am not a resident of Britain, I am interested in the incidence of circumcision in the land of my birth. There seems to be a sad lack of that operation for boys in Britain today.

I strongly support the suggestion that Acorn become an organisation that is dedicated to furthering the operation of circumcision. There are quite a number of apparently well-financed (financed by whom, I wonder?) groups who are rabidly against circumcising boys. I would like to see those balanced by as many pro-active groups who advocate male circumcision including RIC. I would therefore personally prefer Acorn to be a group which actively promotes male circumcision.

D.B. – New Zealand

Circumcision is beneficial

I would like to see Acorn promote circumcision, including RIC with parental consent. With NORM-UK at the other end of the spectrum, we need to have a clear identity of what we believe in, i.e. circumcision is beneficial to males.

H.F. – Cambridge

Not just pro-circ

The article 'Just what is the purpose of circumcision?' (issue 6/2006) provides detailed and balanced information on the subject, and I cannot agree with J.H.'s blinkered comment that "If the Acorn Society decides to continue on its present path of self-destruction and not become pro-active and pro-circumcision as R.W. and I (and others) would wish, we will take matters into our own hands and form a new pro-circumcision group ourselves."

Surely the intention of Acorn is not simply to act as a pro-circ forum – the Gilgal Society fulfils that role quite effectively – but to provide information for both circumcised and intact men concerning foreskin and penile related matters that are difficult or embarrassing to discuss openly. Besides, becoming a pro-circ forum would mean fighting a losing battle, because the medical establishment is generally anti-circumcision.

G.B. – Kent

Work to be done

Like J.H., I too had a few years absence from the Society because I wearied of the anti-circumcision content which seemed to be in the ascendancy at the time. In doing so, I did, and still do, appreciate that the editor has to represent the contributions received and can only publish what members submit. Since my return, the balance has been better, indeed, it has now swung much the other way, I guess the anti-circumcision tendency are the ones drifting off now.

One argument for keeping both sides in one society is that it is a catalyst for debate and should produce more lively correspondence. But, in practice, whichever side of the debate you live, you soon realise that mindsets are just that. Therefore as Herrick said: 'He who is not open to conviction is not qualified for debate.'

Our prejudices are born from our experience and if circumcision has been a boon and a blessing to us (as in my own case) no one is going to persuade us it can be otherwise. Likewise, those who remain intact can never know the joy of unfettered foreskinless sex, unless they take the irreversible step to have their prepuce removed. Of course, I equally concede those of us who were cut in childhood, before our first sexual experience, cannot attest to the efficacy of 'natural' intercourse. 'What you've never had, you never miss' may be a comfort to circumcisees, but it highlights the difficulty for intact guys in making the decision to part with their foreskin.

Binding such disparate groups in one Society makes strange bedfellows. (No pun intended!). If we are to have objects, as any Society should, then they should be broadly in common. If reports on the disposition of our current membership are correct, then Acorn should change to reflect it and become a PRO circumcision group. However, I would never be the one to snuff out free speech in any organisation. If Acorn magazine is to become a pro-circ platform, it would also be healthy for it to have a regular feature in every issue fenced around and called: 'A Dissenting View'. I would envisage this be occupied by one negative letter or article from the media or internet, posted for anyone who cared to read it.

There is certainly a raison d'être for a PRO circumcision Society in the UK today. Widespread ignorance of the benefits of the procedure prevail everywhere in the media, and, more surprisingly, in the medical profession. A generation of doctors and parents here has arisen where few fathers outside religious communities are cut. Those few will be the result of medical expediency to cure a foreskin problem. Only a tiny minority will have had sensible parents who, privately, perpetuated the tradition within their families from which, they perceived, they themselves had benefited.

What a sad, far cry from the situation which prevailed in my day, 50-60 years ago. Today, suggesting to most proud parents of a newborn son that they might consider circumcising him for similar prophylactic reasons as they will value for vaccinating him, will be met with shocked astonishment and thought as 'weird'. Such has been the success of anti-circumcisionists in managing the public perception of the procedure that advocates are howled down with downright untruths. One favourite is: 'There is no medical reason to circumcise.' So why does the NHS, which is largely opposed to circumcision on both medical mindset and budgetary reasons, perform over 30,000 of them every year? Foreskins foster many problems for a surprisingly high proportion of males.

So there is work to be done for those of us who would like to see this situation changed. It means writing to correct the media when it fails to give proponents a fair hearing. Invariably articles are launched from the standpoint that circumcision is outdated, questionable and anachronistic – a curiosity which has no value. At the same time these same editors are running hand-wringing reports on the increase in sexually transmitted diseases, the spread of which circumcision mitigates and often prevents.

Each one of us has a circle of friends and acquaintances whom we should inform whenever the subject arises. We could question those we know who are health care professionals if we are on good enough terms to argue and persuade. The Gilgal Society – www.gilgalsoc.org – which exists to promote circumcision has a range of leaflets which are available at nominal cost and can be usefully distributed or left in strategic places.

Whilst this may mean acting as individuals, it would be good to do it as part of The Acorn Society where we can report strategy and exchange ideas.

Is Superman Jewish?

In a BBC radio 4 programme with the above title, the origin of Superman was traced to the Jewish American, Jerry Segal, who dreamt of the superhero character during the depression. Jewish immigrants with suitable talent worked for comics, being banned from reputable print. For the first appearance of superman in 1938, Joe Schuster drew the Segal character. In Nazi propaganda, Jerry Segal was referred to as "that circumcised chap".

So Superman has a Jewish origin but a circumcised superhero too? In the 1978 film the young naked arrival from Krypton was clearly circumcised. With babies clipped on Krypton, “Clipped on” would have been a more suitable name for the exploded planet. The New Yorker used the term “cheesy looking” (despite Superman’s absence of foreskin!).

Circumcision Techniques 1

The Guided Forceps method

The guided forceps method is an adaptation for older children and adults of the Jewish Shield and Knife method used for babies. With the foreskin in a natural “resting” position, the intended line of the incision is indicated with a marker pen; the line should correspond with the corona just under the head of the penis.

The foreskin is then grasped at the 3 and 9 o’clock positions with two artery forceps and the foreskin is pulled forward and out in front of the glans. These forceps are placed on the natural apex of the foreskin in such a way as to put equal tension on the inside and outside surfaces of the foreskin. If it is not done correctly, there is the risk of leaving too much mucosal skin or removing too much shaft skin. Sufficient tension is put on the foreskin to pull the previously made mark to just clear of the glans. Taking care not to catch the glans, a large pair of forceps (Artery forceps) is then clamped across the extended foreskin, just proximal to the mark, and immediately in front of the glans at an angle parallel to the base of the glans (the corona), not straight. Once the forceps is in position the surgeon should feel the glans to check that it has not been accidentally caught in the forceps.

A scalpel is run along the outside edge of the forceps to remove the foreskin, in much the way a barber might hold a lock of hair between his fingers and snip it with a pair of scissors. The metal arm of the forceps guides the incision. The forceps have the dual function of stopping bleeding and safeguarding the glans from injury. Once the clamp is released, the outer layer of skin retracts, and the inner layer is then manually retracted to expose the raw area. Bleeding vessels are identified and clipped with artery forceps. The two edges are then sutured together.

The tightness and relative amounts of inner and outer foreskin remaining depend on adjustments made before the forceps are fully closed although this method can leave a little bit of extra foreskin around the ridge at the bottom of the glans. There will be a V pointing towards the tip on the ventral (under) side of the penis, and a matching V pointing towards the base on the dorsal (upper) side of the penis. The frenulum will still be present although it can be removed either before or after the circumcision if desired. Since it is hard to stretch the skin exactly equally, one or other V may be more prominent, and there may be other irregularities in the scar line.

Topped And Tailed

As a child, I always seemed to have a sore throat, and visits to the doctor were a regular occurrence. He could not do much – this was in the days before antibiotics – but my mother had an agenda. She wished to have my tonsils removed. She had had the operation herself as a child and she was quite convinced that it would be a cure for me. The doctor, unusually, resisted, for at that time tonsillectomy was still a popular operation. “The child will grow out of it,” he used to say. But on one visit, he gave a hostage to fortune. “You will see, by the time he is thirteen or fourteen, sore throats will be a thing of the past.” Two attacks of tonsillitis at thirteen gave my mother her opening, and this time the doctor conceded, whether through weariness with my mother or because he was now convinced a tonsillectomy would be useful, I don’t know. “Very well. I will arrange a hospital appointment for him.” But this was not good enough for my mother. She claimed that panel patients (she hadn’t really accommodated to the introduction of the NHS) had their tonsils guillotined whereas private patients had the operation done properly. She insisted on a private referral and a few days later we found ourselves at a house in the expensive part of town with an appointment to see the recommended surgeon, Mr Nightingale – a wonderful name for an ENT consultant.

Mr Nightingale took my history, examined my throat and not unexpectedly, recommended a tonsillectomy. He was hardly going to give up the opportunity of a nice fee. Near the end of the appointment, whilst he was still looking down at his notes, Mr Nightingale coughed discreetly and murmured: “May I ask whether the boy has been circumcised?” Flustered at being asked such an intimate question, my mother went bright red and stuttered: “No. We did enquire at the clinic when he was a baby but, being wartime, they said they didn’t have enough doctors.” Mr Nightingale sighed sympathetically. “I’m afraid that that was so often the case but it meant that a lot of boys were disadvantaged. But” his tone brightened “I can perform a circumcision at the same time as the tonsillectomy. It is only a small operation and the boy can convalesce from the two operations at the same time. Most parents are pleased to take the opportunity to remedy the situation.” “Well” said my mother, “if you think it is for the best.” “Oh yes,” enthused the surgeon “it is much cleaner and healthier, and,” he lowered his tone “it does discourage unfortunate habits as the boy grows older. He will thank you for it in later years.”

Thus the fate of my foreskin was decided. I was not consulted – the conversation took place as if I was not in the room. Today, no doubt, a thirteen year old would have no hesitation in putting his point of view vociferously, but times were different then, and children were still seen but not heard.

At the beginning of the Easter holidays, I entered the private ward of the local cottage hospital. The surgeon came to see me the evening before the operation and checked my throat. Then I was asked to lower my pyjamas. Mr Nightingale looked down at me and addressed me in a loud voice as if I were deaf or an idiot. "Now, young man," he boomed. "Tomorrow, when I remove your tonsils, I am also going to circumcise you. This means that I shall cut away your foreskin" (he picked up the offending part of my penis) "so that the head is permanently uncovered like this." (He pulled back my doomed foreskin and exposed my glans.) "It will be a bit sore for a few days, but once it has healed, it will be much better for you." He looked across at the nurse and shook his head. "It ought to have been done years ago," he said. The next day, I lost my tonsils and my foreskin.

How did I feel about being circumcised? I was a bit resentful at first, but then I gradually realised that I liked the look and feel of my remodelled penis. The surgeon had given me a very thorough circumcision – no spare skin and the frenulum completely gone – and since I have quite a large glans, it is displayed in all its glory. Whatever people say about circumcision reducing sensitivity, my member has given me, and others, a great deal of pleasure during my life, and it has played its part in the conception of my two sons.

They still have their tonsils but their foreskins were harvested soon after birth. I bypassed the NHS and found a Jewish mohel who was willing to do some Gentile moonlighting. He gave them neat cuts with their glans nicely denuded. I am pleased to say that my grandson has also been circumcised, but that may have something to do with his having been born in the US.

Oh – and I don't get sore throats anymore.

Ask Emma

[The following question and answer appeared in the Guardian on Saturday 13th November 2004]

Q: I am 37 and have lichen sclerosis on my penis. I was recently hospitalised because scarring had begun to affect my ability to pass urine. This condition is chronic and the medical profession has little idea of the cause. Any ideas on treatment would be gratefully received.

A: Although not fully understood, lichen sclerosis is thought to be related to two major causal factors: an overactive immune system or a bacterium that may cause the immune system to become active. A natural antibacterial such as Goldenseal may be helpful in the long term. Because the foreskin hardens with this condition, omega 3 and 6 fatty acids will be good for their moisturising and detoxifying properties. Crucially, you need to consider circumcision, where usually the condition disappears. I'd also advise treatment from a homeopath or naturopath.

Editorial

A very large proportion of the articles in this issue have been submitted by members. This is an excellent state of affairs. Please, keep up the good work!

Routine prophylactic infant circumcision has long been a lost cause in the UK, certainly as far as the NHS is concerned. The appearance of a petition on the Downing Street website urging NHS access to circumcision for infants is therefore interesting. Is this just spitting in the wind or is it perhaps a straw in that wind indicating that the potential health benefits of circumcision are again about to be recognised?

Meanwhile, my article 'Bridling' at the end of last year, which quoted mainly Victorian sources extolling radical circumcision to prevent masturbation, has caused some comment. One member is astounded by its severity, but two others commend total circumcision as optimal. Is there a trade-off between tightness and sensitivity – the greater the loss of foreskin, the greater the loss of sensitivity – or does tightness actually bring the ultimate in sensitivity? Will there ever be a consensus on the issue? Your opinions and experiences would be very welcome.

Circumcision And The Control Of HIV

Late last year, a report was published demonstrating that circumcision reduces by more than a half a man's chances of becoming infected by HIV. This may be the most significant news for Africa for a generation.

To get some measure of the problem, just consider Swaziland. Here, staying clear of the virus is hard – close to 40% of adults are living with HIV/AIDS, the highest infection rate anywhere in the world according to the United Nations Children's Fund (Unicef). HIV prevalence among 20 to 30-year-olds is already nearing 50%, even higher than the national adult average. These are frightening figures. Potentially one in two young adults faces illness and a drastically curtailed life expectancy. The disease threatens the very survival of their society. Few plagues are this virulent. And plagues usually target the weak disproportionately. It is the old and the very young who succumb. Devastating though this is for the families affected, the adults at least survive so that the economic life of the community is preserved and more children can be conceived to replace those lost. AIDS acts in exactly the reverse manner. It is the most sexually active whom the disease targets i.e. the young adults who would normally be economically active and producing children. As they die, the society collapses and the very old are left to care for the very young in conditions of abject poverty.

The new study offers hope. In two carefully controlled trials, one in Kenya, one in Uganda, uncircumcised men were allocated randomly into two groups. The men in the first group underwent immediate circumcision. The men in the second group remained intact. Both groups were counselled about safe sex precautions. The results of the studies were startling. For it was found that the number of uncircumcised men contracting the HIV virus was more than 50% higher than in the circumcised group. Both studies were concluded early on the grounds that it was unethical not to offer immediate circumcision to the men in the uncircumcised group.

With a vaccine against HIV years if not decades away, circumcision comes to the fore as potentially the most potent weapon against the scourge of AIDS. African governments are interested in the findings not least because of the epidemiological implications. As the resistance of the population as a whole rises against a particular disease, so the disease has a greater problem in maintaining its presence in the population. The measles vaccine is a good example. This not only protects the individual child. If a sufficiently high proportion of children are vaccinated, there are few left to host the virus and its occurrence falls away. Thus measles became a rare disease in the UK. It is only in recent years when the unfounded scare about MMR reared its head and parents stopped having their children vaccinated that the disease reappeared. Similarly, if circumcision offers at least some protection against HIV infection, the number of men susceptible will decrease. As the number of infected people decreases, so the number of opportunities for infection, measured by the number of sexual acts in which at least one partner is infected, will fall away. The virus should abate, even if it does not die.

The results of the trials cause immense problems for the anti-circumcision lobby. They have pointed to the USA where a high proportion of men are circumcised at birth but where the AIDS epidemic took hold. But that epidemic was primarily in the gay population and it is likely that the main route of infection was anal intercourse with the passive partner the person infected. They have also argued that, even if the results of the trials are true, circumcision only reduces the risk. Further, circumcised men will tend to think themselves immune and will feel free to indulge in profligate, unprotected sex. It would, they argue, be far better not to circumcise but to encourage safe sex precautions as the only guaranteed way of remaining disease free. The pilot studies actually showed that the number of relationships of the circumcised groups was the same as the intact groups i.e. circumcision did not encourage a change in sexual behaviour. The anti-circumcision lobby also needs to be aware that in many African societies, 'real men do not use condoms'. A campaign predicated on increased condom use is doomed to failure.

A finding of another study showed that circumcision could increase the chances of women becoming infected, if a recently circumcised HIV-positive man has sexual intercourse before the operation wound is properly healed. This is logical; any seepage of blood from an incompletely healed wound is potentially dangerous. It shows one more area in which careful counselling post-circumcision is vital.

With circumcision offering a potential lifeline to countries ravaged by AIDS, many African governments are now considering whether 'circumcision for all' is a policy which they should adopt. Of course, it is one matter to recommend a policy of universal circumcision, it is another to achieve it. Circumcision must be carried out by trained practitioners in sterile conditions. There is indeed a fear that, in a country like Swaziland, if the demand for circumcision is too great for the medical resources available, traditional, untrained practitioners will emerge. Not only might the operation itself be dangerous (witness the deaths each year in South African traditional circumcision camps), the operation carried out in unsterile conditions might also be the means of transmitting the very HIV infection which the operation seeks to prevent.

At the government hospital in the Swazi capital Mbabane they are trying to satisfy soaring demand for operations. Doctors are being trained and are asked to help out on special 'circumcision days' when the procedure is offered free of charge. These occasions typically see about 40 men operated upon, but up to 100 others are routinely turned away because there are not enough professional medical staff to carry out the circumcisions. More doctors are needed. If 200,000 men wanted to get circumcised – a figure deemed conservative – it would require 40,000 operations to be performed annually for the next five years. There is a suggestion that any campaign should first focus on circumcising the 15 to 30 age group as it runs the highest risk of infection.

This is obviously an area where international aid could be of enormous benefit. A programme aimed at training circumcisers and providing sterile clinics in which to operate could be funded. Circumcision is a relatively simple operation and does not necessarily need a fully qualified surgeon (witness the excellent work of Jewish mohelim) nor fully equipped operating theatres. Good but basic facilities could initially offer circumcision to all males. These facilities would then be available for the circumcision of future boys and men as they reach the requisite age.

This raises the interesting question as to the best age for circumcision in these countries. We are used in the West to circumcision, when practised, being carried out in infancy or early childhood. There are good arguments for this – the operation is trivial when carried out at this age, and there are a range of effective operating techniques – clamps, Plastibell, freehand. In Africa, circumcision is far more practised as a ritual for entry into manhood. In such cultures, this is a powerful motivator – boys willingly submit to circumcision in order to become men. It may well be therefore that the period immediately before puberty is the optimal solution for these countries. Circumcision could then be combined with education about safe sex.

WHO and the UNAIDS Secretariat have convened an international consultation in early March to examine the results of the new trials and assess their policy and programmatic implications for countries. The consultation will address a range of policy, operational and ethical issues that will help guide decisions about where and how male circumcision can be best implemented, promoted and safely performed. Obviously, there are many developments yet to come in the story and I will give up-dates from time to time in the newsletter. I will also explore the implications of the studies for the United Kingdom. At the moment, the studies' relevance is being considered largely in an African context. But are the lessons also applicable at home?

A Bridge Too Far

I was circumcised as a child (late 1940s) and have no recollection of the operation or the reasons why it was done. All I know is that it seemed a fairly common occurrence amongst my school mates and this applied at the local grammar school as well as the local public school both of which I attended.

I had noticed for some time that the head of my penis was unusual when compared with those of others in that it had a bridge of skin attaching the crown of the penis to the shaft on the left side (looking down). This sometimes became sore if not dried properly and did little for the aesthetics of that particular part of my anatomy. After joining the Acorn Society and investigating numerous websites, in 2006 I decided that I would discuss the matter with someone or persons on the Circumcisers List supplied by the Gilgal Society. I visited two and at the second, Dr D'Silva of the Circumcision Agency based in Luton, I had a preliminary consultation (small fee) and was booked in for an operation under local anaesthetic three weeks later. At the consultation I was told about what would be involved and advised to read the text on the website about pre and post actions to be undertaken by me.

I duly arrived and was met by friendly staff and ushered into a waiting room. Children were obviously being attended to on that day as one could hear them in adjacent rooms. I was subsequently introduced to Dr Van Bussen, an American practising as a doctor in an adjacent county, who would be assisting Dr D'Silva with my 'revision'. I was given the local anaesthetic and the medics got to work, chatting with me all the while. Within 20 minutes I had had the bridge removed and some excess skin at the back of the shaft had also been removed. I was sewn up and a bandage tightly wound around the shaft and it was explained what post op action I needed to take with Cicatrin powder and bathing. I was left to rest in an adjacent room and after about 30 minutes I was free to leave. I subsequently attended a meeting at Reading that afternoon and even when the painkillers began to wear off there was no pain and only slight discomfort.

I removed the bandaging after about a week and also the remaining stitches – probably the most painful part of the whole business – and called in on the surgery a few weeks later as I was in the area to get the all clear from the doctor. The process had cost me around £325.00 and I am pleased with the result. I was advised that a tuft of skin on the crown where the bridge used to join would remain as the likely loss of blood in removing it could not be justified. Good medics, pleasant property for the operation and friendly staff – good value all round.

The Gomco Clamp

There are a number of clamp devices available to aid circumcision. They are all designed in one way or another to crush the foreskin and cut off the blood supply. With some clamps, the foreskin is then excised immediately; with others, the clamp is left in place until the skin necroses and the clamp falls off of its own accord. The Gomco clamp is of the former type so that the operation is completed before the clamp is removed.

The Gomco clamp has four parts. The first part is shaped like a plunger with a hollow bell and a stud on top. The bell fits over the glans and protects the glans during the operation. There are various sizes and one appropriate to the penis of the person being circumcised is chosen. The second part is a base plate which has a hole at one end and a screw bolt at the other. The hole is fitted over the bell and the foreskin is drawn through it. The third part is a top plate (or rocker plate). One end fits to the stud of the bell, the other over the screw bolt on the base plate. The fourth part is a nut which fits onto the screw bolt. As the nut is screwed on, the base plate tightens over the bell and exerts a crushing force on the foreskin at the junction of the bell and plate. The clamp is left on for a few minutes to achieve haemostasis and the foreskin can then be excised.

The operation is carried out as follows. First local anaesthetic is injected at the base of the penis and allowed to take effect. The foreskin is then grasped on either side of the midline with two haemostats, taking care to avoid the urethral meatus. A third haemostat or other instrument is carefully inserted into the preputial ring down to the level of the corona. The instrument is used to tent the foreskin away from the glans to avoid the urethral meatus. It is then gradually swept around the glans on both the right and left sides, to separate any adhesions between the inner mucosal layer and the glans.

The foreskin is then grasped between the haemostat on the dorsal aspect (the upper side of the glans) from the tip of the foreskin to a point of the foreskin about 1 cm from the coronal sulcus. The foreskin is then crushed along this line to prevent bleeding when the foreskin is cut. Taking care to avoid the glans, the crushed skin is now cut along this line with blunt-tipped scissors, thus creating a dorsal slit. The foreskin is peeled back from the glans, ensuring that all adhesions have been separated and the glans and sulcus are completely exposed. Failure to completely free mucosal adhesions from the glans penis so that the entire coronal sulcus is exposed is the most common reason for a poor cosmetic result. If the adhesions are not completely separated, not enough mucosa will be removed and the glans will not be completely exposed.

The foreskin is drawn back over the glans with the haemostats and the foreskin is checked to ensure that the mucosa is separated from the outer skin. The bell of the Gomco clamp is now inserted over the glans. The hole of the base plate is manoeuvred over the bell and the foreskin so that the hole sits on the bell near its base, catching the foreskin between it and the bell. The foreskin can be temporarily held in place with a safety pin through the two edges of the dorsal slit. The amount of skin to be excised is evaluated and the amount drawn through the hole may be adjusted for length and symmetry. The amount of penile shaft skin to remain after circumcision should be assessed before the actual circumcision. One way to do this is to mark the circumference of the shaft skin with a marker. Sufficient skin should be excised for the glans to be fully exposed after the operation. Otherwise, there is a danger that the skin will adhere to the glans during healing, creating the need for a further operation at a later date.

The rocker arm (top plate) of the Gomco clamp is now attached and brought around into the notch of the base plate. The nut is tightened, crushing the foreskin between the bell and the base plate. The clamp is left in place for a few minutes until clotting and coagulation have occurred. A scalpel is now used to excise the foreskin at the level of the base plate. The nut is then loosened, and the top and base plate are removed from the bell. The shaft skin is then eased off the bell at the line of incision using a gauze with mild traction.

Provided sufficient skin has been removed, the incision line should lie on the shaft of the penis below the corona. In an infant, there should be little or no bleeding along the scar line which should heal naturally within a few days: older children and adults will require the line of the cut to be sutured. A bandage will then be applied to limit swelling and keep the wound clean during healing.

For those with access to the internet, there is an excellent training video on the use of the Gomco clamp at <http://newborns.stanford.edu/Gomco.html>.

Ivan Acorn

Though circumcision is a minority condition in Britain, I disagree with D.H. (issue 6/2006) that there are “pathetically few male circumcisions”. True, less than 1% of babies are routinely circumcised (excluding those for religious reasons), but there are about 30,000 NHS hospital circumcisions each year. Hardly pathetically few; and then there are the circumcisions in doctors’ surgeries, private clinics, and by mohelim at home or in the synagogue (on about 2000 Jewish babies annually). Most of the therapeutic operations are conveniently undertaken in late infancy before school, between primary and secondary education, or before puberty. D.H. should have stated that routine infant circumcisions were few, but not circumcisions!

The concept of ‘total circumcision’ presented in the same edition under the title ‘Bridling’ rather astounded me in its severity. It is clearly intended to maximise the reduction of sensitivity, sexual pleasure and skin mobility, exposing both the glans and its sulcus even when the penis is flaccid. (Most may be aware of the radical freehand surgery so popular in the mid 20th century. In my form at school in the 1950’s, 45% were radically circumcised, including me; of course that was before the advent of the Plastibell and its UK adoption by physicians and surgeons.)

Total circumcision as described requires the removal of practically all foreskin, inner membrane and frenulum, discouraging handling, masturbation and eroticism, minimising penile stimulation during intercourse. This is the ultimate bridling of male sexuality, a puritanical measure indeed, rendering baby boys chaste for life. How Dantesque!

Mentioned is the ‘circumcision rite of the Hebrews’ with the lamentation that it did not become law or custom everywhere. Note that Jewish circumcision is neither ‘total’ nor ‘radical’ in the accepted sense, as it removes very little of the inner membrane and leaves the frenal area untouched. After the adhesions have been broken, the foreskin of the baby’s erect penis is stretched forward. More of the outer layer is drawn forward than the mucosa. The shield is applied at an angle greater than the slope of the glans so cutting avoids the frenulum and most of the mucosa. After cutting, the outer layer retracts over the glans leaving the inner mucosa covering all but the tip of the glans, including that bearing the frenulum. The mucosa is torn and reflected back over the glans to join the cut edge, and bandaged in place after peri’ah (mouth or cup suction). Two strips of lint are applied.

Most of the erotic tissue is thus retained, assisting the sexual function in later life. Because no sutures are applied, the possibility of stitch tunnels is eliminated. Skin bridges are never encountered as the reflected mucous membrane is bandaged against the shaft throughout healing, avoiding any glans contact.

I feel circumcision is a matter of individual choice and shouldn’t be imposed on unconsenting babies for puritanical or fanatical reasons. However done, RIC deadens, desensitises, diminishes and destroys – not much of a legacy for life, although the Jewish and Plastibell circumcisions are the least drastic. In a book,

Paul McCartney's brother revealed that both boys had been Jewishly circumcised, the Queen's sons were attended to by a mohel, whilst babies circumcised for non-religious reasons are now usually 'Plastibelled'. Circumcision, yes, but kinder.

Turkey Neck

In 2004 I had a re-circumcision performed by Dr Zarifa at the Custom House Surgery, London. "As tight as possible" was a special request on my part. The circumcision scar is now between 2 and 3 cm above the glans. There is so little remaining penile shaft skin that it never rolls forward, no longer forming a 'collar' on the sulcus as was the case prior to my re-circ.

As can be seen from the photo, the scrotal sack is pulled noticeably forward on my tightly circumcised penis during erection. Even so, there is no discomfort as a result of the re-circumcision, only a pleasurable tug on the glans. It would therefore interest me to know whether any circumcised Acorn readers feel some discomfort from a forward tug of the scrotum, known as 'turkey-neck' by Americans. Also, has anyone circumcised as an adult noticed glans enlargement after having been permanently freed of foreskin – my glans seems to have increased in girth after my re-circ?

I am aware that the cash-strapped NHS will only circumcise if a Consultant recommends it, but as circumcised men are much less likely to become HIV infected, one really has to ask oneself why the procedure is not more easily available on the NHS. If done on infants with a Gomco clamp or Plastibell device, it could be carried out on a routine basis at minimal expense.

Out Of The Window

In an edition of Out Northwest last autumn, an advert for the Terrence Higgins Trust showed a page of penises. Out of 21 cocks, only three were cut. This is now the trend of today. Circumcision has gone out of the window, no longer in fashion as it was some 30 or 40 years ago. As most young men nowadays are uncut, so will be sons born to them. Most young girls who get pregnant have never seen a circumcised penis and I'm sure don't even understand the word as it is something they have never come across.

I can foresee a time when circumcision will only be performed on religious grounds. This is a pity as a cut cock looks so much better and is so much easier to keep clean.

Advocating Full Circumcision

The article 'Bridling' (issue 6/2006) quotes pro-circumcision comments from Victorians. They seemed to have the right idea about advocating full circumcision with total frenulum excision, although perhaps for the wrong reason. Today we would agree that boys should be circumcised but for cleanliness, aesthetic and sexual reasons. Pain and soreness as a boy provides better health, appearance and sexual results for life. Full radical circumcision should be carried out to provide a penis a boy can be proud of, with a totally exposed knob and tidy scar, the shaft skin cut back very tight and every trace of frenulum removed.

I also enjoyed H.F.'s article 'My Muslim Son – Part III' (issue 5/2006) on the circumcision of his youngest son, aged eight years, this being done so that he complied with his grandfather, father and brother – all cut. Other families could well follow his example. I personally agree with Adam (issue 3/2006) that 11 or 12 is a good age for a boy to be circumcised. I am aware that circumcision can be carried out at any age, from RIC to adulthood; but immediately prior to puberty a boy can understand the reasons for and the results of his foreskin and frenulum being totally removed.

Harry Potter In The Nude!!

Well, it is actually Daniel Radcliffe, the 17 year old who plays Harry Potter, who is in the nude. I note from the Acorn newsletter that members voted: 'Celebrities – who is cut and who is uncut' the 14th most popular topic. Unfortunately Daniel Radcliffe is uncircumcised which I suppose is not too surprising considering his age and the current anti-circumcision thinking in England. For those who want to see the nude picture of Daniel Radcliffe they need to go to: Google search – Images – Daniel Radcliffe. Page 1, about half way down the images, click on 'Daniel Radcliffe slammed for smoking', scroll down the page and you will see a full frontal nude picture of Daniel Radcliffe with a horse behind. I know how unreliable some images can be and many people put up 'scam' photographs but I think this one is genuine as Daniel Radcliffe has a leading role in the play Equus which opened on 27th February 2007 at the Gielgud Theatre, London W1. Using a fake would therefore seem to be pointless as all is revealed during the play. The page also gives a web site: http://thebosh.com/archives/2007/02/daniel\_radcliffe\_slammed\_for\_smoking\_going\_nude.php. I have not visited this site so cannot advise what else is on it.

C.B. – Cornwall

[Editor's note: The picture referred to by CB is printed below. Members will come to their own conclusions but I have some doubts about authenticity. First, the photo looks like one from the publicity set. Would the photographer taking the publicity shots really have risked his career by releasing a nude shot when the source would be obvious? I also doubt that Daniel would even have been required to remove his knickers during the shoot. Second, Daniel's torso is slim with little musculature. The thighs in the photo are by contrast very well developed and muscular. Do the two halves of the body fit?

Further doubt on his intact status is cast by an interview Daniel apparently gave about two months ago to an Australian early morning news and chat programme. He said that his mother is Jewish (father not) – and that he is not religious at all. The interview is on youtube (<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qp7IlvZuGdU>). Since the mother married out, she would not necessarily have had Daniel circumcised. But since the racial line is through the mother, Daniel would be accepted as Jewish and it would have been prudent of his parents to arrange a bris in case he wanted to claim his religious inheritance at a later date.

All this speculation could be put to rest by a front stalls view at the Gielgud. Has any member been? If not, your Editor might just have to sacrifice himself and purchase a ticket in the interests of establishing the truth!]

All Hands On Dick!

I read Ivan's article on 'Bridling' with immense interest and not a little amusement. The Victorian attitude on the value of circumcision in curbing masturbation is almost beyond belief. Did they really believe that circumcising boys (and men) would really lead to a "maximum reduction of erotic sensations that lead to masturbation in children and uncontrollable sexual urges in youth and unmarried adults"? As far as masturbation is concerned, the males of the world are divided into two groups – those who say they masturbate and those who lie about it. As is well known, most of the Acorn membership has been circumcised and every one of us has masturbated at some time in our lives. And I would bet that the majority still does it. I have to go along with what Mae West said about sex (not that she talked about much else) when she said, "Sex is like a game of bridge. If you haven't got a good partner, you'd better have a good hand." If you don't have a regular partner in life, then you can't fail by pleasuring yourself with your right (or possibly left) hand. On discovering the joys of masturbation at a very early age I have continued to enjoy it on a regular basis. Some men feel a bit ashamed of admitting to masturbation in adulthood, but can there be a more harmless activity that promotes maximum pleasure?

I can say without a trace of doubt that my enjoyment of masturbation increased enormously after I was circumcised as a young man. Gone was the slackness that so masked the full pleasure of a self-induced orgasm. Before being circumcised, it really was like the old adage that it was like eating chocolate with the wrapping still on. My circumcision completely liberated my cock to terrific sensual pleasure and there was absolutely no 'bridling' effect whatsoever. To be honest, I soon felt that I hadn't been circumcised tightly enough and went for a second circumcision a year later. Sex was now even better than before. My shaft was tauter and I seemed to have no difficulties in getting an erection that led to a wonderful explosion of delight when I came. Like virtually everyone reading this article, I have never had the slightest regret in getting circumcised. Whilst my techniques in masturbation may have changed a little to accommodate the increasing tightness of the shaft, there has never been a moment's doubt that I am not in a position to fully appreciate masturbation. After the first circumcision I could still jack-off 'dry', but with the second, I found that it was much more pleasurable to use a little lubricant. My preferred one is baby oil rather than the traditional Vaseline as it allows for a full stroking technique from base of shaft to top of the knob. This way every bit of my cock receives maximum attention.

So despite what the Victorians would have us believe, masturbation is not evil and on being circumcised it is not even remotely 'unrewarding'. I certainly concur with the belief that circumcision is to "remove a defect in man's formation" but on the physical side rather than spiritual. In all my years of having been circumcised, I never found the slightest loss of sensitivity and it had absolutely no impact on my 'moral shortcomings'! So much so, that after many years of prevarication, I finally went in for a third circumcision last year. There always seems to be a desire in roundheads that you can always go a little further in achieving the desired effect of a drum-tight shaft with no noticeable movement. As my first circumcision was low, the subsequent ones had to continue in that style. I realised that I could never have the much-wanted 'high-and-tight' cut that we associate with the Americans, but as far as I was concerned, the tighter the better would suffice. So I have now got what the article refers to as a 'total' circumcision – in their eyes (and mine!) a highly desirable result. Once the scar had thoroughly healed, I found that erections were almost unbearably exquisite in their tightness as the skin stretched and strained to fit my new perfectly smooth shaft. I also had the remains of the frenulum completely removed, which I feel gives my cock a much more aesthetically pleasing look. The wait to try out my third circumcision was frustrating but I felt sure I would be rewarded for my patience. Needless to say my first jack-off was performed with just a little caution, that was quickly carried through with vigorous abandon. There was no play in my shaft at all which was exactly what I had hoped for. Since then, I have continued to self-pleasure myself whenever I felt like it without any feelings that being circumcised had 'counteracted excessive lust.'

I get the feeling that routine infant circumcision continued in Britain for so long because whilst men could say they thought it was a good idea morally and hygienically, they actually knew how gratifying it was sexually. To say that it didn't prevent masturbation would be to admit that a man had had a great time in his youth! Forget the term 'self-abuse', it is so loaded with guilt. Think more of it as 'self-satisfaction'. So why deny your sons the fun you had yourself once circumcised?

Oh yes, as far as the title of this article is concerned, I admit to borrowing the name of an 'educational' film (thinly disguised porn) I once saw. It promoted the immense value of masturbation as the best form of ideal safe sex, which I cannot argue with. And as the film was American, all the men in it had tightly circumcised cocks and had not the slightest difficulty masturbating to copious climaxes. Good for them! (And good for us.)

Tight Circumcision

I appreciated the editor's story and pictures in issue 1/2007. The shaft skin is very smooth, the perfect result.

I'd like to make one small observation on the matter of sensitivity: I think that it can take up to about 8 or 9 months after a circumcision to regain FULL sensitivity; about 90% comes back quite quickly but that last little bit does seem to take some time.

A little observation of my own, and one which I obviously fully support, is the move to very tight circs over the last year or so. Much of the correspondence from UK men on the various internet groups has been about requesting and getting tight circumcisions/revisions. Quite different to the state of affairs over here when I had my original circ almost 30 years ago, when there was no information whatever about such things as styles and methods. What a pity we've had to wait this long to get the fuller picture.

Certainly Dr Zarifa seems happy to provide virtually as tight a result as anyone could want. I also think that the results he gets are at least as good, in aesthetic terms, as the pictures included on Dr David Cornell's own website. I also saw a report on a satisfied customer of Morris Sifman – I went to see him about a year ago before my last revision, but he was keen to avoid using sutures, using a tight strapping instead, which I was worried would not hold. In this instance he suggested to the patient that he might not use sutures, but the patient was strongly against the idea and insisted he did use them, which he did. Perhaps I should have been firmer against the idea, but Dr Sifman was so adamant that I did not feel I could go against his recommendation if I allowed him to do the job. A pity, as I would have enjoyed being the owner of a genuinely Jewish circumcision – the mohelim do seem to do a good job on others, possibly because they remove all the inner skin to get a good and tight result.

Does anyone know of any other doctors around at the moment who are highly regarded, other than Drs Zarifa, Sifman and D'Silva? I often reply to letters asking for suggestions of suitable surgeons, and would have thought that a few other names might be cropping up occasionally.

Petition To The Prime Minister

The Downing Street website now allows members of the public to mount electronic petitions to the Prime Minister. One of the most publicised in the recent past has been the petition against road pricing which gathered over a million signatures. But at the end of March, a petition about infant circumcision appeared, urging the Prime Minister to make adequate provision for access to infant circumcision on the NHS. The petition reads as follows:

“We the undersigned petition the Prime Minister to facilitate the provision of access to prophylactic neo-natal circumcision in NHS hospitals.

“Recent months have seen more evidence accrue in favour of the health benefits of circumcision, which is best performed neonatally. However, unlike in countries such as the USA, there is a complete lack of adequate provision for circumcision in NHS maternity hospitals and units, except in a few areas which cater to sizable Muslim populations. Circumcision reduces the risk of HIV infection by over 50%, the risk of urinary tract infections by a factor of 12, penile cancer by a factor of 22, prostate cancer by 50%, and also cervical cancer in partners. Current policy and provision should be amended to reflect the scientific evidence, and this option should be made available for all new parents.”

Go to the website <http://petitions.pm.gov.uk/circumcision/#detail> if you wish to sign the petition. The closing date is 23rd March 2008. I will keep members updated in future newsletters about the numbers of signatures the petition attracts.

Editorial

Summer is here and many of you will be heading for the beaches. This will be an ideal opportunity for our naturist members to check out the status of the European male. Remember that we will be interested to hear of your observations, particularly according to age. Are there any young cut men out there or is circumcision really a dying custom?

Sensitivity is raised in several articles this month. One new member considering circumcision is naturally concerned as to whether he will be sacrificing any sexual pleasure. Two other contributions indicate that he may be – to a greater or lesser extent. Research does not necessarily support this conclusion and I hope to devote a future editor's column to this issue. In the meantime, I would like to gather anecdotal evidence from members – especially those of you circumcised as adults. Was the sexual experience for you more or less pleasurable after circumcision, and in what ways, if any, did sensations differ? Let me know your conclusions and I will print them either as part of my article or separately.

Is circumcision against nature?

The foreskin consists of healthy tissue and is a fully functioning part of the penis. In routine circumcision, the foreskin is excised for no good medical reason. Circumcision is therefore against nature and is a violation, some would say a mutilation, of the body.

These are potent arguments and they cause great concern to parents considering whether to have their baby boy circumcised. Can it be right to remove a healthy part of the body in this way? Is it even moral so to breach the integrity of the baby's body and his rights as a human being? Parents may well be convinced by the arguments that circumcision is an offence against nature and so decide to leave their son intact.

But what, we might ask, does natural and unnatural mean as far as the human race is concerned? All living species are the product of evolution. Over millions of years, each species of life has evolved, gradually adapting to its environment to ensure best its survival. Nature is full of the wonders of such evolution and adaptation. Thus the camel evolved to survive in drought conditions, the polar bear in extreme cold. The process of evolution is one of constant improvement in the living entity so that it can better survive in its environment.

Man, like all the species with whom he shares the planet, followed the same evolutionary path. But at a certain point in his history, an important change came about. Impatient with the painstakingly slow process of evolution, man started to adapt his own body, first through medicine, then through surgery. The purpose of the body's immune system is to fight disease. The immune system has been honed during the evolutionary process, a very real example of the survival of the fittest. Those whose immune systems were inferior quickly succumbed to disease whilst those with superior immune systems survived to pass on their better quality genes to succeeding generations. But then man found how to give the system a boost or a helping hand, originally through plants and herbs, which have gradually been developed into the vast array of pharmaceutical drugs available today. Similarly surgery has progressed from crude amputations and removal of tumours, carried out in unhygienic conditions without anaesthesia, to today's sophisticated range of surgical techniques.

Vaccination carried the process one stage further. The immune system can now be 'taught' to 'recognise' and eliminate potentially serious or fatal diseases. By these means, smallpox and polio have been virtually eliminated and rubella is no longer the scourge of the pregnant woman with its deadly threat to the foetus she is carrying.

Medicine continues to advance. With the unlocking of the human genome, the role of individual genes in particular diseases is being identified. Gene therapy holds a real potential to eliminate diseases and conditions which today have no cure.

Man has come a long way from his naked origins and probably has much further to go. When the mechanism of ageing can be fully identified, man may well become immortal in an earthly sense, with all the benefits and problems that will bring. So is man still 'natural'? The answer must be 'no', if we consider any modification to the body and its workings to be unnatural.

So where does circumcision fit into this picture? The origins of circumcision are lost in time. Some suggest that it was introduced as a religious rite – as it remains for Judaism and Islam today. But this does not explain the existence of the operation in widely different geographical areas of the world – the Middle East, many parts of Africa, Australasia. Religions are very good at incorporating established practice into their rites as a way of embedding religious belief into the community. This is probably how it worked with circumcision, i.e. circumcision was a practice which was already in existence and which religions then adopted. So why should circumcision have come into existence in so many different places throughout the world? The answer must be utilitarian – circumcision was found to be a useful practice. Why should this be?

The glans is the key part of the penis as far as sexual functioning is concerned. It is ideally shaped to facilitate penetration of the vagina during intercourse. It is the depository of the sensory nerves which give pleasure to the male and which when sufficiently stimulated brings orgasm and ejaculation. When the penis first evolved, man was still in his naked state. Protection of the glans against damage from the natural habitat – brambles, bushes, insect bites, even the sun's rays – was important. Thus the foreskin came into being to provide the necessary cover – neatly designed to withdraw at the crucial moment to allow full exposure of the glans. But then, when man started to wear clothes, the foreskin obviously began to cause problems. At that point it started to be judged as inconvenient, superfluous to requirements and better excised.

It is not hard to conjecture what those reasons might have been because they are still with us today. First balanitis – irritation of the foreskin and glans. It is probably no coincidence that circumcision tends to be endemic in hot countries. Where humidity is high, the space under the foreskin can easily become damp and the humid environment encourages the growth of bacteria and consequent inflammation and infection. Where the atmosphere is dry and the environment dusty, dirt and grit can penetrate the space under the foreskin causing severe irritation. One can well envisage a situation where a large proportion of the male population was affected by such symptoms which the removal of the foreskin was found to relieve and cure. It is then a small step to introducing universal male circumcision as a preventive measure.

Second, we have phimosis and frenulum breve. Probably between 5% and 10% of males have a malformed foreskin in that it does not retract back over the glans, or, if it does, the frenulum is so tight that tension causes pain. Such malformations inhibit sexual intercourse, impregnation of the woman and hence continuation of the race. In conditions where child mortality is probably high, anything which further threatens the production of the next generation is a threat to survival itself. With a relatively high proportion of men being affected by such problems, it is better to eliminate the potential problem in all men – thus all males are circumcised.

So circumcision came about as just another of those measures which man took to give evolution a helping hand and adapt himself to the prevailing conditions. Is the situation any different today? We still have a situation where a relatively high proportion of males require circumcision for medical reasons as boys or men with all the additional costs, inconvenience and embarrassment that causes. We still have hot, humid or dusty environments where the foreskin can easily become prone to irritation and infection. We have growing evidence that the removal of the foreskin gives some protection against urinary tract infections in infancy and sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS, in adults. The case for prophylactic circumcision is still as strong as ever.

So, is circumcision against nature? Surely, circumcision must be viewed as just one of the many means by which man has come to terms with his body and his environment. The conclusion must be that circumcision is only against nature if man's progress itself is against nature. To condemn circumcision as unnatural is similarly to condemn as unnatural the whole development of medicine over the past thousands of years.

Parents have many pros and cons to consider when deciding whether to have their sons circumcised. But the 'against nature' argument should not detain them – it is spurious and should be dismissed as such.

The Circumcision Fetish

The exposed glans undoubtedly has a fascination for many men. Mine started from the age of eight, when I first discovered that I could pull back my foreskin. At boarding school I was envious of those who had been circumcised, so I started becoming a skinback, first for a few minutes at a time, then gradually extending the period to a whole day, a whole week, and even a whole month. I was lucky that the geometry of my penis is such that the foreskin would stay retracted behind the prominent corona.

Puberty brought with it embarrassing moments, because, although I had experimented with skinbacking, I could not bring myself to make this the permanent state. Every night I would go to bed with a covered glans, only to awake with it naked, causing frequent wet dreams. So I gradually accustomed myself to more and more of the skinned-back state, although I could not bring myself to appear in this manner when naked on public nude beaches until the age of 30, when I finally decided that this would be my normal state.

However, this did not diminish my inner desire to be 'properly' circumcised, so, thanks to the internet, I achieved my ultimate goal on 4th December 2001, but not without problems.

I had agreed to have a circumcision and a frenulectomy, as the frenulum had always been somewhat tight and pulled the glans down when fully erect (see picture 1). But the first op was not satisfactory so I returned for another, which proved to be a real 'cowboy' effort. Realising that I was not getting what I wanted, which was a smooth underside, with no pulling on the glans, I complained again and this time was given the full job, which actually turned out to be very painful, as the doc had to inject into the glans itself. But the result was good.

How do I feel six years later? No regrets, but a degree of disappointment. There is a loss of sensation with the removal of the stretch sensors that were in the foreskin, and the frenulum area is less erotic. Intercourse is still good (when I can get it!) and masturbation is still enjoyable, though different. But, I am convinced that circumcision is not for every man, as the result will differ according to each individual penis. The perfect penis does not need circumcising. Now, what is the perfect penis? How can it be described? Who has one?

Circumcision Techniques 3

The Plastibell

The Plastibell device is a disposable, single-use circumcision aid, designed to circumcise by strangulating the blood supply to the foreskin. The device consists of a plastic bell with a handle attached at the apex. The bell, which fits over the glans, has a groove close to its rim. The foreskin is partially slit so that the glans can easily be exposed and the appropriate size Plastibell is placed in position. The skin is then pulled forward over the bell, and a tie is fixed tightly around, compressing it into the groove. The surplus skin is cut off in front of the tie, which prevents any bleeding. The snap-off handle of the Plastibell is then removed, leaving the ring in place. In 5-10 days the ring, with the tie and the fringe of now dead skin in front of it, falls off leaving a clean, healed line.

The first part of the operation is carried out in the same way as for a Gomco clamp. First local anaesthetic is injected at the base of the penis and allowed to take effect. The foreskin is then grasped on either side of the midline with two haemostats, taking care to avoid the urethral meatus. A third haemostat or other instrument is carefully inserted into the preputial ring down to the level of the corona. The instrument is used to tent the foreskin away from the glans to avoid the urethral meatus. It is then gradually swept around the glans on both the right and left sides, to separate the adhesions between the inner mucosal layer and the glans.

The foreskin is then grasped in the haemostat on the dorsal aspect (the upper side of the glans) from the tip of the foreskin to a point of the foreskin about 1cm from the coronal sulcus. The foreskin is crushed along this line to prevent bleeding when the foreskin is cut. Taking care to avoid the glans, the crushed skin is now cut along this line with blunt-tipped scissors, thus creating a dorsal slit. The foreskin is peeled back from the glans, ensuring that all adhesions have been separated and the glans and sulcus are completely exposed. Failure to completely free mucosal adhesions from the glans penis so that the entire coronal sulcus is exposed is the most common reason for a poor cosmetic result. If the adhesions are not completely separated, not enough mucosa will be removed and the glans will not be completely exposed.

The plastic bell is now slipped over the glans and the incised foreskin is pulled over the top of it. The incised foreskin is brought forward until the apex of the incision is above the string placement guide on the device. It is essential that the foreskin is pulled sufficiently forward so that the Plastibell removes an adequate amount of foreskin. However, the skin should not be pulled too tight before being tied off. This is because if pulled very tight there will be considerable tension backwards after the bell has been tied in place. The end of the bell will be pulled into the glans and may easily compress the urethra to the extent of making urination very painful, if not impossible.

The foreskin is clamped across the handle of the Plastibell with a straight clamp to keep it in place. The string is placed around the foreskin and the Plastibell device in the groove that acts as the string placement guide. The area is examined to make sure the device has not slipped out of place and the apex of the incision is distal to the placement of the string. The string is then tightened and tied in a simple square knot. An adequate result is obtained when the skin just distal to the string blanches without the string breaking.

The excess foreskin is excised after the knot is tied. This reduces the volume of dead foreskin which will drop off. The handle is then broken off the device. The thread cuts off the blood supply to the foreskin which withers and drops off, taking the Plastibell with it, in 7 to 10 days.

Sufficient local anaesthesia should be given to ensure at least 2 hours continued anaesthesia after the operation. The action of the thread in the groove of the bell is such that within this time not only has the blood supply been cut off from the foreskin, but the nerve endings at, and forward of, the thread are rendered ineffective. All the boy will feel is a slight pressure from the bell on the glans. Because no stitches are used with a Plastibell there is no need for dressings, antibiotics, etc which makes things very much simpler, especially with young children who cannot easily co-operate.

As noted above, the foreskin should not be pulled so far forward as to put it under undue tension. This necessarily results in a looser circumcision than can be achieved with the Gomco clamp. Furthermore, the frenulum is protected by the bell and will never be cut when using the Plastibell. The position of the scar line behind the glans is determined only by the distance from the back of the glans to the groove in the bell. For a given glans circumference (and hence Plastibell size) the longer the boy's glans the further back the resulting scar line will be and the looser the circumcision will be.

The Plastibell has gained some favour in Denmark as a means of carrying out a partial circumcision; most boys there are left natural and leaving some foreskin makes a circumcised boy less 'different'. On the other hand, it is also very popular in Saudi Arabia where a fully uncovered glans is required. Thus the extent to which the skin is pulled forward before the tie is applied can give a range of outcomes, though a certain amount of free skin usually remains.

Only small size Plastibells are generally marketed and hence the method is only suitable for pre-pubescent boys. The largest Plastibell generally commercially available in the United States and Great Britain is designed to fit the 'average' 11-12 year old boy. Well developed boys of this age may well have too large a glans to use the Plastibell, whereas very late developers may be able to be circumcised with it to 14 or so years old. Determining the appropriate size of the device is important. A fit too small can cause tissue strangulation and necrosis, and one too large may result in too much foreskin being removed and penile denudation. The Plastibell is primarily used on infants in the United States. The Plastibell is used in nearly 60% of all routine infant circumcisions in the United States with 39% being done by the Gomco Clamp.

The advantages of the Plastibell are:

- No bleeding
- No infection since it is difficult for infection to ascend beyond the point where the circulation is cut off
- Little pain since the clamping cuts off the nerve supply
- No dressings required
- A neat symmetrical circumcision line

The main disadvantage is the relatively loose cut and the retention of the frenulum. However, if the circumcision is performed in infancy, the excess skin, if not too great, may be 'absorbed' as the boy grows and the frenulum may fail to develop fully.

A Sensitive Question

I have just joined the Acorn Society and received my first issue of the newsletter. Something that immediately concerned me was the idea that the Acorn Society should become exclusively pro-circumcision. The Acorn web site seemed to stand against this taking-of-sides, which is precisely why I joined. The other organisations all take sides, and for that reason I had no interest in joining any of them. I hoped that I would find one that served the pursuit of truth rather than an agenda. Surely, the whole purpose and value of the Acorn Society, and probably what makes it unique, is that it should encourage objective and honest discussion from both sides.

There are still areas that need full examination and research, and one of these interests me particularly. It was touched on by the editor in the last issue. I was circumcised at the age of four, and so I have never had the opportunity to know how circumcision affects sexual sensation. This is an answer that only those who have had the operation during sexual maturity can give, and I believe it is based on a question that has troubled many of those circumcised during infancy. I was surprised this didn't reveal itself in the survey. Perhaps, generally, some of those who have been cut are angry because they fear they have lost sensation that was their birthright in a natural, uncut state, and consequently speak out against the procedure; or perhaps some others have sought comfort by deciding, regardless, that no loss of sensation has occurred, and so encourage others to be like them.

I really don't know what the objective answer is, but it could be achieved from some simple and honest research, with the possible distortions of attitude factored in. There has been a little scientific treatment of this area. For example, I came across an article, 'The prepuce: specialized mucosa of the penis and its loss to circumcision' (British Journal of Urology, 1996, vol. 77, pp 291-295), available in any university medical library. This indicates that the normal foreskin has an important role in sexual sensation. Of course, bias can (but should not) enter medico-scientific articles, but at least they are presented in a way that enables full analysis and criticism. I must confess I would rather have been left uncut, if only because that was what nature intended and I remain unsure about what I might have lost in sexual sensation. It seems such an important, interesting but neglected field for research. (But please let me know if I've missed some full examination elsewhere.)

That's why information from those who have had sexual experience in both states would be so interesting for people like me, uncluttered by any predetermined allegiance to circumcision or non-circumcision. Please don't allow Acorn to become propaganda!

D.W. – Cumbria

[Editor's note: I am hoping to devote a future Editor's column to the issue of sensitivity. Meanwhile, I would welcome contributions from any member who has experience of being sexually active in both an intact and a circumcised state.]

Glans After Circumcision

Just wondering what effect other guys think having your foreskin removed has on the glans of the penis. I was circumcised earlier this year and the effects are massive. Even though it was only my foreskin that was removed, my glans has gone from being moist and sensitive to being constantly dry and virtually numb. It's also changed from being a pink colour to grey. The texture feels different. It's no longer soft, it's become much tougher and rubbery. The constant exposure and chaffing seems to have desensitised it.

My GP says my penis looks like a normal circumcised penis and that the change of colour and texture are normal for all men after circumcision. I don't know if maybe I've had more skin removed than some – I guess when it's done as a baby/child the foreskin removed is very small. I was given my foreskin back to me in a jar before leaving the clinic where I had it done and to be honest, the skin removed looks massive. When unfolded it's bigger than my hand but the doctor who cut it off told me that it's normal to remove that much skin during a circumcision. The procedure certainly seems to have been done correctly. What I don't understand is so many other guys posting messages saying that being circumcised makes no difference and some saying they prefer it. Before I had it done, I really didn't think the effects would be much but I guess I didn't speak to anyone else who'd had it done as all my mates are uncut. Whenever I have sex, I struggle to ejaculate. I am frequently unable to ejaculate and end up having to go to sleep with a full erection after not ejaculating. Even sometimes when I do eventually ejaculate, the semen spurts out of my cock but I don't get an all-over-body orgasm that I always used to get. What do circumcised men do to make their glans sensitive? And how come so many guys say they prefer sex after being cut? i.e. how can less be more? I know some say it's cleaner and I guess it is and my girlfriend certainly likes the look of it cut, but surely that can't be worth the loss of sensitivity. Or is it that many like me have their foreskin cut off thinking it won't make any difference and then are too embarrassed or ashamed to admit it to others? I would think if you have it done as a baby, you never know how much feeling you are missing as you'll never have experienced sex with a foreskin. Or maybe once you realise that what's done is done that you want to sound as positive as possible about sex and the state of your penis. For example, I am being as honest as I can in this forum, as no one knows me, but in the showers with football mates who can all see I've recently been circumcised, I say that I like the fact I've been circumcised as why would I admit to other guys that there is anything dysfunctional about my dick. Frankly, I just get really fed up with guys going on about how great it is to be circumcised. The foreskin has many nerve endings adding to sexual pleasure and how can anyone suggest that a desensitised glans gives more pleasure than a sensitive one.

Call For Circumcision On NHS As Study Finds Procedure Halves Risk Of AIDS

[An article from The Scotsman by Eben Harrell in December 2006]

Scottish patients who wish to have their male infants circumcised should have the procedure paid for by the NHS to prevent the transmission of AIDS, a World Health Organisation (WHO) expert has said. The comments come in the wake of a large US study that showed that circumcision reduces by half a man's risk of contracting AIDS from heterosexual sex.

The NHS, while performing a small number of infant circumcisions, discourages the procedure, claiming that the benefits of surgery do not justify its cost and risks. The majority of non-medical circumcisions in Scotland are undertaken privately by religious leaders or private physicians. "The presumption against male circumcision in Scotland should be lifted," said Dr Tim Hargreave, a urologist at Edinburgh University and a senior adviser to the WHO. "There needs to be a policy shift in the light of this evidence. Parents who seek circumcision for non-religious reasons should have ready access on the NHS."

Scottish AIDS campaigners welcomed Dr Hargreave's comments and suggested that NHS doctors should recommend circumcision to male adults known to be promiscuous. Roy Kilpatrick, the Chief Executive of HIV Scotland, said: "It makes us wince a bit, culturally, but major health organisations like WHO have made strong statements endorsing the potential benefit."

Male circumcision has also remained unpopular in Scotland because of ethical concerns regarding infants' inability to consent to the procedure. But Dr Hargreave said the evidence of benefit was now quite clear. The National Institute of Health, the US government body that undertook the study, had to halt two clinical trials, in Kenya and Uganda, on the grounds that not offering circumcision to all the men taking part would be unethical. The success of the trials confirmed a study done last year. "There is an enormous anti-circumcision lobby that has very real concerns. But you have to separate the science and the evidence from the emotional baggage", he said.

This year saw the biggest annual rise on record in the number of HIV cases in Scotland. Of the 405 new HIV patients in 2005, a rise of 11% year-on-year, two-thirds were men. Even so, Dr Hargreave said, HIV was not prevalent enough in Scotland to justify universal male circumcision. For one thing, circumcision did not prevent transmission by anal sex or drug injection, ways the virus commonly spreads in Scotland. There is also concern that the new evidence will encourage circumcised men to be more careless.

A Scottish Executive spokesman said: "We will examine the results of these trials, but we have no plans to change our current policies. We would never advocate circumcision over the use of condoms as the best protection against HIV transmission."

Scottish Rates Of Circumcision

The above article from The Scotsman says that male circumcision is unpopular in Scotland but, despite this, circumcision in Scotland is not so rare. I concede it is not often done at birth but it appears on a list of common operations and their waiting times in a report in The Scotsman in March this year. Unfortunately, this shows that the median waiting time for circumcision has increased from 64 days in 1998 to 84 days in 2006.

I can think of nine men I know who are circumcised. They are all Scottish, aged from 28-45. These are workmates or guys I see in the pub – not close friends I can discuss the matter with. From general conversations over the space of ten years or more, I know that none are circumcised for religious reasons and that all were born or educated in Scotland. I also know from conversations with two Scottish guys who were at school 20 years ago that these nine men would have undergone penile examination as part of school medical examinations.

In general I think that the article in The Scotsman reveals that medical opinion on the question of circumcision is changing. I don't suggest that there are container loads of Gomco clamps on the way from the USA at the moment but I do believe that circumcision will, over time, become more common. Parents who read such articles in the general press will obviously want what is best for their sons and a reduction in the risk of contracting HIV will lead to a demand for the procedure.

I enjoyed the Editor's article on 'bridling' in issue 6/2006. It is an interesting concept but, if the intention is to prevent masturbation, it is doomed to fail. I recently watched an American DVD featuring guys aged 18-22 who wanted to 'star' in porn movies. All were American and all were circumcised, most displaying the dark ring on the penis indicating use of the Gomco clamp. Some were circumcised more tightly than others – some retained the frenulum – two of the guys had no loose skin at all during erection but none the less appeared to enjoy masturbation.

African Medicinal Plants

Whilst on holiday in South Africa earlier this year my friend and I visited the Kirstenbosch National Botanical Gardens in Cape Town. These gardens nestle at the foot of Table Mountain and are home to a very wide variety of plants from Africa and elsewhere.

The gardens are mainly laid out with plants grouped according to type, but there is a large 'educational' section displaying many different plants which are regarded as 'useful'. Some provide materials for thatching and other construction work; others are foodstuffs or produce flavourings for food. A large selection are used by the native peoples as various forms of medicine or as 'lucky charms' to ward off evil of various sorts.

Prominently displayed right at the front edge of a large plot bordering a main path, two 'medicinal' plants in particular caught our attention. These were the icholocholo and the isicwe. The labels read: 'Crushed & warmed icholocholo leaves are used to dress wounds, including circumcision wounds.' and 'Felted isicwe leaves are used as circumcision dressings, and to cure septic wounds & sores.'

Note that teenage Xhosa boys of the region (even those living in townships) are generally circumcised in 'Initiation Schools' held around September time (Spring in South Africa).

No To Compulsory Circumcision

I must comment on the seemingly growing trend for men to advocate mandatory or compulsory circumcision. There are far too many parts of our lives being made compulsory for political reasons – I hope circumcision isn't another one of them. I am definitely pro-circ myself. In my opinion the naked glans is a great improvement on the foreskin, especially when the penis is erect. However, mandatory circumcision is a different matter. If it became law, it would degrade all men beyond words, because there would be no female equivalent. Therefore compulsory circumcision is a 'cut' too far. To implement it would create a state where boys and men would become second class citizens. If a woman told me to get circumcised or the relationship would end, I would dump her straight away – unless she reciprocated by having her clitoral foreskin excised.

All circumcisions should be voluntary or at the discretion of the individual, not for religious reasons. Where young boys are concerned, a full explanation should be given by a sympathetic person, male or female. If a man or boy requires a circumcision for health reasons (balanitis), a full explanation must be given. If an adult was to ask for my advice on this subject I would give my full support provided he knew what was involved. Not only does it look better, it is easier to maintain and offers protection from women.

Some people seem to find the subject erotic, even to the point of fetishism, as some events advertised on the internet have shown. Personally, I have nothing against such meetings, as it may bring relief and companionship to some men. I suppose it will always be a topic for more debate.

Comments On Survey Results

It is saddening to note that out of a membership of nearly 100 only 43 members bothered to reply to the survey. Surely the other half of the membership could have afforded the few minutes needed to complete the form and post it back?

Some comments in the responses deserve a reply, so here goes.

“Would like to see the Society’s Constitution”, “Formalise the meeting to get Constitution and committee sorted out” and “Need to define the Society’s purpose”.

The matter of a Constitution was discussed at a couple of meetings a few years back and the general feeling at the time was that it was better to have a Society which was not tied down by ‘rules’ and ‘red tape’. We therefore do not currently have a formal Constitution. If members feel that we should have one please write to the Editor who, if there are sufficient requests, will see that one is prepared and put to a future meeting for approval.

Contact Corner has always been available and was a regular item, but can only be included when members send in adverts. Acorn is not, however, a ‘dating’ magazine! The last issue did include a Contact Corner. Many members are, understandably, reluctant to publicly disclose their identity or contact details. The editor will always pass on letters for other members. Write your letter and seal it in its own envelope with stamps to cover the onward postage – do not address this envelope. Write a note to the Editor giving the name or other contact details of the intended recipient (eg R.W. – Surrey, Page 13, Issue 2/07). Put this and your sealed envelope in another and post to the PO Box address on the front cover of Acorn.

“Pay more for monthly newsletter”, “List of inexpensive circumcisers”, “Colour photos” plus various other suggestions for content.

The newsletter used to be produced 8 times a year; but the editor depends on members' contributions to fill the pages without having to repeat items that have been on the Internet or in various newspapers. The flow of material was often insufficient to make a new issue possible and so it had been decided to reduce the frequency to 6 times a year. A monthly publication would not be possible because of other commitments by the production team (e.g. work and personal holidays) as well as public holidays for Christmas and Easter interfering with the schedule.

Colour photos would, regrettably, increase the cost by up to 3 times. Furthermore, the present magazine is copied, collated, folded and stapled all in one go. This can only be done if all pages are in monochrome. Hand finishing would be required if any pages are of a different type and this could take too much of the production team's time.

Newly discovered doctors who will circumcise are often mentioned in Acorn. Providing a regular listing would take up a lot of space as well as needing constant updating. Since The Gilgal Society, <<http://www.gilgalsoc.org>>, already maintains a comprehensive list (a 40-page A5 booklet) and provides it in the UK for only the cost of post and packing, members are advised to use their services.

The variety and content of the magazine depends mainly on what members contribute. Unfortunately many have never contributed and most articles come from a tiny handful of members. If you want more variety, or a particular type of article then please contribute something – it's your magazine!

A Scar That's A Ring Of Confidence?

A mother once wrote about her son's beautiful circumcision; he had been circumcised by a mohel who had happened to be attending the maternity ward to initiate a Jewish baby. Yes, beauty is in the eye of the beholder, but can the perfect circumcision be judged dispassionately? I believe so, with five simple criteria for making the assessment, viz:

- 1 Conspicuousness: Is the scar prominent and noticeable or hardly visible?
- 2 The shape: Is the scar irregular, lopsided, off-centre or neatly symmetrical?
- 3 The prominence: Is the scar lumpy with skin tags, weal-like, or not raised at all?
- 4 The colour: Is the scar brown, slightly darker, pink, or as the shaft itself?
- 5 The position: Is the scar far down the shaft, midway or near the glans?

Observations should be made with the penis erect, the condition that the mohel requires to assess that the operation complies with the Denim of Milah. Scoring is as follows from lowest (worst) to highest (best)

1: 0-1-2

2: 0-1-2-3

3: 0-1-2

4: 0-1-2-3

5: 0-1-2

This implies that the perfect circumcision scar would be hardly visible, neatly symmetrical, not raised at all, shaft coloured and near the glans. This aesthetically superb finish would score  $2+3+2+3+2=12$ . No freehand or forceps guided circumcision could possibly score 12. The perfect circumcision would be one performed using a bell or clamp like the Gomco clamp, although the Gomco sometimes leaves a noticeable brown ring at the line of skin crushing. I suggest the perfect circumcision would result from expert application of the Hollister Plastibell.

Would not most Acorn readers agree with these criteria? As for a perfect circumcised penis, all other penile attributes would have to be considered especially the glans, its flare, and the curve and shape of the shaft and sulcus.

Amongst my school mates of long ago, baby boomers from the end of World War II, freehand circumcision was de rigueur, and, from the 45% roundhead component of form 3G, I doubt if anyone would have scored more than 6. Though many Acorn members would better my score of 4, I doubt if any would reach 9 or 10, with a 6 or 7 average. Nevertheless, I stand open to correction, as someone who has restored and who feels the perfect penis is the natural uncut one.

Prosecutor's Gaffes Add Touch Of The Surreal

[by Jeremy Gordin, Independent Online, South Africa]

It has not been an exceptionally jovial process for anyone connected with it, and yet there have been a few light – or at least witty or bizarre – moments at the rape trial of Jacob Zuma, the former deputy president.

First prize must go to Charin de Beer, the lead prosecutor. De Beer has preferred to cross-examine from a list of prepared questions and she has lost her place or focus a few times.

But, just as first prize goes to De Beer, so does the final word.

At the end of Zuma's cross-examination, Kemp put only a few questions of re-examination to him. One of these was: "Mr Zuma, can you tell us whether you are circumcised or not?"

"I am circumcised," Zuma replied.

"Are you happy with that?" Van der Merwe asked De Beer.

"Well, my lord," she said, "I certainly don't want to make an in loco examination."

Students Expelled For Dodging Foreskin Test

Seven Chinese students have been expelled from school for skipping a foreskin examination. The seven, who say they were too shy to undergo the test, forged a doctor's signature to say they had had it done. The foreskin examinations are part of an annual health check at Shahe People's Hospital for pupils of the middle school in Guangzhou city.

Ahai, one of the seven expelled students, said: "A lot of us were very shy about doing the foreskin examination, so the seven of us decided to forge the doctor's signature and return the paper to the hospital." But the fake signatures were spotted by the hospital, which informed the school, reports Guangzhou Daily.

Mrs Tian, the administrative director of the school, said: "We expelled them from their classes and gave them serious warnings because their actions stained the school's reputation." However, their parents are complaining that the punishment was too severe - and they are being backed by hospital staff. "It's not about the school's reputation, the students are just too shy and traditional," says a hospital spokesman.

Celebrity Query

Has there been any updating of the Celebrity Status Report? I am particularly interested to know whether the following stars are Cavaliers or Roundheads and I shall be extremely grateful if any member can throw light on their status:

Kevin Spacey	Stephen Dorff	Matt Damon
Ben Affleck	Chris O'Donnell	Brad Pitt

Celebrity Circumcision – Billy Crystal

In his autobiographical one-man Broadway show, 700 Sundays, Billy Crystal reveals his status. He has forgotten nothing. He remembers being born (tough), circumcised (rough), Grandpa Julius (gassy), aunt Sheila (funny), uncle Danny (don't ask) and a couple of hundred other incidents and people.

Editorial

In issue 2/2007, I reported on a circumcision petition which had been created on the Downing Street website (petitions.pm.gov.uk). This urged that the provision of access to prophylactic neo-natal circumcision in NHS hospitals be facilitated. To date, it has attracted forty signatures. But the site now also contains two anti-circumcision petitions. One, which has so far attracted 300 signatures, calls upon the Prime Minister to ban the circumcision of all males under 18 in the UK.

The difference in emphasis is stark. The first recognises the wish of some parents, whether for reasons of religion, tradition or prophylactic benefit, to have their sons circumcised and seeks to make that choice financially and clinically feasible. The second would ban the operation entirely, sweeping away both religious requirements and parental choice.

When the potent evidence of the increased protection which circumcision gives against HIV infection is added to the other known benefits, the case for prophylactic circumcision grows. Could it be that the anti-circumcision lobby recognises the danger to their cause and is pressing for a legal ban before it is too late?

Infibulation of the foreskin

Today, masturbation is largely accepted as a harmless and natural activity, providing sexual relief to the active male, especially those not in a regular sexual relationship. In the 19th century, however, America and Great Britain were gripped with a major hysteria about masturbation. It was viewed as an evil which had to be stopped. Masturbation was a dangerous, debilitating and deadly disease, and a potent cause of myriad other illnesses. A wide array of surgical, medical, dietary and behavioural therapies were introduced to curb masturbation. Most prominent amongst these was circumcision. The excision of the prepuce was thought to render manipulation of the circumcised penis difficult and unrewarding. Removal of the foreskin therefore became the main means of discouraging masturbation.

This is surprising considering that, historically, the foreskin itself had frequently been utilised to prevent self abuse. The process of masturbation is sequential. The glans is stimulated which leads to erection and ultimately orgasm and the emission of semen. If access to the glans is obscured and the potential for erection is limited, then orgasm and the waste of the male seed becomes impossible. Infibulation of the foreskin achieves these desired ends.

Infibulation is the process of piercing the foreskin and then inserting some type of binding to keep the foreskin closed and prevent retraction. Ideally the form and position of the binding should be such that erection is either impossible or, if it can occur, is painful.

The process of infibulation has been used since antiquity. The earliest forms were probably found in Ancient Greece where athletes taking part in the Games would bind the foreskin with a kynodesme, a simple leather lace, to keep it securely closed. But this was probably only a temporary measure to ensure that the glans did not become exposed during the competition. By Roman times, more permanent forms of closure were in use. Infibulation was used on three groups – athletes (including gladiators), singers and slaves. It was believed that athletes and gladiators preserved their vigour and performed better if chaste and that young singers' voices could be kept pure and unchanged. As far as slaves were concerned, it was important that the free women and children of the household should be under no threat of sexual seduction or violation. The infibulation of slaves provided this guarantee. It also prevented the unplanned impregnation of female slaves. Slaves were only permitted to be sexually active for breeding on a planned basis.

Infibulation then fell out of use until the eighteenth century when authors such as the English economist Thomas Robert Malthus vehemently advocated population control in western countries. In Germany, the surgeon Carl August Weinhold called for a policy of mandatory state sponsored infibulation. He proposed compulsory infibulation at the age of 14 for all those male citizens who were deemed unfit to propagate. This included criminals, beggars, chronically diseased people, unmarried servants, and apprentices and soldiers of the lower ranks. The infibulating wire was to be stamped with an official metal seal to avoid illegal removal with a detailed regimen of punishments for those who refused to obey.

But it was during the masturbation hysteria of the 19th century that infibulation began to come into its own. One of the first medical recommendations for preputial infibulation as a surgical method of preventing masturbation in boys came from Johann Christoph Jaeger. He argued for the use of infibulation to halt masturbation, claiming that it caused little pain and was easily performed. He supported his argument by citing the writings of the German physician Samuel Gottlieb von Vogel who advocated the use of infibulation in a home medical guide aimed at parents and teachers. Vogel had implied that the operation prevented erection, was relatively painless, was quick to perform and was an unfailing method of preventing onanism.

So how was infibulation carried out? Essentially it involved pulling the foreskin down over the glans, and piercing the foreskin through both sides, either vertically or horizontally and clamping the whole thing in place with a ring or thread. The procedure was usually performed with a needle which was used both to make the initial piercings and to draw through a thick thread. Sometimes the ring or fibula (safety pin) would be inserted directly afterwards as part of the piercing process. Otherwise the thread remained in place until the cicatrising of the holes had taken place when a ring was substituted.

As noted above, the purpose of the infibulation was to make arousal painful and erection impossible, and the piercings were placed so as to achieve this goal. The intention was that, as the penis became erect, the foreskin would drag on the pins; at the same time, the glans would increasingly press into the pins as the penis became more engorged. Both these processes would be exquisitely painful.

The Glasgow physician David Yellowlees who served as the medical superintendent in a lunatic asylum first in Wales and then in Scotland described his method thus:

[S]ome direct operative interference, which shall prevent masturbation and show him [the patient] that he can live without it, may be of much service. The best form of such interference is so to fix the foreskin that erection becomes painful and erotic impulses very unwelcome. To accomplish this, the prepuce is drawn well forward, the left forefinger inserted within it down to the root of the glans, and a nickel-plated safety-pin, introduced from the outside through skin and mucous membrane, is passed horizontally for half an inch or so past the tip of the left finger, and then brought out through mucous membrane and skin so as to fasten outside. Another pin is similarly fixed on the opposite side of the prepuce. With the foreskin thus looped up any attempt at erection causes a painful dragging on the pins, and masturbation is effectually prevented.

To make erection even more difficult, the infibulation could be enhanced by a ring through the frenulum which was then attached to the scrotum. Any incipient erection immediately caused tension in the frenulum and pressure on the testicles – both inherently painful. The most extreme form of infibulation is exemplified by two Roman statues of naked slaves in the Louvre. Both have their penises bent double so that the head points towards the body. The infibulating ring passes horizontally through the shaft of the penis, a little behind the glans. The other half of the ring is attached close to the trunk of the slave, and passes horizontally either through the shaft of the penis at its point of attachment or through the suspensory ligament. The ring is quite large. It would have been of bronze, and welded shut. There is documentary evidence to suggest that such rings were fitted shortly before puberty or just at its onset. Erections must have been very painful, and it is certain that the slaves could never achieve penetration. Orgasm and ejaculation would have been infrequent, and probably avoided as far as that was possible. The slaves would tend to avoid thoughts of sex, because of the pain of erections, and would thus concentrate on working hard for their master.

Although the uncircumcised foreskin was the most common target for infibulation, the Prince Albert piercing may have first been practised as a form of infibulation on circumcised men. It is often alleged that the piercing originated with Prince Albert and that he wore a ring attached to his penis which was then strapped to his thigh, in order to maintain the smooth line of the tight trousers that were in fashion at the time. However, it would clearly have been possible for the piercing to have been used as the basis for a more permanent means of preventing erections in young men.

All the above is written in the past tense, and it may be thought that male infibulation has long been swept into the dustbin of history. Not so. In a future edition I will print the story of a young man who has been wired up for the past five years!

Why Did You Have Me Circumcised?

Finally I got around to emailing my parents to ask them why I was circumcised and to let them know that I'm not cool with their decision. Amazingly enough, they both responded quite quickly (my dad almost never responds to anything that's vaguely serious). If you care, here's what they said.

Mom:

"At the time I was reading what some said about the lack of medical necessity of circumcision, and was not convinced it was something we should do. There were arguments on both sides of the medical issue. It seems now opinion is shifting back to circumcision as better (health-wise), although you can find plenty of opinions otherwise. In my mind, it had nothing whatsoever to do with religion (and I don't think Robert thought so either). I felt that tradition was not a good enough reason (and I don't think Robert did either), and I was not sure that being 'like other boys' was a good enough reason. (I think this comes closest to why Robert thought you should be circumcised.) I wanted a good, solid answer on the medical advantages, and there really wasn't a clear cut line. Still isn't. Since I was not convinced enough that it was not a better idea to leave you uncircumcised, and Robert seemed very sure that he thought it was better to have you circumcised,

I went along with his decision. I don't say that to put the 'blame' on him. I was not at all sure it would be a good idea not to circumcise you, so in a way it was a relief that he was sure about what he thought. It was not a point of disagreement between us, even though I didn't feel 100% comfortable with it.

From what I've heard from people through the years, although no one likes the thought of being cut, men DO have more (health) problems when they are not circumcised. That's opinions of people, of course, not a scientific survey. You can find good information to back both sides. The long and short of it is that parents have to make a LOT of decisions for their children with no way of knowing at the time what the best decision would be. And it was a heck of a lot easier on everyone to have it done then than to find out later it was needed. We realized either way you might not agree with us and resent us, but we had to make a decision with what information we had.

So all I can say is I'm sorry you are not in agreement. It grieved me at the time (but of course so did the eye surgeries and hernia surgery and meningitis treatment...) but we did what we thought best. Although I considered not circumcising you, I was not convinced enough of the wisdom to really push the issue. (And if my account and Robert's differs on THIS, I am going to be absolutely amazed!!)"

Dad:

"Why were you circumcised? We debated the issue, and we had a 50% chance of getting it right. Now you know why I don't gamble.

When I was born (in our corner of the world), it was just assumed boys would be circumcised when they were born. Supposedly at the time it was for health (or perceived health) reasons. Thinking back on it, I only know of one boy I went to school with who wasn't, and yes, he was stared at and made fun of. He was different. I suppose that flavoured my opinion on the subject.

By the time you were born supposedly there had been many studies done and the common wisdom of the Zeitgeist was that circumcision was unnecessary as long as the individual practised good hygiene. But there have always been studies that indicate that uncircumcised men have more problems or even suggest they can lead to problems with their (female) sexual partners. (Twenty years ago, we just assumed you'd be heterosexual, and we didn't want you plagued with something that potential mates would find disturbing or even disgusting.)

Still we debated the issue. The doctors offered advice, but did not pressure us in any way. They left the decision up to us. We went back and forth. We did wonder if would you 'miss' your foreskin one day if we had it removed. We also wondered if you would hold it against us if we didn't have you circumcised and you were different from all your friends, and you were made fun of. We wondered what you would think if you realized you were different (in that department) from your father, and how knowing that would affect you. I wondered if you would think it was good enough for me, but we didn't think you were 'worth it' to have you circumcised. And I guess a part of me felt if it was good enough for my father, and it was good enough for me, it was good enough for you.

Religiously, it did enter into my mind that Jehovah probably had a good reason for telling all the Children of Israel (and all the men of the nations they conquered) to be circumcised. Though we're not Jewish, there is some sound advice in some of the roots of some of their customs and practices. But that wasn't a big player in the decision. With the latest news being that HIV incidence is much higher in uncircumcised men, I'm still not sure where I stand on the issue. I don't regret that I'm circumcised. I don't even regret that you are circumcised. I do regret that you object to the decision we made."

Naturally, I don't particularly agree with their reasoning. But I guess it's nice to know that I'm justified in being disappointed with/angry at them.

An Australian's Experience

I was born in Australia at a time when all males were 'done'. My mother once told me that I was the only one not 'done' in the ward of 20 or so. I grew up knowing the difference and I would be lying to say that it did not make some sort of difference to me. Certainly I think it put me off getting involved sexually for a little longer than some of my friends. By 17 though I was involved with my first serious girlfriend and she actually preferred a foreskin, having seen both. It certainly never stopped her from giving head, that's for sure!

At twenty-one I moved to the US and had several more girlfriends, a (white) South African, a French girl and an American. While I thought that the 'skin' would be an issue, it never was, no matter where they were from. Actually not one of them cared or did/did not do something sexually because of it, though it might have taken that bit longer for it to happen... there was always a little hesitation at first and ALL asked if I had washed first (even my first girlfriend) even though they all knew I always showered and stayed very clean!

That all said, I found sex to be less than great, no matter who I was with. I had a longish, thick foreskin that did not stay retracted like so many seem to think they do, so sex, with or without a condom, was like masturbating myself! I was also finding no matter how much I washed, it always had an odour soon after especially in the warm climate of southern California. But perhaps the most interesting thing that made me decide to have it 'done' at some point was one night with the French girl. During intercourse, she reached down and held my foreskin back. Immediately I noticed the difference; someone had turned on the light and I saw what all the fuss was about! The kicker though was that, right after she did it, she said: "That feels so much better."

After several more years, I came back to Australia and decided to have it done. It's now been over ten years since the operation and I have to say sex has never been better and the odour has vanished. Do girls care? No, but in that vein I found the willingness to do certain things much greater or lacking hesitation. I can honestly say that I have not lost a single bit of sensation in any way. I had a son last year and we had him done. Certainly, after seeing just how little fuss it caused him (no crying and slept like a log afterwards), and how fast he recovered,

I wish it had been done to me at birth – recovery as an adult takes a lot longer and the healed result is never as good as having it done as an infant.

I make it sound like it's all about the sex though, which it's not. Sure, the improvement feeling-wise that came with having it done is great but to me there is something that I just prefer. I lived for 25 years with a foreskin and 12 without and I much prefer the without. It is cleaner from a day to day point of view as well as a sexual health one and to me more aesthetically pleasing. I like the idea that I don't always have to maintain it. Not a lazy thing, there are just instances in life where washing or 'normal' hygiene is not possible and not having 'things' grow under the skin is nice. My partner has no strong views either way and has experienced her fair share. At a pinch though she told me she thinks a circumcised penis is better for oral and the like but it's a minor thing. To her they both feel the same and it's what they are attached to that makes the difference, same with most women from what I have experienced.

I understand where all the near hysteria comes from on the anti side. Forcing an issue on people like they did in the US and here, with little rhyme or reason, was bound to cause the backlash it has. There is also nothing better to get a guy all worked up than to tell him that he's been ripped off because the tip of his dick has been cut off... as if most, if not all, guys don't have some sort of self doubt about what's between their legs. But it is hysteria and makes life difficult for new parents, the one's that make this decision most of the time for their sons. There is nothing wrong or abhorrent with modern circumcisions. My son's was a simple, controlled procedure that seemed to have caused him little or no distress – no more than trying to get used to the world he was brought into. I think there needs to be a balance and people need to be allowed to make their own choices for their sons, as there is really nothing wrong with either choice.

Circumcision Techniques 4

The Mogen Clamp

The Mogen clamp was invented in 1954 by Rabbi Harry Bronstein, a Brooklyn mohel. For many years it was used only in Jewish ritual circumcision but in the past ten or so years, US physicians have used the clamp increasingly in medical settings for newborn circumcision.

Mogen is the Yiddish word for shield and the Mogen clamp is used in the same way as the circumcision shield used traditionally by mohelim. The clamp is a flat metal device with two metal arms fixed at one end with a pivoting joint which allows the two arms to be pulled apart. The other two ends of the arms are joined with a brace which only allows the arms to be pulled apart by a few millimetres. This creates a narrow opening through which the foreskin, but not the glans, can be pulled. Once the foreskin is in position, the clamp is closed. It locks with great force along a narrow crush line. It does not cut, it only crushes. It is not a guillotine as is commonly thought. The clamp protects the glans, which remains below the clamp, and allows the foreskin above the clamp to be safely removed.

The baby's penis is first injected with lidocaine, if anaesthesia is to be used. (See the discussion about this below.) The preputial opening is then stretched and a blunt-edged probe is used to free all adhesions between the glans and the foreskin so that the foreskin is completely retractile. After the mucosa is separated and anesthetized, the glans is lubricated with an antiseptic ointment.

A straight Kelly haemostat is placed in the midline of the dorsal side of the prepuce approximately 5 mm proximal to the corona and the prepuce is carefully pulled with the haemostat in an up and outward direction. This action causes the glans to retract towards the scrotum, preventing accidental amputation of the glans. The Mogen clamp is opened fully and the foreskin is pulled through. Since part of the inner skin, or mucosa, is preserved in this method, it is important that sufficient outer skin is drawn through the clamp and excised to ensure full exposure of the glans.

A key step in Mogen circumcision is the safe placement of the clamp. To push the glans back out of the way, the surgeon's thumb and index finger pinch the foreskin below the dorsal haemostat. The Mogen clamp is then slid across the foreskin from dorsal to ventral, with the hollow side of the clamp facing the glans. The clamp follows along the same angle as the corona. The shape of the foreskin to be excised is thus triangular and more foreskin is removed dorsally than ventrally.

Before locking the Mogen clamp shut, the glans is manipulated to be sure it is free of the clamp's jaws. If it is, the clamp is locked and the foreskin is excised flush with the flat surface of the clamp with a scalpel.

The clamp is left on for a period to ensure haemostasis - one to one and a half minutes for a new born but no less than five minutes if the infant is more than 6 months old. The clamp is then unlocked and removed. The crush line covers the glans fully with penile shaft skin. The glans is liberated by thumb traction at the 3 and 9 o'clock positions that pulls the crush line apart. The remaining skin is gently pushed down from off the glans and any remaining adhesions are removed. Antiseptic ointment is applied to the crush line and the penis is covered with a vaseline gauze.

If the clamp is removed prematurely, the crushed edges may separate and bleeding will occur. Bleeding is one of the most common complications and can usually be controlled by applying gentle circumferential pressure with gauze or a sponge. If the whole edge separates, it may be necessary to treat as if it were a freehand circumcision, placing quadrant sutures and sewing between them with fine stitches.

Research has shown that the Mogen circumcision clamp used by ritual circumcisers is a faster, less painful way to perform circumcisions than the Gomco clamp often preferred by physicians. Two physicians, Drs. Peter Kurtis and Hema DeSilva at the St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center in Hartford, monitored the heart and respiratory rates, oxygen saturation and crying of 48 healthy, full-term infants during circumcisions they performed at St. Francis. The study also looked at the use of local anaesthesia during the procedure. Noting that the Mogen clamp is faster and less painful, Kurtis said that when it's used, "even without anaesthesia, more than half of the babies didn't cry during the procedure". "It's interesting that the way it's been done in a traditional bris is clearly the least painful way to do the circumcision," Kurtis added. "Mohels are so skilled and fast at what they do, they do a very good job of minimizing pain to the baby. They're looked upon as experts in doing circumcision."

Since the pain level during circumcision with the Mogen clamp without anaesthesia is comparable to that accompanying the Gomco clamp with anaesthesia, it is arguable that circumcision with the Mogen clamp without the use of anaesthesia is justified.

A Wife's Perspective

As a woman, I am used to having frank and open discussions about my health with my gynaecologist. As a mother of three, I'm used to not being embarrassed over exposing my bottom to a room full of strangers. From a medical standpoint, I'm comfortable with asking questions and taking responsibility for my physical well-being.

When Franco continued to experience the balanitis it became clear that we had a problem for which we had to find a solution. His uncircumcised status was never an issue with me and I enjoy him just the way he is. However, after the increasing frequency of the flare-ups and the potential long-term effects of the situation, we decided to talk to the doctor about solving the problem once and for all via circumcision.

I view his circumcision as a cosmetic procedure for health reasons. It will not affect his sexual performance, it should improve and provide new enhanced sensation and eliminate the bothersome bouts of balanitis. I realise for him, as an adult, it is a personal choice, not one your parents made for you at birth. There are men who are in the process of trying to extend their foreskins and regain something they believe was robbed from them. Yes, it is a personal, emotional issue for men.

From my perspective, I want to make this procedure one where he is calling the shots, making the informed decisions and has my full support. There is really no equivalent for women in this realm, as female circumcision is genital mutilation, hysterectomy is often done as a last resort for tumours, endometriosis or cancer. The most obvious change in a woman's body is the tragedy of mastectomy due to breast cancer. Therefore, in many ways I share his angst but do not view it as a life or death decision.

I understand that a man's penis is more than an organ with which to procreate and urinate. From infancy, it provides a great source of pleasure and pride. I don't believe women feel quite as intense about their genitals, at least not in the same cosmetic sense.

The bottom line is, I love my husband the way he is and will love him the way he will be. This is an informed journey with which we will take extreme care to make sure we are informed, make good decisions and support one another through. Individuals must take responsibility for their own health care and decisions. Unconditional love and trust are paramount to any successful marriage. For us, it is not about locker room appearance; it is all about health, long-term health issues and the acceptance of a new phase in life for Franco. I'm very comfortable with that and will be happy for him once the recovery is complete.

In case anyone cares or wonders, no, I do not have a preference for the appearance or feel of circumcised over uncircumcised penises as long as proper hygiene is observed. Hygiene and a good sense of humour mean much more to me than whether or not someone does or does not possess a foreskin!

Good luck to anyone who is contemplating this procedure. Make sure your partner supports you and that you feel like you are in charge of your body. Take pride in yourself and have the confidence to take this step and move ahead with the rest of your life.

Circumcision Is Progressive

[A member responds to the Editor's column in issue 3/2007]

Is circumcision against nature? It is certainly against our natural state at birth, but as the editor referred to in his column – we must make progress as a species, jettisoning what we don't need. Science developed antibiotics, key hole surgery, spare-part surgery, and improved medication to prolong human life and improve health. Circumcision, if it is used to relieve the effects of balanitis, phimosis or some other defect is, in my opinion, progressive. If a man or boy wishes to undergo circumcision of their own volition for aesthetic reasons, that is in order. Circumcision for religious reasons or tradition, where a boy or man has no opinion, control, over his body should be dumped in the past regardless of what the traditionalists say.

With regards to the origin of circumcision, it seems to have got lost in the 'mists of time'. Although Egypt seems to be one of the main practitioners of the procedure, circumcision, including the circumcision of women (the removal of the clitoral hood) was for thousands of years practised all over northern Africa.

I was circumcised at two or three years of age during the early years of WW2 because I was apparently suffering from phimosis or balanitis – or what my mother called a 'sore willy'. During the nineteen thirties, when I was born, it was common for little boys to be circumcised, although it did cause a lot of embarrassment and sniggering from the less enlightened people. Last year (21st August) I underwent a re-circ and frenulectomy, with Dr Zarifa, just for aesthetic reasons. As a naturist, and a man who enjoys swimming totally naked in the sea, not having a foreskin is a definite advantage. Sand cannot get under it and cause irritation or discomfort. Women I have known have been noticeably impressed by my circumcised state. They have referred to my 'deep groove' at the back of the corona and the glans as the 'policeman's helmet'. They seem to be 'turned-on' by the fact that we need surgery to achieve a circumcision.

Penile Hygiene And Circumcision

There's a lot of nonsense written about penile hygiene and circumcision.

1. Circumcision discourages masturbation, or even makes it impossible. WRONG. You don't need a foreskin to be able to wank! All you need is a lubricant. Soapy water in the shower is good enough, or talcum powder. Brylcreem used to be popular. The really kinky can use Sloan's Liniment.

2. In this modern day and age with plentiful soap and water (in developed countries anyway) keeping the penis clean is no problem. WRONG again. Public swimming pools, showers, changing (locker) rooms all abound with all sorts of nasty infections: fungal, yeasts, bacterial and viral. Tinia (Athlete's Foot) is very dangerous because bacteria can get into the cracks between the toes and cause Acute Lymphangitis, which is life-threatening. This nasty microscopic fungus can also get under the foreskin and cause Athlete's Cock (I don't know the correct medical term). This is what causes the dreadful smell of unwashed socks and smegma.

So plain old soap and water are not sufficient to keep the uncircumcised cock clean. The only way to ensure complete hygiene is to have the foreskin removed so that the glans remains permanently dry.

3. Whether you like it or not, the condom is here to stay. Even with the benefit of the Contraceptive Pill, a condom must be used whenever you DO NOT want to conceive a child or contract a STD. A condom is most comfortable on a tightly circumcised cock. It will stay on like Cling Wrap and not ruckle up or pull off.

Police Investigate Baby's Death After Circumcision

[By Martin Beckford, Daily Telegraph, 16th February 2007]

Detectives are investigating the death of a baby boy who stopped breathing minutes after he was circumcised. Amitai Moshe, then just seven days old, became ill while still at the north London synagogue where the ceremony had been performed. He was taken to a nearby hospital but died the following week. Initial tests suggest that he suffered a fatal heart attack.

Jewish leaders have stressed that no link has been found between the circumcision ritual and Amitai's death. However, police are treating the incident as unexplained and have appointed detectives from the Metropolitan Police Serious Crime Directorate, which includes child abuse investigators, to investigate. Last night Amitai's father Ran, 32, and mother Yotvat, 30, were too distraught to talk about their son's death. Amitai's grandmother, speaking from the family's home in Golders Green, said: "It is a very bad time for them." Neighbours in the close-knit Jewish community said they were supporting the couple, who also have a young daughter. One woman said: "It's a very sad tragedy and we're all helping them."

Amitai was born on 25th January and was circumcised a week later at the Golders Green synagogue by a registered practitioner of the operation, known as a Mohel. Jewish baby boys traditionally undergo the ceremony, known as the Bris Milah, on the eighth day of their lives. The foreskin of the penis is removed, to symbolise the Jewish boy entering into a covenant with God, followed by a naming ceremony.

But 15 minutes after Amitai was circumcised he stopped breathing and emergency services were called. He was taken to the Royal Free Hospital and later transferred to University College Hospital in central London, where he died last Friday. A post mortem examination gave the initial cause of death as cardiac arrest and starvation of oxygen to the brain. An inquest into Amitai's death was opened and adjourned at Hornsey coroner's court yesterday. The coroner will review the case in a fortnight after further tests. Scotland Yard said: "Police are investigating the circumstances of the death of a baby boy. Inquiries are being carried out by officers from the Serious Crime Directorate. The death is being treated as unexplained." A spokesman for Hornsey coroner's court said: "The child abuse investigation team is investigating the circumstances. A post mortem revealed a possible cause of death but this is to be confirmed after further tests."

A spokesman for the Board of Deputies of British Jews, the body that represents British Jews, insisted that circumcision was safe and that there was no suggestion that Amitai had died because of the procedure. He said: "We are deeply saddened by the event. There were absolutely no problems at the time of the circumcision and it was about 15 minutes afterwards that it was noticed there were some breathing difficulties. No causal connection has been established between the circumcision and Amitai's death. It was carried out by a Mohel who is a registered member of the Initiation Society, which has been regulating and training them for over 200 years. Over 2,000 circumcisions of baby boys are carried out in Britain every year. It is a very established, regulated practice in terms of medical training. This was an unfortunate juxtaposition of two events."

A French Cut

[www.circumcised-beauty.blogspot.com is a website
'in praise of the beauty that is the circumcised penis'.]

The following is about an illustrated contribution from a Frenchman.]

Jean hails from France, a country not exactly known for circumcision in the past, but he grew up in the French colony of Morocco, more specifically in that most exotic of cities, Casablanca, made famous by the film of the same name where his family business was based.

At the age of nine, both Jean and his cousin were circumcised under a general anaesthetic for phimosis, a relatively common problem that prevents the foreskin of uncircumcised males from being easily retracted thus hindering or preventing even basic hygiene and making sexual activities painful. If not treated, it may lead to other problems in later life.

As an adult Jean moved back to live and work in France and soon noticed that very few French males were circumcised. Initially this concerned him but he soon came to realise that, rather than something to be worried about, it was actually something to be celebrated and proud of, especially when visiting the famous beaches in the South of France!

Jean says that today, in a far more modern and multicultural France, the number of circumcised males is on the rise and not just in France but across other European countries such as Germany and Italy as well.

Merci, Jean, for sharing your photos. I'm sure all will agree the surgeon created a masterpiece that will be admired by all.

Thoughts On Issue 3/2007

In response to Celebrity Query, online photos have shown that Matt Damon, Ben Affleck, Chris O'Donnell and Brad Pitt are circumcised as are most American men unless their parents were hippies (eg River Phoenix's) or recent immigrants from countries where their culture did not practise circumcision such as Asian or Latino.

I have serious doubts about the guy's story in the article Glans After Circumcision. The results of his circumcision were 'massive' and the removed foreskin was as large as his hand. This sort of stuff from a Men's Health internet forum is at best suggestive of made up stories by folks who are very anti-circumcision and, believe me, I have seen their horror story in an issue about five years ago telling how all those circumcised have been robbed of their manhood. Who ever met a man who couldn't figure out how to get an ejaculation once he passed through puberty? Sounds like it is written by a female! Worse yet, it reads like we have been infiltrated by the anti-circumcision lobby who seek to make liars of all those males circumcised as adults who find post-circumcision sex better. Frankly, I am surprised that the Acorn Society didn't understand what was going on in this article. Some in my locale think Men's Health is a gay publication with definite slants on its stories. Certainly, their big circumcision story of five years ago was slanted; all the comments said the circumcised were robbed of so much that it was definitely 'protests too much' stuff as is the story you reprinted. While I appreciate argument pro and con, here the poor reader could easily be conned, as we say in American slang.

As to the story No to Compulsory Circumcision, the writer's logic fails me. Women do not have a penis or a foreskin even though I have met some who have more 'balls' than do some men I know. I, too, am against mandatory circumcision. But I believe that Routine Infant Circumcision is the easiest route for parents to 'inoculate' their sons and evade the ordeal of later circumcision when surely it is more painful, must usually be done in a hospital and does lay one up for at least a few days.

Thanks for the Plastibell story. My first son's circumcision was by that method and it was easy for us as parents to understand that it would remove itself in a few days as it did.

While perusing the latest newsletter, I would appreciate the elimination of pictures of erect penises; they seem to put the publication closer to pornography than normal content.

Healthy Cut

When my wife was pregnant with our first child, we took a Lamaze class. It so happened that we ended up in a class with three other couples, two of whom we already knew. During a session, we talked about what to expect after the baby was born; a discussion that touched on circumcision. All of a sudden, one of the couples that we knew began to have a nasty fight over whether their baby, if a boy, would be circumcised. The husband was adamant he would be, the wife equally as adamant he wouldn't. It got so bad, the rest of us suggested they just better have a girl to avoid a further argument. They did end up having a girl... and a few years later, a divorce. I guess circumcision was just one of a number of things they couldn't agree on.

For us, when we had a boy, the question of circumcision was a no-brainer. I may not be a religious Jew but I'm enough of one to follow that tradition, rabbi and all. It never occurred to me not to have my sons circumcised and my wife was all for it, too. When the procedure was done, to be quite honest, she shed more tears watching than either of our boys did experiencing it.

Male circumcision has received a lot of negative press over the past few years. A number of groups have claimed that it traumatises boys for life and that it is equivalent to mutilation and female circumcision. Ridiculous arguments; at best it can be claimed that male circumcision is unnecessary. As it turns out, even that argument may have been quashed with the news that uncircumcised men are 50-60 per cent more likely to contract the HIV virus than circumcised men are. That announcement is being hailed as a breakthrough in the fight against AIDS, particularly in poorer nations where sexual activity is not met with the same precautions as it is in the developed world. The reason, it appears, is that the cells in the tissue that make up the foreskin are very vulnerable to the infection.

It has long been suggested that circumcised men were less likely to suffer from a number of infectious diseases and links have been established between circumcision and a reduced chance of penile cancers. To me, tradition and religion aside, that makes circumcision more like an inoculation than mutilation. Of course, convincing people, in places where superstition and religious dogma run rampant, that circumcision will be healthy for their children is another matter, altogether. Even efforts to wipe out diseases like smallpox and polio in those nations has been difficult thanks to hideous propaganda against Western efforts.

Hopefully, we can at least convince the naysayers in our society.

Protecting Health

Recent figures from the Health Protection Agency show that rates of sexually transmitted infections are rising remorselessly, especially amongst teenagers. Yet mention is never made of the role of circumcision in reducing the level of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). It has been known for decades that circumcised men are far less likely to contract and therefore pass on infection but this fact is ignored.

A couple of years ago I read on the internet the results of a long term survey conducted in New Zealand. The health of two groups of young men was compared from birth to 25 years. The first group had been circumcised at birth and the second group was uncircumcised. The conclusion of the study was quite clear. After making allowances for the sexual orientation and the number of sexual partners of each young man, the circumcised group was far less likely to contract an STD. This, the report conceded, merely confirmed what was already known about the health benefits of circumcision.

It seems to me logical that health authorities should be promoting the procedure in the same way that they advise inoculations against polio, for example. The argument that the procedure cannot be carried out at birth because the child cannot give his consent is spurious – it is something parents have to do for their sons. This is not to say that I advocate compulsory routine infant circumcision. But it should be seen as something that responsible parents ensure is carried out (along with vaccinations) and should be available on the NHS.

The article from The Scotsman published in issue 3/2007 (page 11) quoted a health spokesman as saying: “We would never advocate circumcision over the use of condoms as the best protection against HIV transmission.” The figures for STD infection make it clear that condoms are not being used. The quote reveals a touching naivety about the priorities of a young man given the opportunity to have sex. Condom or not, after a few beers, he is going to take the risk and have sex. If he has been circumcised, his chance of contracting and passing on an STD is much reduced. That is the reality and health authorities are guilty of negligence in ignoring this.

They are also guilty of neglect in failing to ensure regular health screening of young men. STDs can frequently be diagnosed in men by a simple, brief visual inspection as long as the foreskin is retractable. They manifest themselves as lesions or blisters on the glans and discharge from the urethra. I met a young Turkish man in Amsterdam last month. He was 20 and was born, educated and circumcised in Holland. He told me of his annual school medicals. They are compulsory up to age 18 and, until the boy is 16, parents are free to attend. The medical is a top to toe examination and it concludes with the boy naked on an examination table where his genitals are inspected.

He is examined for hernias, his testicles are squeezed gently to check for lumps and finally his penis is squeezed and pulled to check for any unhealthy discharge. My Turkish friend, being a Moslem, was circumcised at 8 years old, but he knew from discussions with his class mates that uncircumcised boys have their foreskins retracted and their glans inspected from all angles. It is true that the boys do not look forward to their annual visit to the doctor, usually because they dread developing an erection. While erections are not deliberately induced, they do occur. Foreskin problems are more easily spotted when the penis is erect. Thus do the Dutch ensure that young men are rupture free, physically developed and free from STDs.

Issue 3/2007 reported (page 15) on the Chinese boys expelled for dodging a foreskin test. I have met young men from all over the world who have told me of their school medical experiences. It is an accepted fact of life in most countries, but not in the UK, which may explain our disgraceful rate of STD infection.

Male Circumcision Partnership Director. This post, based in Zambia, is currently being advertised by Population Services International (PSI). They have formed a Male Circumcision Partnership to scale up safe, effective adult male circumcision services in four African countries including Zambia, Zimbabwe, Malawi and Swaziland. The vision is to reverse the HIV epidemic in Africa by engaging all sectors – private, public and NGO – to deliver high quality, large scale, male circumcision services. The Director will be responsible for driving and coordinating the implementation of the Male Circumcision Partnership to achieve the rapid scaling up of male circumcision in Southern Africa.

The research confirming that male circumcision substantially reduces susceptibility to HIV infection is less than a year old and it is excellent news that there is already such real momentum behind the move to make theory a reality. The task, to offer circumcision to all males in Southern Africa, is monumental – the article on page 6 about Israeli doctors in Swaziland confirms this. Yet with sufficient resources the goal of achieving universal male circumcision in Southern Africa can be achieved.

Details of the job can be found at www.psi.org, closing date 18th December.

Circumcision as a Weapon of War

Shakespeare gives us many pairs of tragic lovers – Romeo and Juliet, and Othello and Desdemona, to mention just two. In real life, castration was the horrendous punishment inflicted on Abelard for his love of Heloise. But an even more disastrous love match was that recounted in the Old Testament between Shechem and Dinah, for Shechem brought disaster not just on himself but on his whole tribe.

The story is recounted in chapter 34 of Genesis. The story is skeletal in the telling and we have to put our own flesh on the bones. Dinah was the daughter of Jacob and Leah, probably about 15 or 16 at the time of the story, perhaps even younger. One day she “went out to see the daughters of the land”. In other words, she went to meet friends and no doubt she went out not just to see but also to be seen; and by the sons as much as by the daughters. As will happen on such occasions, mischief ensued. She was seen by, and saw, Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hittite, prince of the country. They fancied each other, a relationship ensued (was it just the one time she “went out”?) and they made love. The Bible implies that rape took place (“He saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her.”) but Shechem’s ensuing actions belie this. Rape is a brutal act, one of aggression and power rather than love, with the victim discarded once the act is over. But in the case of Shechem, “his soul clave unto Dinah, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel”. In other words, the guy was in love, his feelings were reciprocated and the inevitable happened. Indeed, so deep was his commitment that he wished to marry the girl and he asked his father to arrange matters.

Now, in the families of princes, marriage is often more about creating alliances and acquiring property than it is about love. But Hamor, Shechem’s father, saw an opportunity to turn this love match to his advantage. The Israelites were a prosperous tribe with animals, servants and valuable possessions. All this could accrue to the Hittites if he played his cards right. So he arranged a meeting with Jacob and Dinah’s brothers and asked for Dinah’s hand for his son. He offered whatever dowry they required; indeed he went further and offered intermarriage between the tribes so that they would live together, and trade, and share possessions.

But Dinah’s brothers were furious that their sister had been defiled and no doubt family pride came into play. They decided to take a savage revenge but they first needed to lull their opponents into a false sense of security and then weaken them fatally. So they responded that they would be delighted to accept Hamar’s proposition. There was just one difficulty. It was impossible for them to give their sister to a man who was uncircumcised. But if the Hittites agreed that all the males would be circumcised “then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people”.

Now circumcision might seem a big ask for grown men. But even if the Hittite tribe did not practise circumcision themselves, they would be aware of tribes that did and the concept would not be strange to them. And so besotted was Shechem with Dinah that he was a powerful advocate. He persuaded all the men of his city that this pact was in their own best interests and that circumcision was a small price to pay.

So all the men in the city submitted themselves to the knife. But the knives would have been of flint and of course those were the days before anaesthetics. So the operation would have been crude, slow and very painful. Furthermore, there would have been no sutures so there would probably have been loss of blood, and night-time erections would have reopened the healing wounds. Infection and fever no doubt afflicted some. In all the operation would have been very debilitating and the men would have been feeling very sorry for themselves. The biblical description of them as “sore” is probably a gross understatement.

It was at this point, on the third day after the operation, that Simeon and Levi, two of Dinah’s brothers, wreaked their revenge. They and a band of kinsmen attacked the city; the Hittite men were in no condition to proffer resistance and they were easily overcome. All the men were executed, their wives, children and servants were taken into slavery and their animals and other possessions sequestered. At the time, the Jewish covenant required male servants and slaves within a Jewish household to be circumcised, even if they were not of the Jewish faith. Ironically therefore the male Hittite children and servants taken into slavery after the capture of the city would have come conveniently pre-circumcised.

Jacob, Dinah’s father, was concerned about the action of his sons but not through any moral outrage. Rather he feared retaliation from other tribes inhabiting the land. But the sons were unrepentant: “Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?”

There were numerous occasions during the Crusades when Christian captives were forcibly circumcised by their Islamic captors. There will have been numerous occasions when men have undergone circumcision in order to marry into the Jewish or Islamic faith. But this is possibly the only example where circumcision has been used as a weapon of war. A more dishonourable one it would be difficult to find. Simeon and Levi used the cover of their religion to deceive their enemies – the sign of the covenant should have been sacred to them and in using it to violate their enemies, they themselves were being profane. Further, the sin, if sin there was since Dinah was equally complicit, was committed by one man, and one who tried to make reparations; but devastation was wrought on the whole tribe who were innocent of the original offence. A strange episode indeed.

Erections Allowed!

In issue 4/2007, I raised an objection to pictures of erect penises in the Acorn newsletter. If I am allowed to change my mind, I must withdraw my comment. The change arises because I have just received an advertisement from Macy’s, which is one of our largest retail clothes stores, and behold, in the popular domain, is an offering for 2xist men's underwear with the model sporting one helluva an erection. Now, if it made it through the US Mail on a postcard where nothing is hidden, then time must have passed me by. I had also winced when I heard that it was ok to answer your door wearing boxer shorts in NY City. That also had surprised me that standards had changed so much. So, I recant.

By the way, I asked the question of my wife whether sex had been any different for her after my circumcision and she said NO. Always thought the new 'polls' where women opted for the uncircumcised men over the circumcised had to be so much bull. These 'polls' surfaced recently on the web and I thought they were anti-circumcision material. Not that my wife's impression is a poll, but I know it is an honest answer. She was also surprised that I was corresponding to another man about such a private matter. I told her that it depends on the individual and that my speaking out probably helps some other person along the way.

There is so much ignorance and so many falsehoods out there that we all have an obligation to help those seeking an answer to their needs. One of my chums who is a physician (internist) responded to me when I was being hassled over a circumcision revision: "It is your body!" He really helped me immeasurably when some Urology Department Head tried to block me by saying I should see a Psychiatrist first. Another Urologist who had seen me on and off said: "Forget it, let's get it done, I don't answer to him." Later, the Department Head was removed although he holds another very prestigious position. It was, of course, politics; and the European-born Department Head had a different position based I believe solely in his own upbringing. At any rate, I won!

Please tell the seekers that it is their body and to go for it; the hurt is miniscule compared to the gain. Yes, it is a gain. I feel so strongly about physicians responding responsibly to those who seek circumcision and knowing what a runaround I got. There has to be a way for us as a group to head people in the right direction. Frankly, I believe it may be easier in UK than US but my experience is limited. I don't want guys to be examined and told to go away. I want them to be able to approach with certainty of what they want and not to be dissuaded.

Naturally Ugly?

[The following is an exchange of letters from Health & Efficiency submitted by Robert]

Smooth 'n' cut

With the photographs of the male nudists that you publish in H&E naturist could you include more of "us" – smooth and circumcised men? I am a proud smooth and circumcised naturist and as such would like to see more of us in photos in H&E. I find it rather sickening when male naturists shave their bodies but keep an elongated foreskin: a rather ugly affair, I'm afraid.

A. N.

[Editor's response: The photos we publish are representative of the many which we receive each month. We certainly have no policy against publishing pictures of any particular type – smooth or hirsute; circumcised or not; male or female – we welcome photos from all our readers!]

"Bizarre" attitude to uncut look

While entitled to his opinion, A.N.'s attitude to retained foreskins as "a rather ugly affair" is somewhat bizarre and bigoted. Religious, medical and aesthetic reasons exist for circumcision. As a doctor I would point out that all operations come with complications. What does A.N. expect uncircumcised males to do just to please him: go for an unnecessary and potentially risky operation?

If we took this to its extreme someone out there would argue that fat people should undergo liposuction, small-breasted women have implants, big-breasted women have breast reduction surgery, large labia be trimmed, penises enlarged and short people have their legs lengthened (yes, these procedures can all be done).

I thought naturism was partly about accepting people as they are. Has anyone told A.N. yet?

Dr W. J.

Nothing ugly about the human form

So A.N. finds the sight of a shaved pubis with elongated foreskin an "ugly affair". What a strange view, and one I do not hold. Does he feel equally that the sight of older naturists is ugly, or women who bear the scars of childbirth, or hirsute males? Surely the philosophy of naturism is acceptance of the human form regardless of individual choice or genetic inheritance.

While some very "conventionally" beautiful women and handsome men are pictured in H&E, I find it refreshing that H&E shows all sorts: fat and thin, hairy and smooth, old and young. In my view H&E represents genuine naturists who embrace the naturist philosophy and human spirit, and in no way should the magazine pander to balancing its pictorial content based on individual body choices.

My view is that the only ugly thing about a human is that carried in their soul and heart, and there is nothing ugly about the human form. A form incidentally, that we might not have control over.

Israelis Export Skills To Fight HIV

[By Andrew Jack in the Financial Times]

Israeli medical volunteers have begun exporting their expertise in adult male circumcision to sub-Saharan Africa, in a pioneering effort to help tackle spiralling HIV infections. A small group of doctors and public health specialists are at work in Swaziland conducting a pilot programme designed to reduce significantly the time it takes to perform safe and low-cost circumcisions in large numbers of local men. Their visit, at the invitation of a local charity, follows official recognition for the first time earlier this year by the World Health Organisation and other international agencies that male circumcision is a powerful technique to help reduce HIV transmission.

The Israeli specialists have developed expertise in rapidly conducting large numbers of adult male circumcisions for the first time since the late 1980s, when uncircumcised Jewish men began to emigrate in large numbers from the former Soviet block and Ethiopia and request the operation. "Until then, we had just a few cases each year for medical reasons. It had been very unusual to circumcise adults," said Dr Eitan Gross, medical director of Operation AB, created by volunteers from the Hadassah Medical Organisation and the Jerusalem Aids Project to lend their expertise to Africa.

Studies published in recent months in Kenya, Uganda and South Africa have all shown that male circumcision can reduce HIV transmission by about 60 per cent. Scientists believe the procedure hardens the skin, reducing abrasions and decreasing the number of cells beneath the foreskin that are particularly sensitive to infection.

Dr Inon Schenker, head of Operation AB, said that his team had already identified simple ways to halve the time for a circumcision to 25 minutes in Swaziland as it trained local doctors and nurses in its techniques. Derek von Wissell, head of Swaziland's National Emergency Response Council on HIV/AIDS, welcomed the project but cautioned that with only 85 government-employed and 80 private doctors in the entire country, he was concerned about distracting them from other essential medical duties. "Perhaps we can persuade retired US surgeons to come here, play golf, visit the Kruger national park and perform 100 circumcisions," he said. "The interest is there."

More generally, public health experts warn that circumcision is only a partial solution that should be accompanied by other practices to reduce transmission. In some cultures, it is unacceptable; it may create a false sense of immunity and can trigger complications if not conducted hygienically.

Small Mercies

I am an Englishman officially categorised as old by the World Health Organisation. When I was 13 days old my mother took me to the doctor for a routine post-natal check-up. He claimed that my foreskin and/or penis were not right, and an attendant nurse endorsed his opinion. So he circumcised me then and there. My mother told me that when he had finished he inserted 3 stitches around the wound to hold the skin in place.

I once had a girlfriend from the USA who told me that my circumcision was “a messy job”. Her statement was correct. As a result of the surgery my shaft skin is rotated anticlockwise around my shaft. It is positioned about 2 centimetres to the left of where it should be and is badly out of alignment with what remains of my frenulum, etc. My circumcision scar is thick, brown and ugly. There are nodules on it, and what look to be stitch flaps. There are also two stitch tunnels, a large one on the upper left hand side, and a smaller one on the lower left hand side, of my scar tissue. Periodically, these fill with puss that has to be squeezed out. My glans penis is almost the same colour and texture as my shaft skin. My whole cock looks battered, scarred, beat-up and ugly; it has lost a lot of skin, nerves and blood vessels, and I am convinced that, in ways that are many and various, my sexual pleasure has been sharply cut.

And yet, incredibly, I am actually grateful to my foreskin's nemesis, the doctor who cut me. He left, you see, a small patch of frenulum, together with a narrow cuff of skin around my scar. There is not much, but it is just enough for me to be able to pull my shaft skin over my corona while my cock is erect. Oh, wow! That is so nice! How much nicer must it be when you can pull your entire foreskin right up your stiff shaft, and tug it completely over your engorged, purple-coloured knob? Yet although I know that I have only a fraction of the pleasure that is the uncut man's birthright, the doctor who chopped me could have been meaner and more vindictive still, and I rejoice that he was not.

In contrast, I remember one of my schoolfellows. When we were about 12 or 13 he got an erection in the showers after a gymnastics lesson. To this day, I still remember it vividly. He had clearly been circumcised very tightly, and the skin on his erect shaft was pulled as tight as a drum skin, so tightly, indeed, that it gleamed and glistened. At the same time, his shaft could scarcely be contained within its denuded housing and was bent every which way, like a corkscrew. I was stunned. I stared, intently but not lewdly, at my colleague's mutilated member, and thanked a benevolent fortune that I had been spared the chopping that had been inflicted upon him. Even at the time, however, I did not fully realise the awful truth; but in retrospect I can see that his frenulum (the small, deliciously sensitive flap of stringy, twangy skin that harnesses the foreskin to the underside of the cockhead) had been more or less completely severed and excavated.

I am firmly opposed to circumcision. I support the anti-circumcision lobby, and I greatly admire the various pioneers who are campaigning on its behalf. I rejoice that circumcision, unlike in my day, is now comparatively rare in the UK, and that the generations of Englishmen that follow me, together with their wives, girlfriends and daughters, will have more pleasure in bed than I have managed to achieve. Oh, wow! Our present generation of young ladies in the UK, like well-fertilised roses, have been excellently tended and nourished. Many of them are fit, well-developed, and stunningly beautiful; I envy the young men with uncut foreskins and a full set of nerves, tissues and blood vessels up their stiffened cock shafts who are lucky enough to enjoy such fair and excellent ladies perfectly, and as nature intended. Would that many of my generation had been lucky enough to luxuriate in such pleasures.

And yet... Despite my best efforts at maintaining a civilised opinion on this barbarous practice, I find that, in my perverse, lewd, and filthy imaginings, the mutilation of circumcision sexually excites me. The information and the images of circumcision that I collect from the Internet and elsewhere actually turn me on. I write anecdotes, musings and stories about it, and these also excite me.

But I operate solely at the level of kinky fantasy. My advice to citizens of the USA is to remember the fox in Aesop's fable who lost his tail in a trap. He wanted all the other foxes to have their tails chopped off too so that his mutilation would appear normal. By the same token I ask you: is it right to have your sons cut just so that they will 'look like dad'?

A Medical Examination – And Its Consequences

The comments of J. T. about school medical examinations in issue 4/2007 brought back memories. I was at school in the Midlands in the 1940's and we were examined at school about three times. It was a full medical each time, done by a nurse.

I remember the first occasion to this day. I was 10 or 11 years at the time. The nurse told my mother who was with me that I should have my penis seen to. An appointment was made for the next week. I asked my mother what it was all about. She said: "You are going to be circumcised." She explained to me that a lot of boys were done. I was upset about all of this.

We went to the School Clinic on the appointed day. We were shown into a waiting room and a little later we were shown into the doctor. The nurse told mother to take my trousers and pants off, also my shoes. She took me to the doctor who sat at a table. I had to stand on a box in front of her. She was trying to pull my foreskin back. She said to mother that I did need circumcising as the nurse had stated at school. The doctor injected my penis about three times. I know I was crying. After a while, I couldn't feel my penis. Mother had asked for a dorsal slit circumcision. The doctor did as mother wanted. It was then wrapped up.

Later in life I had my foreskin removed but that's a different story.

What Women Prefer

It is logical to assume that if we randomly pull two women from a crowded street and interview them, one of them might say that she prefers a circumcised man while the other may claim that she wants it otherwise.

Going back on the age-old question, which do women prefer: circumcised or uncircumcised? I had an opportunity to meet Jane (not her real name), a communication student in a southern college. According to her, she prefers her partner to be uncut. "Although I do base my opinion of a man on his big head, not his little one, I have to say that uncircumcised is better because there is more variation. Playing with the skin is like an added benefit, it feels comfortable while he is thrusting also. From my experience, cut penises tends to rub too hard and too much. A little friction is good, but too much can be quite painful. Uncut guys give just the right amount of friction and I like the way the skin moves back and forth in my mouth."

Meanwhile, Alex, a customer service representative, prefers circumcised men mainly for hygienic reasons as well as sexual ones. "Based on my previous encounters, cleanliness is important because the penis tastes, smells, and looks more appealing. Plus, spur-of-the-moment sexual activity is more enjoyable with a man who is circumcised, because bathing efforts last for longer periods of time."

As far as statistics are concerned, however, a one-to-one profile will be meaningless. We need to go to a bigger perspective. The bottom line of course is the woman's personal preferences but considerations on health should not be ignored. On one point, we have pain and shock; and on the other hand, we have pleasure and cleanliness. Women's preferences in this subject have undoubtedly become more pertinent nowadays than let us say, two decades ago. During that long-ago era, about 90% of the male population in the Western world underwent circumcision but since then, a lot of lobbying has been done to stop this tradition. To date, only about 60% are circumcised for non-religious reasons.

So what are the reasons why women would prefer a circumcised man? If we based it on actual studies, one would be because it moves more smoothly during sex and as a result, both parties derive more enjoyment. Another is on the usage of condoms. Those who are uncircumcised would find it difficult keeping a condom on during actual sex. In one particular survey conducted by a team of experts, 57% of the respondents said that they preferred a circumcised penis because it looked more attractive. On the other hand, 33% preferred the other side. However, out of those unaccounted yet, 11 women said that their ideal male organ would be natural. Let us count out the anti-circumcision lobbyists and the remaining would be six respondents. Six whose 'ideal penis' is untouched, so as far as this study is concerned, the conviction that women in general are in favour of circumcision is highly exaggerated.

Still on this survey, with regard to oral sex, circumcision reigns supreme. About 80% of men who accepted oral sex were circumcised while the rest were not. Moreover, another study showed that circumcised men gave out more sexual contentment to the women. Among heterosexual men who engaged in sex at least once a month, it was concluded that 83% of those circumcised claimed that their partners achieved the orgasmic state while the remaining 17% claimed that their women did not. Of the uncircumcised, 53% claimed that their bed partners usually achieved climax and 47% revealed never or occasionally.

Before boring you to death with tons of figures, these significant comparative studies done over the years are still assumptions and nowhere near a conclusion. The general statement from women all over England, Singapore, North America, and other places is that the circumcised penis wins. Why did I say that we could safely assume but not definitely conclude? To carve it in stone would be too risky, indeed. There are other studies (done by equally intelligent and capable professionals) that concluded in favour of the uncircumcised. The outcome of these researches is that women are actually more at ease with what they are better acquainted with (and that is the natural). In one of these, what came out was a highly interesting piece of data that bulldozes the belief that circumcised men give "better sex" to women. This study said that 73% of the respondents said that "natural" men thrust more lightly and that their (the women's) clitoris was in fact better "caressed", obviously indicating that they enjoyed the sex more.

As far as the definitive answer is concerned, the jury is still out although all things considered, we can fearlessly say that circumcised still holds the edge.

A Very Short Foreskin

A father on the bulletin board fathermag.com reported that the mother of his baby son had had the doctor separate the baby's foreskin from the glans at birth and had been retracting it from the age of three months. Now, at the age of six, his foreskin just covered the ridge when soft and he appeared circumcised. The father asked whether this was normal for a six year old, or whether the foreskin had been retracted too early and whether there would be any future problems with masturbation.

Two authoritative responses were received on the practice of retraction:

Response 1:

There are many men in many parts of the world that have elected to wear their foreskins permanently retracted because it is cleaner, healthier and looks sexier. It is said that in some cultures this is a goal to be achieved by puberty and that it is a sign of adulthood.

Your son now has the benefit of the automatic exposure to air for the glans, which keeps it a lot cleaner and lets late drops of urine dry out. There are men that expend some minor efforts to 'train' the foreskin to stay back, by retracting it, sometimes even placing rubber bands, 'O' rings, etc to help train the skin to stay behind the glans. This often is a family practice. Someone estimated that about a century ago in the US, before the upswing in the number of circumcisions, as many as 25% of men did this.

I heartily endorse the idea. As I still have excellent sensitivity of the glans with it having been exposed from year 12 to 83, I definitely feel your son has a nice benefit in his short foreskin.

Response 2:

You can be reassured that your son's foreskin will almost certainly be sufficiently mobile for easy and comfortable masturbation and indeed, on that account, will also confer comfort during intercourse.

But the question that you are really asking is whether, by deliberately retracting his foreskin from a particularly early age, you have caused it to be shorter than it otherwise would be? Well, I suspect the answer is in fact: Yes. While body parts clearly grow according to genetic 'programming', skin generally grows to accommodate the tension to which it is subjected on a continuous basis. The skin over joints grows to allow movement in that joint whilst remaining snug. The foreskin grows to match growth of the penis which is subject to quite frequent erections particularly at night, and infants and children are no exception to this.

The 'trick' with the foreskin is, however, that it has a 'toggle' action with two options, to remain closed in front of the glans, or to retract and 'pop' back over it. There is therefore a possibility that if it gets retracted infrequently or not at all, it will respond to the erections by growing longer to accommodate them. On the other hand if it 'learns' or is 'taught' early on to retract very easily over an erection, then by doing so, it will not experience the tension to grow anywhere near as much in length.

This would be in line with the claims of certain fellows, that they deliberately chose in childhood or early puberty (and usually due to the perceived need to emulate circumcised peers who seemed, at that point, to be attractive to them, either emotionally or merely socially), to keep their foreskin retracted at all times, as a result of which, their foreskin does in fact continue to stay retracted with no deliberate manipulation and will not now remain covering the glans by itself even when flaccid. Indeed, in a small proportion of boys this may happen accidentally, causing them to appear 'naturally' circumcised.

Muslim Turkey Makes Circumcisions Free Of Charge

[by Darren Ennis, Star Publications (Malaysia)]

Turkey's Islamist-rooted government has made circumcision – a key ritual for young Muslim boys – available for free on social security. Circumcision is an important coming of age ritual for Muslim boys, usually celebrated with large parties. The move, announced in the official gazette, follows a tax cut for tourism after much lobbying from the industry, and another for food – measures seen by economists as electioneering. Previously only circumcisions required for medical reasons were covered by social security, a health ministry official said.

Cutting Comments: The Foreskin Debate

[An article by Simon Mills in The Sunday Times]

The actor Alan Cumming gets quite a reaction when he drops his trousers. Especially in America. Why? His penis is uncircumcised. He is genitally intact, a cavalier rather than a roundhead. His johnson wears an opera cape, as they say in US gay circles. This gives him something akin to freak status in the hygiene-obsessed States, where 70% of the mature male population have been circumcised.

Cumming, an endearingly puckish type, is really rather proud of his foreskin. "During interviews in America, I have made a point of talking about it," he says. "I think it's insane that an entire nation is ignorant about a part of their body they have lost. When I take my pants off in America, people gasp, which is kind of nice, until I realise that they're actually staring at my penis as if it's some kind of National Geographic photo come to life. Nobody has a foreskin there. They're, like, 'Wow! What do you do with that? How does it work?'"

Why is it that so many American men are circumcised? Well, it seems the Brits are responsible. Queen Victoria, who, along with much of the British aristocracy, believed that the English descended from one of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel, chose to have her sons circumcised. It became fashionable, and the procedure travelled to America. It was there that John Harvey Kellogg campaigned for circumcision as a cure for masturbation, which was, in his opinion, a cause of psychological problems. And ever since (in the 1950s, it is estimated, 90% of American boys were snipped), middle-class Americans have grown up believing that foreskins are filthy, wholly unnecessary fleshy adjuncts that harbour disease and make a sensitive teenage boy something of a fairground attraction in the communal shower environment.

That's why the uncut likes of Nick Nolte, Leonardo Di Caprio, Willem Dafoe, Emilio Estevez, Nicolas Cage and Keanu Reeves, all born during the barbaric period of the last millennium, are listed on pro-foreskin websites as if they were all some kind of heroic locker-room maverick. Blame Cumming and the unlikely figure of Ben Affleck, if you like, but the circumcision debate has suddenly caught the attention of a new breed of quietly militant pro-choicers and so-called 'intactivists' who are putting foreskins to the fore again and unleashing some appropriately cutting comments from the high-minded and famous.

Men with foreskins squirm and buttock-clench comedically when the subject is broached, while men who were cut as babies can't see what all the fuss is about. Foreskins are said to heighten sexual pleasure but harbour disease. Circumcised men are said to suffer from, wait for it, 'significant penile sensory deficit', although – get this – a Men's Health magazine survey in 2000 suggested that uncircumcised men lasted an average of four minutes longer during sex than their circumcised peers. Pressure groups such as Brothers United for Future Foreskins (Buff) and Uncircumcising Information and Resources Center (Uncirc), and even Jews Against Circumcision, fronted by Rabbi Moses Maimonides, do their best to break with tradition and prevent unnecessary cuts in the United States, while Cumming and the art critic Brian Sewell are both spokesmen for the British branch of the National Organization of Restoring Men (Norm, originally known as Recover a Penis, or Recap), founded in 1989 for men hoping to restore their foreskins. Foreskin restoration? It can be done. Sort of.

Medical techniques are not sufficiently advanced to give back the erogenous tissue and nerves amputated at circumcision, but careful stretching can create a more natural-looking penis, and softening the epithelium (or outer tissue) of the glans (or tip) can return the penis to a much higher level of sensitivity.

The pro-choicers feel that they are on a roll right now. Non-medical circumcision for children is now illegal in Sweden. The numbers of circumcision procedures in the UK are slowly declining and, after peaking in the 1930s, when 35% of British boys were snipped, fell to a mere 6.5% in the 1980s. Today, only 12,200 circumcisions are performed in the UK annually. Most of them go ahead without a hitch. A few end in tragedy. The inquest into the death of Amitai Moshe, who was just seven days old when he stopped breathing after being circumcised at a synagogue in north London last February – he died a week later from a heart attack – is to be held soon at Hornsey coroner's court. "No causal link has been established between the circumcision and the baby being taken ill. There is no indication that this was anything other than a tragic juxtaposition of two events," a spokesman for the synagogue said after the child's death. "The mohel [appointed circumciser] is a registered member of the Initiation Society, which has been licensing and training practitioners of the procedure for more than 200 years. It is a well-established and well-regulated practice.”

Anti-circumcision horror stories such as this have served only to rally the pro-choice, intactivist PR machine. As well as Affleck, who has made it known that he is against routine infant circumcision, celebrity supporters include Colin Farrell. Affleck, it should be noted, was apparently circumcised in adulthood, after suffering injury during the filming of a superhero movie; a doctor decided that removing his foreskin would be easier than repairing it. Which has to hurt.

But this isn't just about cautiously radical telegenic celebrities or grown men checking one another out at the urinals or intact males doing histrionic winces and leg-crosses at the thought of the dreaded bris. For parents, there's a basic guilt issue at play, too. In his eloquently incensed invective against religion, God Is Not Great, the firebrand polemicist Christopher Hitchens rails against parents who have their boys circumcised. “As to immoral practice,” he writes, “it is hard to imagine anything more grotesque than the mutilation of an infant's genitalia.” He argues that circumcision weakens the faculty of sexual excitement and diminishes its pleasure, pointing out the significance of the operation being performed on babies rather than those who have reached the age of reason. (One study found that 92% of male infants subject to circumcision were not given anaesthetic during the procedure.)

Unconcerned that militant Jewish factions rancorously dismiss the intactivist lobby as wholly antisemitic, Hitchens states that, as recently as 2005, a mohel in New York City quite legally performed a ritual known as metzitzah (taking a mouthful of wine and then sucking the blood from the circumcision wound) on newborn babies, giving genital herpes to several small boys and causing the death of at least two.

And what happens to all those lopped-off foreskins? Believe it or not, there is a handsome profit to be made from harvested bits of young penis. The Norm UK website features the following item: “Since the 1980s, private hospitals have been involved in the business of supplying discarded foreskins to private bio-research laboratories and pharmaceutical companies, who require human flesh as raw research material. Human foreskins are in great demand for commercial enterprises, and the marketing of purloined baby foreskins is a multimillion-dollar-a-year industry.” There is even an expensive face cream, SkinMedica, on the market, made from a formula grown from young foreskins. Yes. Really.

“There's a sinister side to all this,” Cumming says. “It's tradition, control and pleasure-removing masquerading as a hygiene thing. What it comes down to is mass genital mutilation. It's barbaric. I don't mean to offend anyone, but I've heard about men who can't orgasm for ages because they have no sensation. People in America are impeded, because they don't feel, you know?”

There have been a number of studies conducted to find out whether male circumcision reduces the risk of acquiring sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/Aids. While some of them show it may reduce the risk, they are not entirely conclusive, and using a condom still offers the best protection. For Cumming, it's more of an emotive issue. "As far as I am concerned, the default-setting arguments about hygiene just don't stand up," he says. "The sanitation issue, especially, always comes up when I am in America. But you know what? I am very clean. I shower frequently. I am very proud of my foreskin. I believe it's there for a purpose. And I just want people to stop and think for a second before they decide to get a big bit of their newborn son's cock cut off."

Circumcising An Adopted Son

for parents of adopted children]

Question: I know many would not agree. However, we have finally made a decision and decided to circumcise our two year old adopted son Andres after going back and forth for a year. We just got the date for the procedure and I am looking for some info for those whose sons had it done at a later age as opposed to newborn. What is the recovery like? It is scheduled for a Monday so obviously we would be keeping him home on Monday and Tuesday, but I'm not sure how many more days he would need to be out of day care. We will take as many days as he needs but I would like to give work an idea as well as be able to figure who will take what day so it doesn't fall on one of us completely. Obviously we will both be off and with him on the day of the procedure. The doctor has said that recovery will be minimal but I really want some real life experiences.

Dawn

Response 1: We circumcised Josh when he was just over a year. They put a bandage on his penis and said it would fall off within the next couple of days (and if it fell off sooner not to worry). Well, the bandage fell off at our next diaper change! We kept Josh home from day care for only 2 days (so about what you are thinking). He just needed bacitracin put on at every diaper change...it was pretty easy.

Response 2: Colby was circumcised at about a year because he was such a premie, it was not safe to do it at birth. The recovery was not bad – I think he fussed a little at diaper change time, etc. I was most worried about having to go under anaesthesia, but he actually did fine with it. Overall, not a big deal at all. I think after a day or two, they are totally back to normal!

Response 3: Both of my boys were completely normal the next day... I'd take the extra day off work just in case, but once the anaesthesia was out of their systems, you really couldn't tell there was ANYTHING wrong with them. I didn't even use the Tylenol with Codeine that the doctor gave us, or even regular Tylenol. The first day they came home and both slept A LOT. After that it was just putting the ointment on their sores at every diaper change for a couple days.

Editorial

This issue should have arrived in time for Christmas. Instead, it will be early 2008 when this reaches you – my apologies; but “Happy New Year” none-the-less. I will attempt to make up for lost time over the coming months.

The last issue of the year always brings with it the annual renewal notice. I hope that you have enjoyed the newsletter sufficiently in 2007 to make renewal a no-brainer. If so, get that cheque book out now!

This issue devotes a fair amount of space to the question of sensitivity. Does the removal of the foreskin inevitably condemn the owner to a second class sex life? This is the concern of many who were deprived of their prepuce at birth. It is also a fear of those now contemplating circumcision for themselves. Will they live to regret the decision? As ever, results of different studies point in opposite directions. But the weight of evidence indicates that circumcision does not impede the sexual experience – a fact affirmed by many members’ personal testimony both in this issue and in issues past.

A Sensitive Question

Men considering circumcision for themselves or their sons often have an underlying fear. Will the removal of the foreskin adversely affect the sensitivity of the penis? Will the quality of the sexual experience be diminished? The situation is not helped by anti-circumcision propaganda which talks of thousands of nerve endings being lost when the foreskin is excised. Immediately following this article, I print experiences about sensitivity from Acorn members and others. These are largely from men who have undergone elective adult circumcision and the evidence appears to be that in such cases the sexual experience is not diminished and is sometimes enhanced. But these may be special cases and the would-be circumcisee is perhaps looking for more scientifically based evidence. Research in this area has been undertaken, some of higher quality than the remainder, and it is the purpose of this article to look at this research.

Perhaps the most important study is the most recent, published in the British Journal of Urology International, January 2008. This study researched the effect of male circumcision on sexual satisfaction and function. The study was carried out in Uganda as part of the trials to determine the effect of circumcision on HIV transmission rates. As is well known, these trials showed conclusively that male circumcision lowered the risk to such an extent that the trials were stopped early so that all participants could be offered circumcision. This evidence forms the basis of the current drive in many African countries to introduce universal male circumcision as an AIDS preventative.

As part of the trials, the researchers investigated self-reported sexual satisfaction and function. In all, 4456 sexually experienced HIV-negative males aged 15-49 years were enrolled; 2210 were randomised to receive immediate circumcision (intervention arm) and 2246 to receive circumcision delayed for 24 months (control arm). Men were followed up at 6, 12 and 24 months, and information on sexual desire, satisfaction and erectile dysfunction was collected. These variables were compared between the study arms and over time within the study arms.

There were no differences between the study arms at enrolment. Problems with sexual satisfaction and function were reported by less than 2% of participants in both study arms at all time points. At 6 months, no difficulty with penetration was reported by 98.6% of circumcised men and 99.4% of controls, and no pain on intercourse was reported by 99.4% circumcised and 98.8% of uncircumcised men. There were no differences between the study arms in penetration or painful intercourse at later visits. Sexual satisfaction increased from 98.0% at enrolment to 99.9% at 2 years among the controls, but there was no trend in satisfaction among circumcised men (enrolment 98.5%, 2 years 98.4%). The conclusion of the study was that adult male circumcision does not adversely affect sexual satisfaction or sexual function in men.

This study is important for a number of reasons. First, the large scale – over 4,000 subjects, as opposed to the much smaller numbers for other studies. Second, the fact that it is randomised with proper controls. Third, the men undergoing circumcision have no problems with their foreskins, unlike other studies where the adult males involved have mainly undergone circumcision for medical reasons. Fourth, the study measured what is important to men – the ability to penetrate and the quality of the orgasm. The study showed that circumcision did not reduce sexual satisfaction, even after two years. An end to the myth that circumcision causes the glans to become tough and leathery and insensitive over time.

Other studies have approached the issue from a different perspective – the sensitivity of the penis to touch and stimulation. Of course, such an approach takes as axiomatic that the greater the sensitivity to touch the better. But many men find that the covered glans is over-sensitive. One of the perceived benefits of circumcision for many men is that the permanently exposed glans is less sensitive to immediate touch. They believe that there is no change in the underlying sensitivity, but that exposure ‘trains’ the glans to experience greater stimulation. Indeed, many circumcised men cite the constant low stimulation of their glans by contact with underwear etc as one of the pleasant by-products of losing the foreskin.

One study in New York tested the sensitivity of the small axon nerve fibres in the dorsal midline glans (the upper side of the glans) in 36 circumcised and 43 uncircumcised men. In uncircumcised males, the foreskin was retracted for testing. The researchers concluded: “We demonstrated that there are no significant differences in penile sensation between circumcised and uncircumcised men with respect to vibration, spatial perception, pressure, warm and cold thermal thresholds in both patients with and without erectile dysfunction.”

Another study in South Korea included 373 sexually active men aged 30-57 years of whom 255 were circumcised and 118 were not. Of the 255 circumcised men, 138 were sexually active before circumcision, and all were circumcised after the age of 20 years. Participants were asked to complete a questionnaire about the effects of circumcision on the quality of sex life, including masturbation. Analysis of the results showed that there were no significant differences in sexual drive, erection, ejaculation and ejaculatory latency time between circumcised and uncircumcised men. Masturbatory pleasure decreased after circumcision in 48% of the respondents, while 8% reported increased pleasure. Masturbatory difficulty increased after circumcision in 63% of the respondents but it was easier in 37%. About 6% answered that their sex lives improved, while 20% reported a worse sex life after circumcision. This study therefore appears to confirm the Ugandan study that the quality of intercourse is not affected by circumcision, but that there may be problems with masturbation. Of course, any man circumcised as an adult knows that he needs to adopt a new masturbatory technique to achieve satisfaction. Perhaps the South Koreans whose masturbatory experience had diminished had not experimented sufficiently with their modified penis.

Two other studies are relevant. Kimberley Payne of the Riverside Professional Centre in Ottawa, Canada, and her colleagues tested the sensitivity of 20 intact and 20 circumcised men’s penises as they watched erotic movie clips, by touching the penises with filaments that press down with predetermined amounts of pressure. They found no difference in penile sensation between circumcised and uncircumcised men. However, when Robert Van Howe of Michigan State University used a similar method to measure sensitivity at 19 points along the penises of 163 men, he found that the five most sensitive points were all in portions of the penis removed by circumcision, especially those in folds exposed as the penis becomes erect. However, this latter study was funded by the National Organization of Circumcision Information Resource Centres, which opposes circumcision, so there must be some doubts about its objectivity.

There have been other small studies where results have been ambivalent. But if one weighs them all in the scales, the conclusion must be that there is little evidence that circumcision, in the vast majority of men, has any deleterious effect on the sexual experience. This is important. Men considering circumcision for themselves can evaluate the risk and decide whether that is worthwhile. A father considering circumcision for his son is assessing the risk for another human being – a more onerous task since no father would wish to think that he had ruined his son's sex life. All the evidence appears to be that he can arrange that circumcision confident in the knowledge that the many benefits of infant circumcision will not be outweighed by a poor quality sex life in adulthood.

Some Observations On Sensitivity

After a lifetime of fantasising, I was circumcised six months ago and so have a fairly recent comparison of the before and after feelings. Before I was circ'd, I used to feel I was oversensitive and would 'cum' far too quickly both during partner sex and masturbation. I was therefore quite happy to reduce my sensitivity. I cannot really comment much on the sensitivity of my inner mucosa as when erect my foreskin rolled back easily enough but the frenulum kept it tightly bunched so it was never exposed as such during sex of any sort. I did however have a Prince Albert piercing for many years and deduced from that rubbing inside the skin, that there was sensitivity there, as masturbation over the ring was always pleasurable.

During the last few weeks before my circ, I increasingly kept my skin peeled back to try and acclimatise my glans to exposure. Initially this was very uncomfortable and I would become either highly aroused or sore. The soreness I discovered was due to the inner bunched up foreskin becoming red and inflamed rather than my glans which seemed to cope.

I was circumcised in February with a low and tight style, removing most of the inner mucosa. (The pictures show me after four months.) I am now six months from that time, fully healed and sexually active. My exposed glans is very sensitive but the overall sensitivity is reduced and sex and masturbation last longer. The feelings are however immensely pleasurable and the final build-up to orgasm very intense. I would say more pleasurable than before as each stage lasts longer and that final exquisite plateau just before orgasm lasts longer.

The head of my penis is very sensitive as expected and it is here that I get most of my stimulus. However the small amount of inner skin remaining and particularly the scar line is ultra sensitive. Initially I thought this was painfully sensitive but now that healing is complete it is a very pleasurable added sensation. My frenulum was never pleasurable before – it was just annoying and got in the way. Now that I am fully healed I have discovered that this area has become very pleurably sensitive. Other guys speak of a 'sweet spot' which develops with time after the frenulum is removed and I would agree that this seems to be happening.

On a general daily basis I am more aware of my penis and small movements can give a pleasurable tingle that did not happen with my foreskin. At weekends and on holiday, I like to wear loose shorts and trousers and no underwear, which gives a constant low key stimulus and keeps me semi-hard. Fun when I do not have more serious matters in mind but too much to cope with during the working day!

I am not aware what long-term changes there will be to my penis and particularly the glans now it is exposed. At the moment there is that wonderful duality between it being exposed but generally insensitive to the alternative state when it becomes aroused and very sensitive. It is amazing that the one organ can behave in two such different ways.

Long live circumcision!

I would like to put my words in about the sensitivity issue as a man who was circumcised at age 30 to remove a redundant (too much) foreskin that wouldn't retract anytime during coitus and left me with no feeling on a covered glans. Post-circumcision, I have a great deal more sensitivity in my circumcised penis. Yes, more sensitivity. The carrying-case foreskin was preventing so much for me. We almost always remove our 'instruments' from the carrying case, don't we. Also, think about it, so many men find the use of a condom quite all right in their sexual expressions. Haven't heard many guys complain about this covering in their efforts to prevent pregnancy or disease. Now, it is elected covering, isn't it and it does not let the glans be uncovered unless there is some disaster. In conclusion, this sensitivity issue is fairly new and is the drum beat of the anti-circumcision lobby in almost everything they write.

Californian

I had a very nice patient visit me today for a circumcision with an interesting agenda. He is an early 30s married father and told me that he was getting the circumcision for the purpose of improving the sexual experience for both himself and his wife. He said that with the intact foreskin he was not getting enough friction during intercourse. His wife had also found that she did not get enough stimulation from the foreskin-covered glans. He had discovered the technique of holding the foreskin back during intercourse which he found to improve the satisfaction for both of them. The man was seeking circumcision to prevent him having to manually hold the foreskin back. So, this couple had already tested out the circumcised status before having the procedure.

I thought this was very interesting as the anti-circumcision lobby would have you believe there is less sexual satisfaction for the circumcised man due to reduced sensation. Maybe this is an atypical assessment of the sexual results of circumcision, but I doubt it.

David Cornell, M.D.

I had a circumcision to remedy my phimosis at the end of April this year. There were a number of post-op complications and so my healing has been quite slow, but earlier this month I began having sex again with my girlfriend. Previously my foreskin had barely retracted during sex (and the only time it retracted fully led to paraphimosis and a trip to the hospital!) so sex now feels like a completely new sensation and is incomparably better than pre-circumcision.

However, this greatly heightened sensitivity means I reach the point of climax far, far quicker than I did previously. At first I attributed it to the long lay off from sex, but now that has been worked out of my system I still find myself reaching orgasm very quickly. I was wondering if anyone else has experienced similar issues and if so how you dealt with them? Am I correct in assuming that over time I will become more used to the sensitivity and thus be able to control my orgasms better?

From Circlist

Under normal circumstances (i.e. non-sexual) I have an awareness of my penis in my pants, gently rubbing against the fabric. When nude (again non-sexual) I also have a constant awareness of my cock and contact with its surroundings (wind, sun, seawater, whatever). So the nerve endings, especially around the scar line and the ex-frenulum 'sweet-spot', are clearly still sensitive. The glans itself, despite the anti-circers assertion that it is not sensitive, is very sensitive and, as above (i.e. non-sexual situations) is constantly impacting my consciousness. Now everything magnifies 100 times (at least!) in a sexual situation, and the scar line, the sweet-spot and the glans become exquisitely responsive and sensitive.

Chris Z. – Circlist

If you have ever broken a limb, and had it in plaster for the ritual 6 weeks while it heals up again, you might have noticed that when the plaster comes off, the skin that was covered for those 6 weeks is much more sensitive to touch because it has been covered for that time. Surely the same is happening with the glans and inner foreskin. General touch sensations are much more readily received by the nerve sensors or the brain because they are not usual/the norm. It seems to me that the nerve endings that give rise to sexual pleasure are much deeper in the structures of the penis, and are therefore completely unaffected by the presence or absence of a foreskin. The enhanced pleasure for the male after circumcision seems to be due to the stretching of the skin in a way that is never possible with the large amount of foreskin always riding up and down the shaft.

Circumcision Techniques 5

The Dorsal Slit

It is questionable whether the dorsal slit is a circumcision technique per se, since it leaves the foreskin largely intact. Rather, it is a technique which is used as a substitute for circumcision.

The dorsal slit is performed by making an incision in the midline of the foreskin as it covers the upper side of the glans. The incision is made from the tip of the foreskin. The length of the cut can be anything from just a few millimetres at one extreme to extending as far as the corona of the glans at the other. Usually no actual tissue is removed during the operation although occasionally a v-shaped section of foreskin is removed so that there is some space between the two halves of the divided foreskin.

The dorsal slit procedure is very simple and is minimally invasive. The foreskin is pulled down and held under a slight tension. The dorsal foreskin, at the 12 o'clock position, is then double clamped. Incision of the crushed tissue is then made. The edges of the inner and outer foreskin on each side of the incision are approximated and secured with the use of absorbable sutures.

Where the length of the incision is small, the penis retains the look of a naturally intact penis with a wide loose foreskin. Where the cut is longer, the effect is to leave the foreskin hanging over the glans rather like a pair of curtains. When the penis is erect, the foreskin naturally falls away from the glans and gathers underneath, giving the appearance of a turkey neck (see picture overleaf). The glans is thus fully exposed.

The advantages of a small dorsal slit are that it eliminates the possibility of phimosis, whilst retaining the foreskin. It is difficult to argue the same advantages for the longer slit. Whilst the foreskin is retained, it does not cover the glans in the same way as a normal foreskin and does not therefore help retain moistness and suppleness. It is of little use in masturbation. It also results in an unsightly tag of skin hanging under the back of the glans that can get in the way of sex.

The dorsal slit may be seen as a half way house between leaving the penis intact and a full circumcision. In fact, it probably achieves the worst of both worlds – it loses most of the potential advantages of a foreskin whilst not achieving the benefits of a full circumcision. It would appear better either for the patient to be left intact or for the foreskin to be fully excised.

A Snip In Time Can Save Lives

[In issue 5-2007, we reprinted an article from the Sunday Times: Cutting Comments: The Foreskin Debate. Below are some letters and web comments received by the paper following the article.]

Bravo for updating us on the ongoing war between roundheads and cavaliers over circumcision. The roundheads are clearly in retreat in the UK and Scandinavia but just about holding their own in America.

Despite being a cavalier I would have to say that the article betrayed a little of an unbalanced zealot's point of view rather than a true yin-yang summary of the issues involved. Clearly the death after a circumcision in a north London synagogue reminds us of the rare dangers (the first I have heard of in 20 years) we are exposed to by surgical procedure.

By contrast the article was very dismissive ("may reduce") of the three recent "gold standard" randomised trials in Africa involving 11,054 men showing, on average, a 50% reduction of HIV infection after a follow-up of two years in the men who were circumcised after puberty. These figures do not make me a rampant circumcision proselytiser but rather provide the impetus for the far more serious debate which the article does not address.

Circumcision earned its reputation as a cost-effective public health procedure for desert societies in ancient Egypt and was adopted after the time of Sodom and Gomorrah by Abraham. Today the virtual absence of deaths from penile and cervix cancer, as well as lessened AIDS and prostate cancer deaths in these societies, vouches for the lasting benefit that has been acquired from this procedure for peoples with limited access to water although – as data from Denmark and Brazil show – the provision of running water, and of lavatories, is equally effective.

The urgent question today in Africa is whether more circumcision is needed, or will the same investment spent providing improved access to running water and education at puberty about foreskin hygiene provide a greater all-round health gain? The fact that even today more than 75% of men dying from penile cancer in this country are unaware of the importance of foreskin retraction and hygiene suggests there could be benefit to us as well from such a campaign.

Professor Tim Oliver, Trustee, Orchid Cancer Appeal, London EC1

Having been circumcised when I was 40, at the suggestion of my (then new) wife and for no medical reason, I can say unequivocally that being circumcised has been a wholly positive experience. I was always uncomfortable having a foreskin and its radical removal has meant improved hygiene, comfort, appearance, self-esteem and overwhelmingly improved sexual sensation during intercourse for both myself and my wife. An additional benefit is that my wife much prefers to have a circumcised husband and it would appear that her view is the norm among women of her generation (she is 57) who have experienced both roundheads and cavaliers in bed. There has been no downside and I cannot understand why some men who were circumcised as babies and thus have no basis for comparison, can possibly think that they have been deprived of anything by losing their foreskin. This simple and highly beneficial procedure should be reintroduced as a routine measure in the UK in the way that it is in the USA.

I really wish that I had been circumcised myself as an infant, but apparently, when my mother tried to have this done, the NHS refused on the grounds that it was 'unnecessary' and thus I had to endure a foreskin throughout my childhood and youth.

Richard Sturdy, Ripon, North Yorks

I think the only people qualified to comment on the difference between being uncircumcised and circumcised are those who like myself were circumcised (at my own request) as an adult and have experienced 'both sides of the coin' so to speak. I always hated being uncircumcised and was very envious of my friends whose parents had taken the sensible choice of having them done shortly after birth. The operation was completely painless and since then every aspect of my life has been better; sex, cleanliness, appearance etc and I would say "go for it". It is surprising in this day and age that there are men who cannot and do not retract their foreskin to clean their penis. More on penile hygiene should be taught both by parents and in schools.

Neville Sumpter, London

Born in NW London in 1953 I was one of the first generation of baby boys born after the introduction of the then new NHS and as such I was denied circumcision even though that was my parents wish, according to my mother when the subject came up for discussion many years later. Now living in Sydney Australia I was finally circumcised as an adult for purely cosmetic/sexual reasons and have to say I have never looked back and my only regret is that it wasn't done years ago; circumcised sex is so much better.

Skinning Back

In A Very Short Foreskin (issue 5/2007), a father is worried that early retraction has disadvantaged his son by leaving him with a short foreskin. He should stop beating himself up – he has done the kid a favour.

There is too much political correctness these days about the foreskin. First we are told that adhesions take four or five years to separate and the boy's foreskin should not be touched during that time. Then we are told that it could take until puberty for the adhesions to clear so not to worry until then. Now we are told that a foreskin which never retracts is no problem!

I prefer the old-fashioned stance of encouraging mothers to gently push back their baby's foreskin at each bath time. Then if by four or five months the foreskin would not skin back completely, the doctor or nurse intervened. It is a less than five minute job to clear adhesions. A probe is inserted between the foreskin and the glans and is swept round in increasing circles until all adhesions have been broken down and the foreskin can be pushed back clear of the glans. Petroleum jelly is then smeared on any raw spots to prevent re-adhesion during healing. After three or four days, the raw spots have healed and the baby has a foreskin that can be skinned back naturally.

Mothers can then be encouraged to push the foreskin back behind the glans at each diaper change. If this is done, by the time the boy is out of diapers, the foreskin will have been trained to stay back naturally. The foreskin will then fail to develop to its full potential, and the boy will be left with a short foreskin and a nicely exposed glans.

My own opinion is that the covered glans is too sensitive and benefits from exposure. My own glans used to be almost untouchable and a friend suggested that I should skin back when I was at university. It was hard work at first, but once the glans was used to being uncovered, I soon found the benefits. A few years later, I had a nice tight circumcision so that exposure is now permanent. Of course, that would be the ideal solution for every male baby, but until that happy day arrives, skinning back is the next best thing.

Reporter Gets Circumcised To Fight AIDS

[an article by Joseph J. Schatz, Zambia Associated Press]

Asouthern African radio correspondent has been receiving a flood of text messages and cell phone calls – some from offended listeners and readers. All because Kennedy Gondwe chose to get circumcised to protect himself from AIDS, and took the British Broadcasting Corporation's radio and Web audience through the procedure with him.

Frank talk about AIDS and prevention methods is still rare in Gondwe's Zambia, where HIV prevalence is 16 percent. That's what made the 27-year-old Gondwe's public testimony on the eve of World AIDS Day even more striking. A prominent Zambian journalist, Mildred Mpundu, died in November after going public with her HIV-positive status earlier this year and urging her fellow journalists to get tested. Gondwe, who says he undergoes an AIDS test several times a year, said that he finds it “sad” that more people don’t talk about circumcision as a prevention method. “We as journalists also have a role to play in the fight against the disease,” he said.

Gondwe, on the radio piece and in an online diary, recounts his 22nd November procedure. Listeners can hear him gasp as a doctor injects him with a local anesthetic, but he assures them the procedure is otherwise painless. He was up, walking to his car and driving himself home soon afterwards.

Dr. Jan van den Ende, a microbiologist at Toga Laboratory, which provides AIDS testing and counseling in neighboring South Africa, the country hardest hit by AIDS, described circumcision as a relatively simple and painless procedure, something Gondwe’s story demonstrated. While one admiring Web reader from Zambia told Gondwe he would soon follow his example, the reporter said others told him they were offended. Gondwe’s Tumbuka people of Zambia’s Northern Province do not embrace circumcision, he said.

David Alnwick, a senior AIDS adviser to UNICEF based in Nairobi, said UNICEF supports educating people that “circumcised men are relatively well protected against HIV”. But he said there was a danger of creating demand that the world’s poorest continent is not now prepared to meet. Alnwick said Zambia has a long waiting list of men who want to be circumcised and only a few centres are providing the service. But he says he expects governments to come aboard across the continent and international donors to provide funding.

A Precautionary Measure

My two sons, Theo aged four and Luk aged six months, were both circumcised when about five or six weeks old. Although we are not Jewish, our doctor is, and he was willing to carry out the procedure privately. I had it done to save them the problems I had as a teenager.

When I was fifteen, I noticed blood in my urine. The doctor diagnosed a urinary infection which was soon cleared by antibiotics. But he also found that I was suffering from phimosis and he referred me to the local hospital. A few weeks later I was circumcised. At that age, I found the whole process excruciatingly embarrassing, and I vowed then that if I ever had sons, they would be circumcised as babies as a precautionary measure.

I have always enjoyed being circumcised – my sex life has always been great and my wife likes the stripped, ready for action look of the circumcised cock. So having our sons snipped was no contest. The ops went very smoothly – just a little whimper from each as the local was given. Healing took only a few days and then they were back to normal. Since then, it has been a source of satisfaction to see their little uncovered glans, knowing they won't have the same problems as me.

Of course, the fact that they have been circumcised has not gone unnoticed among friends. Their status is there for anyone to see at nappy change or splashing about at bath time. I never know what women discuss when they are amongst themselves – far more than men, I suspect. Anyway, I know that, through the example of our two boys, there are now several other babies in the village whose foreskins have made a one way trip to the doctor. But then, infant circumcision is such a non-event that I do not know why more parents don't have their babies trimmed.

Like Father, Like Son?

[A shortened version of an article by Neal Pollack,
The Guardian, 3rd February 2007]

[Neal Pollack is Jewish but his wife isn't. She refused to circumcise their newborn son, but then his mum issued an ultimatum ... and the battle of Elijah's foreskin had begun.]

A couple of weeks before my son, Elijah, was born, I was doing something very important on my computer when my wife, Regina, entered my office. "Do you have any feelings about circumcision?" she said.

"Nope."

"I was doing some research. The American Academy of Pediatrics doesn't recommend it any more. It used to be medically recommended, but now they're neutral."

"Hmm. I would say that I'm neutral, too," I said.

"They don't use anaesthetic, Neal. They cut off nerve endings and it decreases sexual sensitivity. It's barbaric. I can't do it to him. I just can't."

"You must leave me to think on this question for a while," I said.

Regina helpfully directed me to a parenting website. Circumcision, the website shrieked, was "part of the same movement that pathologised birth and actively discouraged breastfeeding". The foreskin is a natural part of the human anatomy, and there's no reason it should be removed. And then the kicker: "The birth of a son in the United States is fraught with anxiety and confusion. Most parents are pressured to hand their baby sons over to a stranger, who, behind closed doors, straps babies down and cuts their foreskins off ..." That was enough. The article was shrill beyond measure. Still, I thought, maybe circumcision is wrong.

For the first time in two decades, I'd been forced to stare my Judaism right between the ringlets. On the one hand, I thought, Jewish men get circumcised. I've been circumcised my whole life, and my dick works fine. Hell, I thought, it works better than fine. On the other hand, what if circumcision really did decrease sexual sensitivity? Was that something I wanted to deny my son? Wouldn't his life be painful enough? My son wasn't even born yet, and I was already thinking about the quality of his future orgasms.

This was a very hard decision, so I did what any good Jewish boy would do in such a situation: I called my mother. "Regina and I were thinking about not circumcising Elijah ..." It's hard to describe exactly what my mother's voice did at that moment, but convulsed is probably the closest word I can find.

"No, oh, no, no, no, Neal. Don't say that to me." My mother began to weep openly on the phone. "Oh my God, Neal! I can't believe you're doing this to me! You have to circumcise! You have to!"

"My wife ..."

"Your wife is immaterial here. You can't betray 6,000 years of Jewish tradition."

Suddenly, my generation's sin of intermarriage lay fully on my back. The fate of the entire diaspora rested on my decision. An innocent medical inquiry had turned into Sophie's Choice.

When I hung up the phone, I went into the bedroom, where Regina had propped up her feet. "Well?" she said.

"My mother says we'd betray 6,000 years of Jewish tradition."

"Oh, does she, now? We'll just see about that! I will not circumcise my son! I will not put him through that pain! I can't bear it!"

Now, just as my mother had five minutes earlier, my wife began to weep. "You can't make me do it, Neal! You can't! Promise me!"

"I need some time to think."

At that moment, I wanted to buy a plane ticket to Uruguay and never come back. But there I was instead in Austin, Texas, and my rational brain had ceased functioning.

A week went by. My brain was a fetid goulash of guilt and resentment. It's not as if my parents are super-Jews themselves. They go to synagogue, but only occasionally. I had a bar mitzvah because that's what Jews did, not because of some familial covenant with God, or so I thought.

My father called. I was in no mood to hear from him. "We're very upset," he said. "Your mother hasn't slept. We've decided that if you don't have him circumcised, he won't be our grandson."

"Are you out of your mind?"

"We demand it."

"You're in no position to demand anything." I hung up.

Meanwhile, Regina was already a week overdue. She and I lay in bed and talked. This was our first major decision for our child, and my own mother and father were trying to completely take it out of our hands, based on arguments we found superstitious and naive. But I also had a larger family to consider, aunts and uncles and cousins and sisters, and, beyond that, a generation of nieces and nephews and second cousins to come, not to mention "6,000 years of Jewish history". If we decided not to circumcise, it might very well rip open a wound in my family life that would take decades to heal.

"We have to," I said.

"I know we do," said Regina, and she began to cry.

That evening, I called home. "We've decided to circumcise," I said.

"Good," my father said. "That will connect him to my father. And my grandfather before that. And down through the generations." He was sincere, and I almost found myself touched.

Eight days after Elijah was born, we went to the urologist's office to discuss the circumcision. This is how it works, he said. He would put Elijah on a board and strap down his hands and feet. Then he'd slide a metal ring over the top of the penis, which would cut off the circulation to the foreskin and gradually kill the nerve endings. Over the next week, the foreskin would gradually turn black, and then it would rot off, and then Elijah would be permanently connected to his ancestors.

When Regina had called about the procedure, they'd said the doctor used topical anaesthetic. When we were in the doctor's office, we asked him. "Of course we don't use topical anaesthetic," he said. "Everyone knows that stuff doesn't work." We wouldn't put our son through pain without anaesthetic! But by then, it was too late. The doctor took our baby from us and told us to wait in the hall. A few minutes after the procedure, he said, he'd let Regina in to breastfeed. I went into the waiting room, sat with a six-month-old issue of Sports Illustrated, and tried to remember a time when I wasn't an adult.

Regina and Elijah came out. He was screaming. She was bawling.

"Babe ..."

"Let's just go!"

And so I drove us home, which was strange enough considering that Regina usually does all the driving, but even stranger because my newborn son was in the back seat howling because someone had just lopped off the tip of his penis, and my wife was holding him, weeping as though her soul was being ripped from her body, and my heart and throat and face felt clogged with sorrow and grief and mucus and shame, and I could barely see the road through a film of tears.

An hour later, my parents called to see how Elijah was doing. "How's Elijah?" my mother asked.

“He’s asleep. He cried a lot.”

“He’ll be fine,” she said. “It didn’t hurt at all.”

Speaking Of Uncut Men

[by Simon Sheppard, Gay.com/PlanetOut.com Network]

Foreskins. Some penises have ‘em. Some don’t. And given the remarkable range of specialized tastes when it comes to sex, it should be no surprise that an inch or so of flesh should excite so much passion.

“The more foreskin, the better,” says one man who’s no slouch in that department himself. “I love the kind with the wrinkled tip, the ones that don’t fully retract even when a guy’s fully hard.” And why’s that? “I don’t know. Why does somebody find anything attractive? Once, when I was heading to Amsterdam, I made a date with a guy purely on the basis of some pictures of his equipment I’d seen online. He just had the greatest foreskin, really long. OK, maybe I’m obsessive. But it sure was fun to play with.”

Americans in particular have an unusual relationship with foreskins. For decades, routine circumcision was the rule throughout much of American society. Uncut guys were viewed as, oh, exotic. Or at least European. Or working class. Or Southern. Or even ‘natural’. Now that increasing numbers of guys in the United States are uncut, the “He’s got a foreskin, so he must be British” stereotype no longer holds sway. About all a foreskin indicates nowadays, at least about a younger guy, is that he’s unlikely to be Jewish or Muslim. Still, to some guys, foreskin is just the tiniest bit unusual, something extra to admire and mess around with. And then there’s the tender, moist skin exposed by erection, the ridge of flesh part way down many a hard shaft.

Of course, like any sexual fetish, not everyone shares a taste for prepuce. One fellow who’s uncut himself prefers dicks that have been snipped. “They just seem a lot prettier to me,” says he. “I think long foreskins are just ugly, and I’m glad mine isn’t much.”

Young Man With A Big Drawback

[From a doctor’s advice published in the Jamaica Gleaner]

Q: I am a 22-year-old female, from the western side of the island. I have been dating this young man, who is 21 years of age, for approximately two weeks. We have yet to have full sex, but we kiss and fondle each other. Last night, I saw his organ for the first time – and everything went badly wrong. You see, doc, when his penis came out of his pants I detected an awful scent that made me lose interest immediately. The aroma got even worse when the foreskin rolled back. So I stopped kissing him, and told him that we were ‘too hot’ and that I was not ready to have sex with him.

My question to you, doctor, is what could have caused this dreadful odour? As it happens, I know that he had just had a bath. How could his problem be treated? And how do I tell him about the smell without hurting his feelings? He is really kind-hearted to me, and would do anything I ask. He is very romantic and extremely gentle. I am very much interested in being with him, but I can't continue without solving this difficulty. I need a response from you before I make the next move.

A: Well, it sounds like this is a real nice young man – apart from his big drawback. I am not sure if you have had any previous experience of men – and in particular I do not know if this was the first male organ you have ever seen or fondled. It is important for you to realise that even in the cleanest of guys, there is a slight aroma which comes from the penis. This scent comes from certain glands which are located just below the head of the organ, in the area which is usually covered by the foreskin. Some biologists claim that these glands produce pheromones – which are special 'sex smells' that are intended to attract the female. It is notable that most women do not find the slight fragrance unattractive; indeed, some are turned on by it.

But in this case, it does not sound as if there was any question of a 'slight aroma'. What you describe was clearly an overwhelming stink! This drives me to the conclusion that your young man has not been washing under his foreskin – which is what all uncircumcised males should do every day. If a guy doesn't do that, he gets a big build-up of some rather unpleasant white stuff called 'smegma.' This material is cheesy in appearance and feel, and it has germs in it. After a few days, it starts to smell – quite unpleasantly. I think that this is what has happened here. The young man may have had a bath, but it sounds as though he has neglected to wash his organ.

Incidentally, another important aspect of smegma is that if it is not washed away regularly, the man will have an increased risk of penile cancer in later life. So all in all, I feel that your best move now would be to tell your boyfriend that you have heard from an authoritative source that for hygiene reasons, every guy should thoroughly wash under his foreskin each day. Make clear that you expect this of him – and that you will not take 'No' for an answer.

Bishops Forcibly Circumcised

The anti-Greek pogroms in Turkey in September 1955 included the participation of Islamic extremists and secular ultranationalists who were supported by the Turkish government of Premier Adnan Menderes. This was a blatant example of Turkish state sponsorship of terrorism. On a terrible September night, mobs of extremists unhindered by authority proceeded to attack Greek property and to assault the members of the Greek minority who were living in the former Capital of Byzantium. Orthodox Churches were profaned and religious Icons, Bibles, and Crucifixes were burned while chalices used for holy communion were used by thugs for urinating. Greek Orthodox Bishops were forcibly circumcised on the street.

Usually, an Aussie accent is a reliable indicator of the guy's status – almost certainly cut. But not for much longer. State by State, the public hospitals in Australia are closing their doors to any non-medical circumcision (see report page 12). Bizarrely, this Australian shut down coincides with the UN drive to promote mass male circumcision in Africa.

It is all reminiscent of the situation in the UK 60 years ago when, for reasons of economy, routine infant circumcision was discontinued. The doctors in Australia describe non-medical circumcision as 'cosmetic'. 'Prophylactic' is the more accurate descriptor – intervention now to prevent problems later. Many Australian men will suffer in the future as a result of today's decisions.

Of course, the doctors argue, the operation will still be available privately. But expense will immediately exclude a proportion of families; and, if UK experience is any guide, parents will soon be actively discouraged from seeking the operation, and be made to feel almost like child abusers. Fortunately, there are some robust defenders of circumcision in Australia, so perhaps common sense may yet prevail.

A Matter of Technique

When the advantages of being intact are discussed, ease of masturbation is not necessarily high on the list. Yet the foreskin is the perfect masturbatory aid. Each foreskin is custom designed to fit the individual glans (although the design process sometimes goes astray). It takes little practice to learn how to draw the foreskin backwards and forwards, rubbing together the sensitive inner foreskin and the highly sensitive glans. The pre-cum fluid oozing from the Cowper's gland just inside the urethra is naturally spread by the back and forth action of the foreskin so that the glans and inner foreskin become fully lubricated. Then it is just a matter of adjusting the rate of movement so that sensation is prolonged until orgasm and ejaculation are desired, when the pressure and rate can be accelerated to bring about the desired end. How lucky, we might think, is the intact guy over his cut counterpart.

Indeed, in Victorian times, when masturbation came to be seen as intrinsically sinful and the cause of illnesses (such as mental and physical debility, heart disease, atrophy of the testes, dimness of vision, epilepsy, and insanity), excision of the prepuce was the first line of defence against the evil practice.

Circumcision was to be as complete as possible:

"The glans gets tanned and loses most of its sensitivity through an early circumcision – and especially if the greatest possible amount of skin is removed – and great care should be taken to excise the delicate inner mucous membrane as totally as possible – thus we can get rid of the most sensitive and exquisite nerve endings. This reduces the penis' erotic sensitivity and arousal the most, and the removal of the freely moving skin deprives the boy of the ability to masturbate. It is also advisable to cut through the frenum, as this reduces the sensations of lust even further."

However, as the vast majority of cut men will testify, circumcision is no bar to masturbation. It merely needs a different technique. But just how does the cut guy jerk off? Of course, the looser the cut, the more the guy can simulate the foreskin action by drawing the loose skin up over the glans. But, for the purposes of this article, let's consider the guy with the most radical cut – drum tight even when flaccid and frenulum completely eliminated.

Boys who are circumcised as babies have always had a foreskinless penis. When they find their cock and begin to explore, as young boys do at a very early age, they quickly learn the features of their (cut) penis which give them pleasant sensations and the ways in which they can increase and maximise their pleasure. For the guy cut post-puberty or in adulthood, he essentially has a new piece of equipment which he must get to know and learn how to operate. The immediate post circumcision period is an excellent time for this. Masturbation is forbidden for a short period and intercourse for a somewhat longer time. But this doesn't stop him getting acquainted with his new model, and gentle exploration is the first step towards a satisfactory masturbatory life post-circumcision.

The newly circumcised guy will have his glans permanently exposed for the first time. He will already be aware of how sensitive the glans is just by contact with dressings and underclothes. Touching and very light stroking will demonstrate just how much sensitivity there is in the glans. He needs to get to know each part of the acorn. As he moves gently from the tip of the glans down towards the ridge at the base of the head, he will find that the sensitivity increases and that stroking the sulcus, the groove between the head and the shaft, can be particularly rewarding. He can then move to the underside of the glans. He will soon find that the frenulum was not the source of stimulation as he perhaps thought before the op. The V-shaped groove where the frenulum once was is now exquisitely sensitive with an exposed sweet spot which many newly cut men rave about.

Then there is the inner foreskin. Those with a high cut will have been left with a good proportion of their inner mucosa. But even the lowest cut will have left a remnant of inner foreskin. Putting tension on the foreskin by pulling the shaft skin down towards the base of the penis can give a wonderful sensation. So, in the early stages (and as a variant later), newly circumcised boys can just use a very light touch and slide their fingers gently across the surface of their penis, stroking the head, the sulcus and the V-shaped groove, and tightening the skin of the shaft. For many guys, this is sufficient in itself to bring about a climax.

Once healing is complete, more robust techniques can be employed. Fisting is a popular option. In this the guy essentially uses his fist in the way that he previously used his foreskin. He holds the erect penis within a single fist and then moves the fist up and down so that the glans is being stimulated by the back and forth movement of the palm and fingers. The movement is the same as intercourse with the guy in passive mode whilst his partner thrusts the vagina or butt hole so that the penis goes deeply in and almost out again.

Another method is to use the palm of the hand to encase the glans whilst the fingers and thumb extend down the shaft to stimulate the inner foreskin and the sulcus. Pushing the fingers down the shaft then has the dual effect of putting tension on the mucosa and applying pressure to the glans by bringing the palm into contact with it. The fingers can move up and down the shaft alternatively increasing and decreasing tension. As an alternative to this method, the fingers can still be used to stimulate the shaft and inner mucosa, but the thumb rather than the palm is used to apply extra pressure to the glans.

However, the truth is that there are many different possible holds and each man will devise his own technique. And any method can be varied by using the left instead of right hand, or vice versa. But quite often, having found something which works, a guy will stick to that one technique for most of the time.

Then, of course, there is the question of lubrication (lube). For one reason or another – too much friction or too little skin – many guys prefer to use lube when they masturbate. Even some uncircumcised guys prefer the sensation of a lubricated hand sliding across their knob, particularly those whose foreskin is short and pulls back off the knob with an erection. Some guys always use lube, some never, and for some it is a matter of choice on the night (or whenever!) So lube is not a requirement for circumcised guys to masturbate satisfactorily – it is an optional variation.

And which lube to use? Saliva is the most easily available, but soon dries out. Baby oil is wonderfully slippery, but for this reason tends to be soaked up by bedclothes etc – OK if you do your own laundry! Hand cream is a little more controllable whilst Vaseline is probably a little too thick to be the first choice of many. And however good it may feel at the time in the shower, soap or shampoo is not a good idea – the irritation afterwards may just not be worth it!

Probably best are the water based lubricants such as KY, Wet and ID Glide; or the silicone-based lubes which include Eros Glide and Liquid Silk. These are designed for the purpose and have the added advantage that, if masturbation is taking place as a precursor to safe sex with a partner, such lubes are not damaging to the condom.

So, once the lube is chosen, how is it used? Depending upon just how slippery it is, it can be poured into the palm of the hand or massaged onto the penis. The hand is used as a tube, sliding over the whole penis. This will mimic what it feels like to move the penis in and out of a woman's vagina in sexual intercourse. A much slower stroke than in dry masturbation is possible, with or without a foreskin – which also helps to make it feel like 'real' sex.

But this article is probably an example of teaching grandmothers to suck eggs. This is a topic on which every guy is an expert. So, for the next issue, I want lots of contributions from members. Let's hear about your favourite technique, your favourite lube – even your favourite fantasies – and for how many of you does that involve circumcision in some shape or form?! If everyone shares, who knows, we might all learn something new.

Further Observations On Sensitivity

There is a reduction in sensitivity after the foreskin is removed. However, this has to be taken in context with many other factors such as overall 'feel' and appearance of the penis proudly displaying an enlarged glans with much reduced shaft mobility. Personally, I love the slightly bare feel of the glans in my pants especially if they are on the loose side and the penis can slide around in them.

I am one of a few men who can compare intercourse with a foreskin and without one. With a foreskin, my glans was hypersensitive and, as a lover, I was a dead loss. After a few strokes I would ejaculate and my girlfriend would be left high and dry with me instantly rehooding a glans so tingling with sensitivity that I didn't know what to do with it. Certainly unable to pay any attention to her.

Previous boyfriends had been circumcised and she had had good sexual relations with them and had always climaxed. She therefore knew the difference between the cut and the uncut cock and constantly brought up the subject of circumcision. Since I had always been very envious of my cut school friends, I decided that my foreskin would have to go, if only to have better sex. The loss of my foreskin was the subject of an article in issue 5/2004, so I won't go into how that was achieved now. When I resumed sexual relations there was a slight reduction in sensitivity and I was able to last longer to the delight of my girlfriend who kept enthusing about its new look. From then on, from my late twenties, sex was a delight.

From my late sixties, however, sensitivity, and the ability to ejaculate during intercourse, has been more problematic. This I think has more to do with age than the fact that the glans is uncovered. Perhaps one of our uncut members in their seventies could comment on this. I do know from chance discussion with an uncut friend younger than me that his sex life is nil now, so I do think my problem is more (or completely) age related. Certainly I still get much pleasure from the fact that I am circumcised and, if I had the opportunity to regrow a foreskin, would reject it.

During my long sexually active life, I have never met any woman who either preferred the uncut cock or wasn't more than satisfied with my ability to satisfy her. In fact, due to considerations of cervical cancer and HIV etc, every woman I have known has been very pro-circumcision, and considered the cut cock much cleaner.

On pages 14 and 15 of issue 3/2007, Anthony – Devon, queries what a perfect circumcision looks like and comes up with a scar line close to the glans. This means the loss of all the sensitive inner skin which I feel is sad. The ideal in my view is to retain all the inner skin and to achieve as near invisible a scar as possible. This would ensure the retention of all possible sensitivity post-operatively. The circumcision to achieve this would initially involve severing the inner and outer skin at the top of the foreskin and then by cuff resection removing most of the outer shaft skin, joining the two layers at the base of the shaft near the hairline.

This reminds me of the pictures of D.B. – Notts (issue 3/2007) and his good sense in having a scar well down the shaft. I would particularly like to congratulate him on the way in which he cleaned up the ventral underside of his penis, so beautifully smooth now. His 'degree of disappointment' is, I suspect, as discussed above, age related.

One final consideration as to whether circumcision goes against nature. Many boys are born with short foreskins – or even without them – and naturally retract, leaving them dehooded by puberty.

My Dorsal Slit – And After

[In issue 5/2007, R.T. told how a medical examination had led to him being circumcised with a dorsal slit. Now he continues his story.]

At the time of my circumcision, my father was in the forces. It was therefore my mother's decision to have me circumcised by the dorsal slit method. Mother had found out about circumcision from my uncle, and it was he who took my dressings off after ten days. He also showed me how to move the foreskin so that it was free of the glans. For urination, I just pulled the foreskin back over the shaft; if I didn't, I splashed all over the place. As I got older, the skin lengthened and hung underneath.

In 1974 I decided to have something done about my ugly penis. My wife encouraged me. It was the same then as now. I went to my doctor but he didn't seem interested in my quest. I was referred to the hospital but again no joy. I couldn't find anyone to re-circ me. After some months my wife came home from work with an address of someone who circumcised. A woman at work had given her the address. We rang this doctor and an appointment was made. It appeared he had been an army doctor. Being an army doctor, we thought he would be good. How wrong can you be.

We drove to this doctor's – I had an afternoon appointment. We were shown into a waiting room, and the doctor came in and introduced himself. He asked my wife if she was coming with me; she said "Yes". He took us through to the surgery. I was told to put this smock-like garment on and then to get on this couch. He opened the bottom half of the smock and examined my penis. He asked me when and how I was circumcised. When I told him, he said that a dorsal slit always had complications. He asked if I wanted doing properly and I said "Yes". The nurse brought a trolley over and the doctor injected my penis. I couldn't see what he was doing. After about 10-15 minutes, I couldn't feel anything. He was cutting my foreskin off with scissors and he seemed to take a long time doing me. I didn't feel anything. I was helped from the couch and re-dressed. He gave me some tablets for pain, and then we paid him and left after having a cup of tea. My wife said that she was sorry that I had had to be done but I replied that it was my choice.

When we got home I took a painkiller as it was beginning to hurt. I asked my wife whether he had taken it all off and she replied that he had, and more. She said that when he had cut my foreskin off, he had cut my frenulum out completely. She said that he had put in some stitches to stop the bleeding. He had also opened up my urethra. I asked how much and she said that I was cut underneath to my groove.

After the dressings were off I could see that I had been done by a 'butcher'. He had left some foreskin on but my urethra was open. The only thing that looked right was the frenulum cut. After some time I got used to it – it was much better than the dorsal slit in all ways.

The only thing now is that in time the skin has grown onto my glans; that is why I am looking for a good circumciser to give me a tight re-circ. I'm being cautious this time.

Happy And Proud To Be Cut

I saw my first cut dick at the age of 6, and have been fascinated with the subject of circumcision ever since! I was so jealous of the guys with nice high and tight circumcisions, and I myself wanted to be circumcised so badly.

In my early twenties I went to see my GP about the possibility of getting circumcised, but he said he couldn't refer me to hospital because there was nothing wrong with my foreskin. So I left with nothing – which was a good thing actually because, as I later learned, the NHS circumcisions are usually very ugly because they are performed by urology students. At the age of 27, I finally realised that I couldn't be happy about my body unless I was circumcised. So, through the circlist website, I found a private clinic down South that performed circumcisions.

My dream eventually came true on Valentine's Day, 14th February 2005. The day of my circumcision – I will never forget it! It was like a second birthday for me, the day that I became a real man! That day I had to travel down south to a private clinic in Luton, near London. I was a bit nervous but feeling happy and looking forward to my circumcision! I knew that my doc was a very experienced circumciser who performs lots of circumcisions every day. He was very busy that day and I was one of the last patients to be seen.

Before me he circumcised a few babies, a couple of children and a couple of adults. Then it was my turn. The doctor asked to examine my penis. I have to add at this point that even though I always wanted my foreskin gone, it wasn't actually that bad looking. I suppose it was just a normal problem-free foreskin – it wasn't too narrow or too long – but I still wanted it gone! Anyway, the doc examined me, and at that point I told him that the style of my cut had to be high and tight. I stressed to him that I wanted it as tight as possible, and I even showed him a magazine picture of a guy with a very nice dick, and asked that the end result of my circumcision should look like this.

After that he took me to the operating room and asked me to strip from the waist down. I did that, and lay on the operating table. Doc and his male assistant were preparing my penis for the operation, covering it with a special anti-bacterial liquid and injecting my penis with anaesthetic. It was a bit uncomfortable. Then the assistant pulled my foreskin over the glans, he really stretched it, and at the same time the doctor crushed my foreskin with something that looked like a giant pair of scissors, and cut my foreskin off! I was so happy and relieved that this part was over, and I was finally circumcised!!! The anaesthetics were working so there was no pain. There was a little bit of blood as the doc was stitching the skin. Then he put a bandage on, leaving just my exposed dickhead to stick out of the bandage. The whole operation took 45 minutes to an hour.

I returned home the same day, and was back at work the following morning. There wasn't much pain, just a little discomfort, and obviously the dickhead was constantly rubbing against underwear which was a bit uncomfortable at first, and took some time to get used to. In my case healing went quite slowly. Obviously my dick was all bruised and swollen, but I think I also developed an infection so I had to take a course of antibiotics.

I read before my circumcision that it took some guy only a couple of weeks to get back to normal after his cut; in my case it was more like a couple of months! Infection went away after the course of antibiotics, but swelling still stayed there for a number of weeks. I removed the stitches myself after two weeks so there was no need to go back to the clinic. I kept my cut bandaged for the first two or three weeks to keep the scars from rubbing against underwear, and I also had regular salty baths for my dick to promote healing.

I was able to have a wank carefully after a week, but it was about ten weeks before I could do all the sexual activities like before. I don't think it usually takes so long to recover after a circumcision. But although it did take me a while, all that wait was absolutely worth it! Once I was able to do all the sexual activities, I discovered that being circumcised is not only having the best looking penis that all the guys in the changing rooms are jealous of, but it's also having the best sex life!!!

For a couple of months before the circumcision I was trying to keep my foreskin permanently retracted, and going about my usual day with my glans exposed. It was a very unusual feeling, and even a bit uncomfortable because my exposed glans kept getting sore from permanent exposure, and I kept getting hard-ons. But, because of this practice, it wasn't a total shock for me to have my glans permanently exposed after the circumcision; but still it took another few months after the operation to get used to it completely. Now I'm used to it, and it feels so natural to me to have my permanently exposed dickhead rubbing against my underwear. It doesn't feel uncomfortable or sore anymore. In fact most of the time I don't even notice it, it's just right!

My doc has done a great job, and given me a very high and very tight cut with the frenulum completely gone! I am so happy that I had it done; now I feel like a real man with my glans proudly exposed at all times! My only regret is that I did not have it done much sooner. I can't believe that up until the age of 27 I had a foreskin covering my dickhead.

Before my circumcision I used to have a problem with premature ejaculation. My glans was too sensitive, and during penetrative sex I used to come too soon. Circumcision helped me to overcome this problem. My glans became slightly less sensitive due to permanent exposure, but I don't see it as a bad thing. For me it's been a great thing because now I don't have to worry about coming too soon. My sex life has improved 100 per cent because I can last for absolute ages now, and come when I choose to.

Talking about masturbation, I found that it got more pleasurable after I got circumcised, and my orgasms got more intense! I was cut high and tight Arab style, so a lot of inner skin was kept; maybe that's one of the reasons why the wanks are so good! I had to change my masturbation techniques slightly after the operation, I started to use lube because my cut was quite tight, even though I can do a dry wank because there is still a bit of skin movement. Now I concentrate on the scar around my penis during masturbation, and particularly the scar where the frenulum used to be. That's the most sensitive part of my penis, and touching and playing with that scar gives me unbelievable sensations!

It's been nearly three years since I got cut. I'm still as passionate as ever about the subject of circumcision. In the ideal world I would make it mandatory. That's one of the few things I like about America, even though in recent years circumcision rates have gone down, and it may be only a matter of time before uncuts outnumber cuts in the US. I hope that there will be a reverse process here in the UK, and more and more guys will be finding out about the benefits of circumcision, and getting cut! I'd very much like that!

As it is, I'm still loving my cut! After three years, the scar is fading, but there is still a lot of difference in colour, which I think will be always be there. Also my glans has started to flare out because it's been constantly exposed for nearly 3 years. I love the flared out look; now my dick looks like a real circumcised dick! I have had only positive comments from guys who have seen my cock in real life or in pictures. I am quite happy to show my circumcised cock in any situation, for example in changing rooms of my gym. I've been waiting and wishing to be cut for so long, and now I am so proud to be a circumcised man that I want the whole world to know my circumcision status. Since I got cut all I want to do is show it off! I haven't done a nude beach yet, but I'm hoping to do one this year, possibly in Spain.

I am glad to share my successful circumcision story, and to say how much happier I feel as a circumcised man, and I want to encourage other guys who are considering getting cut to go for it! It's such a great feeling to be circumcised. I'm so happy and so proud to be CUT!!!

Tales Of Foreskin

Response 1

I was born in 1940. As a child growing up, I found out that my friends in the neighbourhood had different looking penises. They had a pink thing on the end of it. Also I found out my new baby brother was the same as them. I was worried that there was something wrong with my penis. I think I was about 4 when I was in the bath and my father had to go to the bathroom to pee. The toilet was in full view of the bath. He took out his penis and I saw that his was the same as mine. I also saw him move his extra skin down and it exposed the pink head. As time went by I found out that more boys had a penis like mine.

When I was a teenager at camp, the subject of circumcision came up. There were 30 kids in my cabin where we slept and someone suggested we all see how many of us were circumcised. It turned out that 17 were circumcised and 13 were not. I think that many boys in my age group born in the early 1940s were still left uncut.

Later in my life when I met the girl I was to marry, we didn't have sex until our honeymoon. I remember the erection I had that first time we had sex. The head on my cock was fully exposed. We both fell asleep after sex and we were naked. The next morning my wife woke up first and she thought that something had happened to my penis because the foreskin was pulled over the head and she didn't know anything about uncut cocks. When I told her about circumcision she was all right then. She had seen her brothers before and they were cut. She was glad mine wasn't cut and she liked playing with it. My wife and I had a great sex life with it being uncut. Also we had two sons and we left them uncut.

Response 2

I was thirteen when I was able to pull back my foreskin all the way behind my glans. Prior to that I had a very tight and short foreskin, but had worked on it on my own for about a half year, occasionally with pain. I remember my glans being extremely sensitive at first, such as in the shower. By 16 I had widened my foreskin even further so that I was able to retract it comfortably and easily with a full erection. As my penis grew larger, my foreskin stayed the same length but widened further, covering only half of the glans. I enjoyed the sensation and decided to keep my foreskin completely retracted at all times, with a constantly bare glans. I've gone like this for 25 years now, and look circumcised even when flaccid as the foreskin stays behind the glans on its own and may even have become a little shorter. But then, I never had much foreskin in the first place, even before it became fully retractable.

I'm very comfortable, and my glans isn't overly sensitive at all as in the past due to daily rubbing against clothes. On the contrary, it's just right for me, and sex is wonderful as my glans stays bare during sex. Moreover, I can keep going longer before climaxing, making sex wonderful for my girl as well who is also pleased with the look and feel of my bare glans!

Response 3

I am in my fifties and uncut. I was almost sixteen before I could completely retract my foreskin. I prefer to leave my glans covered as much as possible, and only retract the foreskin to rinse. My foreskin extends beyond my glans about a quarter to a half inch when my penis is soft. During erection, my foreskin still covers the glans completely, but I can retract it. It will not stay retracted, however, and rolls back over the glans about half way. I do not retract it for intercourse. During intercourse my foreskin has good movement, but never completely off the glans. The glans is at least partially covered at all times. My wife and I change positions a lot and we both have noticed that my glans stays mostly covered.

Response 4

In our family, foreskin retraction happens quite early in life and I cannot remember when I could not. I do remember when my son's foreskin was first retracted. It was done by our GP and he screamed like hell. I remember mine being tighter than it is now but never problematical. It extends up to 2 cm beyond the glans depending upon temperature and tumescence. When erect, it usually does not completely retract though it has upon occasion. I have never found direct stimulation of the glans with anything dry pleasant. Manipulation of the foreskin over the glans is great and a bare glans in a vagina is super. On the other hand, after a shower I have on occasion forgotten to put the foreskin back over the glans and have got well into the day before I have realised that a slight discomfort is due to my bare glans rubbing on my clothing.

Response 5

When flaccid, my foreskin covers my glans with about a quarter of an inch over. When erect about a quarter of the glans is exposed. I first retracted it fully when I was eleven. It scared me silly! I didn't know the head existed. I was first given oral sex at 15. My head was so sensitive that it was unpleasant. It hurt! Nowadays (aged 40) it is less sensitive and oral sex is great.

Because I have always been curious about circumcision I have often gone days with my foreskin retracted. After day two the head gets much less sensitive. This feels OK, just different. When the head is less sensitive the rest of the penis seems to compensate. In other words, usually, when having intercourse, my head is so sensitive that I hardly notice the rest of my penis. After two or more days retracted, the head is so much less sensitive that I feel the whole shaft, not just the end. When I have exposed my glans for a few days and then have intercourse I find that I have to thrust harder to get enough stimulation to reach orgasm. This is OK if my partner wants 'rough' sex. If she wants slower, more gentle lovemaking, then it's better to have a more sensitive head.

Which is best? I don't know. I would love to be circumcised for a year, just to really find out.

Response 6

One of my former boyfriends had a pretty long foreskin that overhung about half an inch when he was soft. When erect, the penis head was almost completely covered. Of course the skin could be retracted, but it kinda came back and covered the glans when released. When we had sex, one of us used to hold the foreskin back as we felt it was more agreeable for both of us when the foreskin was held back that way. There was more rubbing effect between the penile head and my vaginal walls.

My present boyfriend was circumcised at birth. The circumcision is pretty tight and when erect, there is no loose skin on the shaft. Sexwise, it's fantastic as I can really feel him inside me. I've also experienced other circumcised partners who were more loosely cut. During intercourse, there is no significant difference between a loosely circumcised man and an uncircumcised one.

Non-medical Circumcision Banned In Australian Public Hospitals

In September, Victoria became the fourth Australian state to no longer provide circumcisions at public hospitals for non-medical reasons. Circumcisions will be performed only where doctors determine there is a need because of concerns over infections or disease. New South Wales, Western Australia and Tasmania had already implemented the change.

Victorian Health Minister Daniel Andrews said there was no medical evidence to support routine circumcision of newborn males. "In Australia and New Zealand, the circumcision rate has fallen considerably in recent years, and it is estimated that only 10 to 20 per cent of male infants are routinely circumcised," Mr Andrews said. "Both nationally and overseas, doctors agree there is no medical benefit to routine circumcision, and studies show the complication rate is around five per cent."

Mr Andrews said parents who wish to have their son circumcised for religious reasons could have the procedure done in private hospitals.

About 2,200 circumcisions were carried out in Victorian public hospitals in 2005-6, costing about $2 million. Mr Andrews said that money could be used to fund more urgent elective surgery procedures. "It is important to ensure hospital services are prioritised towards treating patients who have a clinical need for surgery to improve their health," he said.

While recent studies of African countries suggested circumcision can reduce the rates of HIV, a report by the World Health Organisation concluded that in countries such as Australia, where HIV rates are low in the general population, limited benefit would result from routine circumcision, according to the Victorian government.

Victoria was followed in November by South Australia, one of the last states still offering 'cosmetic' circumcision. Health Minister John Hill stated: "The Health Department has a responsibility to ensure access to elective surgery is based on sound medical reasons. Cosmetic procedures such as liposuction, facelifts and male circumcision will only be provided if assessed and justified on true clinical grounds. This will improve the demand on beds, clinical resources and theatre time."

Australian Medical Association State President Peter Ford said circumcision was controversial and it was "not unreasonable" that other procedures take priority in a system under pressure. Patients already on the waiting list will still be able to have the surgery in the public system but anyone not allocated an appointment will not be eligible. Other procedures to be banned include breast enlargement or reduction, penile implant, hair transplant, facelift, gender re-assignment surgery and sterilisation reversal.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital surgery director Guy Maddern said it was 30 years or more since most purely cosmetic work had been performed in public hospitals. "It's making it clear that operations will not be offered for cosmetic reasons but only for medically indicated reasons," he said.

I'd Want To Forget About It Too

[from an internet blog: A Korean Life Teaching]

One of my more annoying students has been getting on the nerves of all the teachers recently. He will do things just to piss us off over and over again.

When it came time to write homework on the board, the boy shouted he wouldn't be attending the academy next week. He was beaming with joy. I did what I always do when students tell me in advance that they would not be in class. I told everyone else we would have a huge party to celebrate their departure. I'm always very sarcastic about it.

I asked him why he wasn't going to be at school, and he said that he would be in the hospital. He had some kind of surgery scheduled. Of all the things he could have said, this had to be his reason. I had to give the boy credit. He was good at making his teachers feel sorry for him. I asked him if it was a serious surgery, what was wrong, if he was sick, and how long he would be gone.

He was completely oblivious to any of the details. He said he had forgotten what his parents had told him. He didn't know why he was going in, or what was wrong with him. The less he knew, the worse I felt. Why else would his parents keep details of a surgery from their children? It must have been some sort of serious surgery. He was still very happy about it all, and was looking forward to not coming to class. I wished him luck when he went home, then went into the head teachers' room to find out what was going on. If someone was going to miss class, the head teacher would know why.

"Do you know why that boy is going to miss next week's class? He said he had surgery and would be in the hospital. Why? What's wrong with him? Will he be okay?"

"Oh yeah," my head teacher responded, "he's getting circumcised."

Somehow, after his surgery, I think he'll be wishing he never missed school.

Explaining

One of the toughest things to explain to my little nephew is why some people circumcise. I have to answer because he came back from school wanting to know why his friend did it. My nephew cannot accept religion as an excuse and he didn't get it anyway, so I told him it's easier if the boy is without the foreskin.

"Easier for what?"

"Easier to aim ..."

Of course we ended up arguing and laughing why the foreskin is the most useless piece of skin ever to develop in the history of the male anatomy. The eyelids are for protecting the eye and shutting off the lights at bed time, the lips are for kissing and wetting your stamps, but the foreskin ... doesn't serve any purpose, does it?

And where does the foreskin go after that? It's the same old question I ask about decaf coffee ... where does the caffeine go? "You know, in China, they'll eat anything" ... But quite unlikely, 'cos I still see those ex-Eunuchs' testicles hanging around the temples ... Or maybe it's re-cycled into some skincare or anti-aging products, like what they do with sheep's placenta.

For me, I don't really like the idea of trimming my little ... plus it feels like it has been shortened artificially. And with the underwear, I get double protection, but without the foreskin, it's back to one.

Would You Consider Circumcision?

I never usually watch Seinfeld, but this episode is pretty interesting. In this episode Jerry and Elaine are the godparents of a newborn baby who is going to be circumcised. Now, I know that it is primarily a Jewish custom to perform circumcision, but would you consider it for yourself or your son? Just in case one does not understand what exactly happens at a circumcision, the foreskin of the penis is removed after the baby is 8 days old. This was done by Abraham in the Bible as a covenant with God. So, that is the background info.

Having that out there, would you do it? Before you say no, consider the following benefits for both males AND females:

1. Some older men develop cancer of the penis – about 1 in 1000 – fairly rare, but tragic if you or your son are in that small statistic. Infant circumcision gives almost 100% protection, and young adult circumcision also gives a large degree of protection.
2. Cancer of the cervix in women is due to HPV (the Human Papilloma Virus). It thrives under and on the foreskin from where it can be transmitted during intercourse. At least 20% of cancer of the cervix would be avoided if all men were circumcised.
3. Protection against HIV and AIDS. Circumcised men are 8 times less likely to contract the HIV virus. (The risk is still far too high and condoms and safe sex must still be used.) Two Ugandan tribes across the valley from one another were studied. One practised circumcision and had very little AIDS, whereas, it was common in the other tribe, who then also started circumcising. Infection thrived in the lining of the foreskin, making it much easier to pass on.

And if you care less about the ones before...

4. Lots of men, and their partners, prefer the appearance of their penis after circumcision. It is odour-free, it feels cleaner, and they enjoy better sex. Awareness of a good body image is a very important factor in building self confidence.

Think about it.

Battle To Save The Foreskin

When I walked down to the Capitol Building yesterday I was gobsmacked. The fact that there were a few protesters sitting out on the lawn with signs didn't surprise me. What better place to try and encourage a change in our laws. What surprised me was seeing signs encouraging an end to circumcision.

Now don't get me wrong, I'm far from being a prude. For example, when I lived in Oklahoma City, I once took part in a protest to try and keep an adult novelty store from being closed down by the religious right. I guess I just expected any protesters in front of the Capitol Building to speak out for something more important. You know, like trying to put an end to the Iraq war.

What really got my attention was the sign that said “Circumcision is Torture.” Isn’t that a bit melodramatic? Maybe if I could remember being circumcised shortly after birth I would agree with that statement. A friend of mine decided to get circumcised as an adult, and after the local anaesthesia wore off he did complain about some pain, but not enough that I would consider what he did torture. He gladly did it for his girlfriend, and after things had healed he said he didn’t have any regrets.

I’m now looking forward to my next trip to DC just to see who is protesting.

Ode To My Husband’s Missing Foreskin

I never knew you. I wish I had.
Someone said you were bad.
Ripped you off before you were complete,
Thought that bare glans looked so neat.

Now we deal with wet against dry and rely on KY.
How much fun it would have been to slide you back and forth again.
And see the pleasure in his eyes
as his pressure starts to rise.

Circumcision robs more than one of the perfect design for fun.
He doesn’t miss what he never had,
so why does it make me so sad?

Celebrity Status – Alistair Campbell

[by Jon Henley, the Guardian]

Although Ali Campbell’s official diaries have recently been published, there exists an earlier version. “She bit at pubic hairs as her warm mouth came to the end of its travels along my tumbling erection,” reads a typically acute insight from Busking With Bagpipes, one of three volumes in which, according to TheFirstPost.com, St Tony’s future spinmeister – then a kilted Cambridge undergrad – “shags his way from the icy wastes of Norway to the nudist beaches of the south of France”, playing the pipes and teaching English to pay his way. “Her shock at reaching the tip of my unclothed penis, and my delight as she peels back the foreskin,” reveals Ali in another perceptive analysis of Labour’s EU dilemma, “are preludes to Common Market copulation.” Heavens! If the dear boy showed such boundless talent at so tender an age, what dare we hope for from The Blair Years?

Editorial

To date, 85% of members have renewed for 2008 – a good tally, but I shall be pursuing the delinquents! Of those who have renewed, four fifths are circumcised and one fifth uncut, showing that the Society still has broad appeal. Interestingly, only one of the delinquents is uncut, so it cannot be a procirc bias in the newsletter which is responsible for their default.

Staying with statistics, I reprint on page 6 an article from The Times – rather more balanced than is usually the case. It also appeared on-line with the facility for readers to submit comments. Out of 33 comments posted, only six supported circumcision. Why is it that the anti-circumcision lobby is so much more vociferous and better organised? Is it that those who favour circumcision are usually circumcised themselves and comfortable with their status, whereas the antis have a cause about which they are more fanatical? The danger of course is that if circumcision is not better promoted, the anti voice will dominate; and then future generations will have no opportunity to enjoy the benefits of circumcision that their cut predecessors took for granted.

Doctors and Circumcision

In the United Kingdom, the majority of baby boys retain their foreskins. Sixty years ago, the reverse was true. Then it was the norm, particularly in middle and upper class families, for the sons of the house to be circumcised – like their fathers.

The reasons for the change are well known. The newly created National Health Service was required to provide free health services to all. It could have been overwhelmed if this had included routine infant circumcision. Fortuitously the BMJ article 'The fate of the foreskin' by Gairdner argued that foreskin adhesions naturally persisted until the age of five. Routine circumcision was therefore unjustified. Non-sequitur it may have been (in a previous Editor's Column I have described the article as intellectually shoddy) but it gave doctors a rationale for ceasing the operation. Today it is still the NHS position that routine infant circumcision has no medical basis. So parents seeking circumcision for their son will in all probability be shown the door unless they can point to an immediate medical problem that the operation will solve. Similarly, an adult male who decides that he wishes to be circumcised is more likely to be referred to a psychiatrist than a surgeon.

Parental preference has no status – the medical profession's fiat is absolute. But there are parents who are convinced that circumcision has prophylactic benefits; that the removal of the foreskin safeguards against future potential problems with phimosis and balanitis and confers protection against a number of sexually transmitted diseases, not least AIDS. There is evidence to support such claims and the parents' decision to seek circumcision can be judged entirely rational. But this holds no sway with the medical mafia.

Of course, some doctors are opposed to circumcision for ethical as well as medical reasons. The point is well made in an article by Mark Henderson in The Times: "I have an ethical objection to circumcising male babies. It strikes me as wrong to remove a perfectly healthy body part from infants who cannot possibly consent. There is no good evidence for medical benefit, and a small risk of complications. Most importantly, it cannot be undone. Were I a doctor, I would want no part in it."

A doctor who has such ethical misgivings can hardly be expected to wield the scalpel. But the situation is no different from that which pertains to abortion. There are many doctors and nurses who want no truck with that process. But they cannot just send the pregnant woman away empty handed. They must refer her on to a medical practitioner who does not have the same ethical objections. The same is not currently true with male circumcision. There is no requirement for a doctor to refer on to a practitioner more in sympathy with the procedure. But that could be about to change.

The General Medical Council has recently issued a document: Personal beliefs and medical practice. Whilst officially described as guidance, doctors are warned that serious or persistent failure to follow it will put their registration at risk. The guidance concerns those situations where the doctor's beliefs are at variance with those of the patient. It gives specific examples of situations where this can occur, one of which is male circumcision. The relevant parts of the guidance are set out below.

The situation is clear. First, male circumcision for non-medical reasons is not proscribed by the GMC: "The GMC does not have a position on the issue." Second, if the doctor disagrees with male circumcision, he/she must tell the patient of their right to see another doctor: "If the patient cannot readily make their own arrangements to see another doctor you must ensure that arrangements are made, without delay, for another doctor to take over their care. You must not obstruct patients from accessing services or leave them with nowhere to turn." Thus in future, where parents seek circumcision for their young sons, they should not be turned away empty handed; they should be referred to a doctor more sympathetic to the procedure.

Doctors may argue that they do not know of doctors in favour of the operation. But this is where organisations such as The Gilgal Society come into play. Their excellent leaflets explain clearly the procedure of circumcision and its benefits. They also keep an up-to-date list of practitioners willing to perform the operation. A supply of such leaflets in every GP's practice could help doctors opposed to routine circumcision to satisfy the GMC requirements.

Over the past ten or fifteen years, the doctor – patient relationship has been gradually changing. The doctor can no longer pontificate from on high – the patient now has to be brought fully into the process and be part of the decision making. At the same time, doctors are encouraged to move away from just treating illness to promoting healthy life styles. Parents may well feel that circumcision has a part to play in ensuring the future health and well-being of their sons. If the GMC guidance is properly enforced, such parents should in future be helped in their quest to have the operation performed, rather than barriers being put in their way.

Perhaps when parents have a true choice, routine circumcision will once again come to be seen as a practical option for all babies. It may take time for the pendulum to swing back but, who knows, at some time in the future infant circumcision may even return to being the norm.

Extracts from GMC guidance: Personal beliefs and medical practice

Circumcision of male children for religious or cultural reasons

12. Many people within the Jewish and Islamic faiths consider male circumcision to be essential to the practice of their religion; they would regard any restriction or ban on male circumcision as an infringement of a fundamental human right. Others, including those who campaign against the practice of male circumcision, strongly believe that, because circumcision carries risks, it is wrong to perform the procedure on children who are not old enough to give informed consent, unless it is undertaken to address a specific clinical condition.

13. The GMC does not have a position on this issue. We do not have general authority to determine public policy on issues that arise within medical practice – these are matters for society as a whole to determine, through the parliamentary process.
14. If you are asked to circumcise a male child, you must proceed on the basis of the child's best interests and with consent. An assessment of best interests will include the child and/or his parents' cultural, religious or other beliefs and values. You should get the child's consent if he is competent. If he is not, you should get consent from both parents if possible, but otherwise from at least one person with parental responsibility. If parents cannot agree and disputes cannot be resolved informally, you should seek legal advice about whether you should apply to the court.
15. If you are opposed to circumcision except where it is clinically indicated you must explain this to the child (if he can understand) and his parents and follow our advice on conscientious objection (paragraphs 21 – 25).

Doctors' personal beliefs

21. Patients may ask you to perform, advise on, or refer them for a treatment or procedure which is not prohibited by law or statutory code of practice in the country where you work, but to which you have a conscientious objection. In such cases you must tell patients of their right to see another doctor with whom they can discuss their situation and ensure that they have sufficient information to exercise that right. In deciding whether the patient has sufficient information, you must explore with the patient what information they might already have, or need.
22. In the circumstances described in paragraph 21, if the patient cannot readily make their own arrangements to see another doctor you must ensure that arrangements are made, without delay, for another doctor to take over their care. You must not obstruct patients from accessing services or leave them with nowhere to turn. Whatever your personal beliefs may be about the procedure in question, you must be respectful of the patient's dignity and views.
23. You must be open with patients – both in person and in printed materials such as practice leaflets – about any treatments or procedures which you choose not to provide or arrange because of a conscientious objection, but which are not otherwise prohibited.

Circumcision Greatly Improves Sex

Before the age of 6 I had noticed that my father's penis was different from mine and I thought mine would be like his when I grew up, until my baby brother was circumcised. After that I hated my foreskin. My father had not been circumcised until just before he was married, so he wanted me to be cut as a baby, to save trouble in later life. My parents later told me that they had taken me to the doctor to be circumcised but he, silly man, stretched my foreskin and convinced them that I didn't need to be cut.

There was nothing wrong with my foreskin. It wasn't too tight but I hated it even more when, at the age of 7 or 8, I discovered that my best friends had been circumcised and their penises looked and felt much nicer than mine. I remember playing with the penises of four friends, over 2 or 3 years, and was very envious of them as their penises felt so clean and soft and smooth. I actually sucked one. It was not until I was 10 that I got to know an uncircumcised friend well enough to see and touch his penis; I certainly was not tempted to suck it. He had a very long and fairly tight foreskin and his glans was red, slimy and cheesy, and that made me convinced that one day I would be circumcised. Also, about that time, my sister tactlessly mentioned that she preferred our brother's penis and wondered why mine wasn't neat like his. I think it was because I was envious of my brother that he and I were never close. This is a very good reason for RIC (routine infant circumcision) – I had four friends, two pairs of brothers, one in each pair was circumcised, and just like me and my brother, they never got on. I have a feeling that this is much more common than is realised, and I urge parents to insist that their sons are circumcised.

From the age of 11-12 until now I have discovered that all girls and women whom I have got to know well enough to ask about it have said that they prefer circumcised penises. Sadly I was not circumcised until after I was married and we discovered that it felt better for both of us when my wife held the foreskin back. Obviously that was not ideal, so I went to my doctor at last. He agreed to circumcise me free on the National Health Service but insisted that I would have to stay in overnight. I was embarrassed about what the nurses would say, so one lunch hour I popped out of the office to a Harley Street doctor who did the minor operation with less bother than a visit to the dentist. My wife couldn't wait to see the result when I got home that evening – obviously she could not see much that day because of the bandages but it healed quickly and very soon we were having greatly improved sex.

My second wife and all my lovers in between marriages have been glad that I was circumcised and several friends have been cut on my recommendation – one even said that his circumcision saved his marriage. Since my second wife left me, I have had one young Chinese lover who was thrilled with my penis as she had never seen a circumcised one before – she said it felt so much better for her than having a penis with a loose foreskin inside her, which was no better than with an old-fashioned washable condom, and she will insist that her future Chinese husband gets himself cut. Sadly she is back in China now.

Incidentally, I did not find it necessary to change my masturbation technique after circumcision, probably because I had always tried to hold the foreskin back. I do not like wet lubrication, but talcum power is very good. Finally I stress that I have found the pleasure and sensations during sexual intercourse and masturbation far superior since I was circumcised. Personally I am glad that my frenum was not removed and I rather like to have it pinched and nibbled.

Well that is my story I hope you found it interesting. I'd be very interested to hear from anyone about circumcision either by letter or through email at RN-mail@tiscali.co.uk

Obituary – David Hunt

We were very sorry to learn of the death of David Hunt early in 2008.

David had been a loyal and active member from the very early days of Acorn. I believe that he was one of the people who responded to the instigating advert placed in Forum magazine by 'Tony Acorn'. The first meeting was at his house in Weston-super-Mare, where about ten like-minded men gathered to see what common ground they could find.

He went on to be the editor of the newsletter for many years, making sure that views were balanced and appropriate. I always felt that if there were too many articles in one direction then David would use a lot of licence to level things up.

He kept in touch with many people all over the world, which helped him to avoid becoming narrow minded or entrenched in his opinions. He travelled extensively and was very well liked.

During the time that David was chairman the group thrived and meetings were enjoyed by all. Whatever he set his mind to he did well and to the utmost of his ability.

Circumcision 'The Unkindest Cut Of All'

[an abridged version of an article by David Baker in The Times]

Barbaric, mutilation, child abuse, freaks, nutters, obsessives. The language on both sides of the debate about infant male circumcision is not always temperate. Put together new-born boys, their penises, knives and two of the world's oldest religions and passions are likely to run high. While February saw the fifth International Day of Zero Tolerance to Female Genital Mutilation, marking a fairly united global campaign against the practice in females, the arguments about the removal of a male infant's foreskin seem mired in misinformation, accusations and despair.

What is clear is that there are very few medical indications nowadays for choosing circumcision over other procedures. Writing in the BMJ (British Medical Journal) last December, Padraig Malone and Henrik Steinbrecher, of Southampton University Hospital, found only two absolute indications for circumcision: a chronic skin condition called balanitis xerotica obliterans, which may have links with penile cancer, and some specific abnormalities and scarring on the foreskin. Beyond that, they say, problems such as phimosis, when the foreskin is too tight to be pulled back over the glans, and inflammation of the glans and foreskin caused by bacterial infections – both of which often see the surgeon reaching for their scalpel – can usually be treated non surgically.

Yet infant male circumcision continues on a wide scale. According to Malone and Steinbrecher, one male in six worldwide will be circumcised at some point in his life. In the UK, rates have dropped significantly since the 1930s and 1940s, when it was almost de rigueur for boys of a certain class to be circumcised. But today the NHS still performs about 10,000 circumcisions a year on boys aged up to 15. Add to that hard-to-count religious circumcisions carried out at home and, say campaigners against it, you end up with a lot of unnecessary trauma and risk.

However, circumcision does appear to offer some important health benefits, particularly with sexually transmitted infections. Research published last year from Kenya showed that circumcision had a significant protective effect against HIV infection – at least in countries where HIV is extensive and spread predominantly through heterosexual intercourse. Penile cancer also appears to be less common among circumcised men. And a 1999 review of past research, published in the British Journal of Urology, indicated that uncircumcised males were more prone to diseases such as syphilis and herpes simplex, which is enough to persuade some doctors that circumcision is the right course.

“When my boys were born,” says Dr Kirsten Patrick, a former hospital doctor and now an associate editor at the BMJ, “I did an enormous search of the literature and I thought [circumcision] was a good thing. It is much easier to do when they are small and less traumatic than waiting till later. I knew as a doctor that there was a way that they could go through this pain-free.” Patrick has no truck with circumcision away from the medical establishment. “Holding a baby down, with no anaesthetic, that’s dreadful,” she says. “There’s no way anyone should do that. But I am in favour of saying that there is benefit to circumcision and it should be regulated.”

One part of the country that is moving quickly in this direction is Walsall, where the local hospital now offers a weekend male-circumcision clinic. “We have a large Muslim community here,” says Dr Sam Ramaiah, director of public health for Walsall Primary Care Trust, “and we wanted to provide local children with a service that is safe and secure. The procedure takes place in hospital with local anaesthetic and is done by a trained surgeon. The advantage is that there is care available in case of complications and, if necessary, the child can stay in.”

Programmes such as this are unlikely to satisfy anti-circumcision campaigners – who say that the physical effects of circumcision on an infant are only part of the story. Norm-UK’s argument is that, for many men, circumcision reduces sexual pleasure and that the trauma of childhood circumcision can last a lifetime. "The psychological side of this debate is not easy to pin down," says Andrew Samuels, professor of analytical psychology at the University of Essex and a psychotherapist. "If it were possible to generalise accurately about the impact of infant circumcision you should be able to research it and find evidence of trauma in the circumcised population. But the research has not been done. So we are in a kind of not-knowing state." But, he says, "it may well be a bigger act, more problematic, more potentially upsetting, not to circumcise in a culture that circumcises. I don't think many Jews, for example, would deny the physical pain [of circumcision] but they might say that not to do it could lead to a psychologically distressing situation in which an uncircumcised boy might be denied a place in the group."

Samuels, who is Jewish, feels it is time for a discussion within Judaism about how central circumcision is to Jewish identity. But he acknowledges that to get a frank discussion will need people to stick their necks out. "Things will change," he says, "but over a fairly long time scale. In 25 years there may be plenty of uncircumcised Jews who will identify as Jews and be accepted as Jews and that won't depend on their being circumcised or not." Others are not so sure. Ritual circumcision stretches back before the origins of Judaism and Islam and is so entrenched in those religions that it will take a lot to shift it. "It can come as a surprise to many how custom and tradition are still powerful forces in liberal, secular societies," says Justin Woodman, a lecturer in anthropology at Birkbeck College, University of London, who specialises in the anthropology of religion. "Circumcision is part of the politics of identity in a diverse and multicultural world. The act of cutting literally makes a line of division."

Exposing The Glans

I liked the Editor's article in issue 1/2008 based on the internet contact. The guy had a particularly beautiful high and tight cut. Providing one is not into risky sex, the retention of the inner skin is ideal in my opinion, and I am only sad that I was not aware of this when I removed my own foreskin. Also, I think that total removal of the frenulum is essential to give tightness to the shaft skin. My recommendation is that a cuff resection circumcision should be done so that no inner skin is lost at all. (The guy in question has certainly lost a little from the tip.)

There was a programme on BBC3 recently about the penis. It ended with an exhibition of photographs of penises. I recorded it and examined the pictures in the exhibition very carefully. I was interested to see one or two nicely cut ones, and many with the skin fully or partly back; but of course the majority were pathetic uncut specimens. Near the end, we caught a bit of a discussion about wanking a cut cock so the subject of circumcision had obviously come up. The presenter had had a mould of his cock made showing a fully exposed well flared glans – obviously the result of a cut as a child. May I suggest that the Acorn Society contact the presenter to persuade him to make a programme discussing the merits and importance of circumcision. At worst he can only say no!

One final thing. I saw an article recently about a remote Indian tribe, the Zo'e, in the Brazilian rainforest. The members of the tribe were naked except that the men had a strap around the penis shaft whose function seemed to be to hold back the foreskin. Even the young boys were wearing these and were sporting fully exposed glans. Has any member heard of this practice before or can they suggest any other purpose the strap might have?

Matt's Story

I am 20 and from the UK. My penis is six inches when soft and nine inches when hard. It has always been big; my parents say it was huge even when I was a baby.

My Dad is Jewish (therefore cut at birth), my Mum isn't. They chose not to have me circumcised as a baby and let me choose for myself. I decided to get myself circumcised four years ago (when I was 16). I decided to have it done not for religious reasons (I've not been brought up Jewish myself) but for appearance and sexual reasons. My foreskin was long and wouldn't stay back even when I had an erection – it kept rolling forwards so I was really glad to get it removed. I had it done before I started having sex. By the time I was 16, I was ready to start and I thought asking a girl to have my foreskin inside her pussy or her mouth was too much to ask.

I'm bi-sexual. I have a regular girlfriend and we have sex several times a week. I have never had intercourse with another guy (and don't get turned on by this) but I have been wanked off by guys and I have wanked them off. I get turned on by guys' dicks, especially if they are like mine (big, thick and circumcised).

I think getting circumcised was a good decision to make and I would recommend it to anyone who is thinking of having it done. The glans is permanently exposed – it gets stimulated by rubbing against clothing all the while which feels great. I can often feel it being stimulated when I'm playing sport or running or even just walking up stairs. I love the feeling that I have no option of rolling skin over the end to protect it and cover it up – it's that exposed feeling I like. It doesn't bother me that being circumcised means I'm in a minority in the UK as most British guys never get their foreskin cut off – I guess only around 10% of guys are circumcised.

I don't have any frenulum left – it was completely removed when I was circumcised. For me the most sensitive part is the helmet (glans) – it is much more sensitive than the skin on my shaft. My glans hasn't lost any sensitivity in the 4 years since I was circumcised. It has maybe got a slightly thicker texture than before but it doesn't affect sensitivity during sex. When I masturbate, I can cum by just stroking the front of my glans.

I don't get why some circumcised men say it reduces the sensitivity. Being circumcised means the glans is permanently exposed and stimulated – increasing the sensitivity. My Dad was circumcised as a baby, and he says his glans is as sensitive now as when he was a kid. The only downside I guess is if you use your foreskin a lot to masturbate then obviously you're not going to feel that anymore – as I'd wanked a lot before I was 16, it did take a few wanks to get used to the difference.

Of course it did take a couple of weeks to heal after having it done – not a lot of pain, just very sore – but it soon healed and now my penis looks as if it never even had a foreskin. My girlfriend says she much prefers the look of a circumcised penis – she has no objections to sucking it and playing with it and she says she can feel the rim of the glans stimulating her during sex. Also, as the shaft skin is now tight it increases the pressure and allows me to keep an erection longer.

When I had a foreskin I used to wash it once or twice every day. A few hours later it nearly always had gone sticky due to smegma. The smegma did indeed have a smell. I cannot speak for every man in the world who has a foreskin but having spoken to other lads about what it's like having a foreskin, they have told me that their glans also goes sticky and smelly due to smegma. Personally, I wasn't keen on the smell. Of course there may be other guys and girls out there who like the smell of smegma on a penis. Each to their own I guess. I certainly don't mean to offend anyone by using the word 'smell'. It is my personal opinion about how my penis used to be before I was circumcised.

I would certainly recommend circumcision. Whenever I have a son, I shall definitely have him circumcised. My brother is 15 and he now wants to be circumcised as well. To be honest it's probably better to have it done as a baby as it heals up quicker. But saying that, after the first couple of days of soreness it soon healed up – just couldn't wank for a couple of weeks. I've more than made up for it since though!!

Of course there are some cut guys who are really pissed off at not having had a choice (cut as babies). I respect their views but in reality I think they are obsessed with the idea of having a foreskin and believe that their sex life would be improved just having a little extra skin at the end of their dick. They get hung up on the thought that maybe the grass is greener for guys who have a foreskin. I can assure guys who were cut at birth that they are not missing out on anything by not having a foreskin. I have fantastic sex and powerful orgasms. Sure, you don't have the option of rolling skin backwards and forwards over your helmet, and my glans is dryer than before, but the feeling of having your helmet permanently exposed more than compensates. I don't get why some circumcised guys want to 'restore' their foreskin. The glans (helmet) is the most sensitive part – why would you want to cover it up?

Nicole Richie Has Circumcised Rules

Nicole Richie will only date circumcised men. The Simple Life star insists it is very important to her that any potential boyfriend has undergone the private procedure – which involves the foreskin being surgically removed from the penis. She said: "The one thing I always look for in a guy is for them to be circumcised."

Teaching Your Sons To Deal With A Fickle Foreskin

[By Dr. Kunio Kitamura, head of the Japan Family Planning Association]

Every second Saturday morning, a group of pre-school boys come into my clinic and, with their parents and brothers and sisters hanging around, the place becomes like a battle zone. They're there to attend a course called Bright Phimosis Treatment Without Surgery, and the place becomes like a virtual meeting place to discuss child raising. Phimosis is the condition where the foreskin can't be fully retracted over the head of the penis, and these little boys are seeking treatment for it without undertaking the common method in Japan of undergoing surgery.

Looking after the course is Dr. Shinya Iwamuro, a urologist who graduated from the same university I did (though a bit after me). Anybody who suddenly came into my waiting room would no doubt hear children's voices coming out of the consultation rooms. Sometimes, those voices might be cries, other times they may be screams at the doctor. For the visitor, they may wonder why. When the kids come out of the waiting room, they have looks of great satisfaction on their faces. "Hey, look at me, I peeled it off," is written on their faces as they look around the waiting room at their buddies. At the same time, the boy next in line to see the doctor is often nervous and can sometimes seem on the verge of breaking into tears. As the clinic is supposed to be for pre-school boys, anyone under 7 can go, and even though these kids are only young, their reactions show a glimpse of the competitive outside world that awaits them.

"What's important is keeping the penis clean. In the old days when everyone went to the public bath, neighbours used to teach kids how to peel back their foreskins, but children nowadays have had that opportunity taken away from them, so it's up to their parents to take the time to show their sons how to keep their penises clean. But so many fathers are caught up in the myths surrounding phimosis surgery they have no idea about what they should be doing to care for their own children's penises. Dr. Iwamuro is one of the rare physicians in Japan who has consistently argued that surgery is not necessary in dealing with phimosis. The message he has constantly preached to junior high and high school boys across the years is: "If the foreskin completely covers the head, it's phimosis, but if you can pull it back, you're OK. If you can pull it back, wash it, then put it back in again."

Most Japanese men still have a foreskin covering the head of their penis. It's not like there is an inordinately large number of Japanese with phimosis, but because circumcision is common soon after birth among followers of religions such as Christianity and Islam, men who've undergone this process appear to have avoided the problem of phimosis. So it's out of the question to consider phimosis to be a bad thing. And that has given the opportunity for loads of cosmetic surgeons to pop up in the media offering to perform surgery on boys to "cure phimosis and let you get back your chance at a bright and cheerful youth".

"With full body anaesthesia making surgery safer, there's a trend to push for phimosis surgery. But I have stubbornly insisted that surgery is unnecessary.

Finally, the number of doctors who think along the same lines as myself and disagree with phimosis surgery has increased to become a majority," Dr. Iwamuro says.

So let's hear Dr. Iwamuro's advice on how little boys can learn how to retract their foreskins. There are three main points involved in pulling it back. They are:

SLOWLY peel back the foreskin, little by little as long as it doesn't hurt and even if you touch the glans;

WHEN changing a young boy's diapers, gently retract the foreskin and wash the penis head; and,

ENCOURAGE boys old enough to use the toilet by themselves that once they have pulled back their foreskin and had a pee, they should make sure after wiping that they put the head of their penis back in the position it was.

The reason why the foreskin can't be retracted is because of such things as the gap at the end of the foreskin being too small (if you gradually force the glans forward, the foreskin opening will also widen) or the head of the penis is stuck to the foreskin. In the latter case in particular, it is necessary to have the foreskin surgically separated at a medical clinic. It's not such a difficult procedure, involving only the separation of skin that's stuck together. It's a medical procedure the government recognizes. And, of course, the boy with the problem or his parents can always do it themselves.

In a large majority of phimosis cases, the solution can often be enough to have a father take the time to help his son. But if they are worried about pulling back their foreskins, they can always come to my clinic for a consultation. Of course, they will have to be a pre-schooler to be able to take part in the program.

I Hate Being Circumcised

I'm 24 and I was circumcised in November 2007. I suffered with a tight foreskin for several years which was causing me pain during sex. The doctor recommended I have it removed. He told me I only needed the tip removing where it was tight.

On the day of my circumcision, I saw the surgeon beforehand and he told me it is usual to remove the entire foreskin not just the tip to reduce the chance of infection after the operation. So he removed all my foreskin. The big problem I've got now is that there is no sensitive skin left. The skin from my shaft was pulled right down and stitched just behind the head of my dick. From reading about circumcision styles I think this is called a low and tight cut. It is tight but I don't think it's too tight as it's not painful when I get an erection.

My glans has lost feeling in it over the last few weeks. In the first couple of weeks after my circumcision it was very sensitive and I had no problems the first few times I had sex (I had to wait until it healed before having sex). It felt different than before but I enjoyed it and got off ok. A few weeks later and the texture of my glans toughened up. It's now rough and leathery and isn't giving me pleasure during sex. It's as though it's gone almost numb and has lost its sensitivity. My doctor says it's normal for this to happen. I've tried using lube but it doesn't make any difference. I get an erection easily but it's as if I haven't got enough feeling to get off, either when I have sex or have a wank.

I constantly get the feeling my glans needs to be covered up but I have no skin left to roll down over it. It's constantly chafing in underwear. I usually wear boxers but after being circumcised I found my penis was moving around a lot and wondered if this was desensitising my glans. I've changed to wearing a jockstrap and although this stops my penis from moving, my glans is constantly touching the material and it's turned a sort of greyish colour as a result. Again my doctor says this is common.

For other guys who were circumcised as adults, have you also found a similar thing and what the hell can I do to get the feeling back in the head of my dick? I know some guys try foreskin restoration but this can take months or years and to be honest I don't think I've got enough skin left to try this. I'm perfectly happy with the way my dick looks. I've got a scar just behind the head of my dick but it is gradually fading and know it will fade more given time. It's the loss of feeling I cannot get used to. It's affecting me during sex in that I cannot get off. It's so frustrating. I have sex most days but I'm not getting a sexual release. I HATE being circumcised.

Call For More NHS Circumcisions To Cut HIV Rate

[By Emma Wilkinson from Pulse]

Men recently emigrated from countries with HIV epidemics, like sub-Saharan Africa, should be offered circumcision on the NHS, says a leading public health expert. He has also called for a UK trial to assess circumcision for HIV prevention in men who have sex with men.

Professor Harold Jaffe is head of the department of public health at the University of Oxford and was previously director of the US National Centre for HIV, STD, and TB Prevention. His warnings in Sexually Transmitted Infections, come after the World Health Organisation recommended scaling up access to male circumcision services in areas of the world with high prevalence, generalised heterosexual HIV epidemics. Three African trials have shown that circumcision halved the rate of HIV infection in heterosexual men.

Professor Jaffe said current UK practice was to discourage the procedure in adults but NHS bodies needed to re-examine their policies. He added that the yearly number of new UK HIV diagnoses had increased by 157% since 1997 and of the new diagnoses reported in 2006, 12% were in black African men and 36% were in men who have sex with men. 'New prevention strategies for these groups are urgently needed', he said. 'The UK has the opportunity to lead in revising its male circumcision guidelines in accordance with new African data and to develop data upon which to consider new circumcision strategies for men who have sex with men.'

Only 16% of UK men aged 16 to 44 have been circumcised. An estimated 30,000 circumcisions are carried out in England each year. A recent study of gay US men suggested more than half would be willing to be circumcised to reduce their risk of HIV infection

But Professor Jaffe's comments were dismissed by Dr Colm O'Mahony, past president of the British Association for Sexual Health and HIV and Consultant in Genito-Urological Medicine at the Countess of Chester Foundation Trust Hospital. He said: 'Anything that runs the risk of diluting the message that unprotected sex causes HIV infection is unhelpful to say the least. And data released last month suggests circumcision has no effect at all on male-to-female transmission.'

Dr Richard Ma, north London GP and member of the RCGP sex, drugs and HIV working party said: 'I don't think this will work in the UK. It's difficult to see how merely circumcising men who want to be circumcised is going to make any impact on HIV rates in this country – which are still relatively small.'

Thoughts On Retraction From Circlist

An Asian acquaintance told me that he retracted his foreskin just once – about Age 12 – and that's where it stayed ever since. To him that's just the natural thing to do...

For all practical purposes it's just the same as a fairly loose circumcision. As for the age at which to do it – my friend did it as soon as he could retract his foreskin. The key thing is to do it before puberty, since then the penis will grow but the skin won't, so it will never cover the knob again.

James

My brother, cousin and I, and others we have met or heard about later on, did the same thing. But some of us think it would be better to start earlier, just as soon as the foreskin is readily retractable.

Mothers, if for whatever reason you are going to delay or avoid circumcision for your son, consider this cost-less, painless and totally reversible alternative which provides all of the same benefits. Do him an important favor and help him get his foreskin pulled back off the penis head at the earliest possible age.

Charles II

Ibelieve the key to a clean dick, in addition to general good personal hygiene, is not pissing through your hood. I recall retracting my foreskin to take a leak as a young pre-pubertal boy. I went through puberty around 11½ years old, and it was shortly after that I began peeling my skin back off the knob and LEAVING it back (so eventually it will stay back virtually all of the time), as I believe my dad did. I do remember him either telling me, or overhearing him say, that cut men got more sex or better sex than many uncut guys. I would believe that they DO get more head – after all, a woman (or man) going down on a guy can see what they're getting, and with fewer surprises, than with a lot of uncut dicks!

Allowing the foreskin to grow ALONG WITH the dick lets you use it for sex and for j/o, which I think is probably the ONLY advantage and benefit of being uncut. Also using it REGULARLY when you do start wearing it folded back behind the rim of the knob, as in jacking off several times a day (which I did in my adolescence), keeps the 'skin in shape, so there's enough there to be of benefit. The stretching of the foreskin over the expanded hard knob of an erection is one of the best sexual sensations a man can have, although I think cut guys develop their own set of erotic moves, so I don't think most of them suffer in any significant way the loss of their hoods. I also think uncovered (and/or circumcised) adolescent and adult dickheads get bigger and wider than dicks that are constantly hooded by a tight foreskin.

The more attention a male pays to his genitals, beginning at a young age, the better things will be. A boy doesn't need to be taught to j/o, but he should not be discouraged from enjoying it unless the venue is very inappropriate. This applies to both cavaliers and roundheads.

Afghanistan

[From AWAC – Afghanistan Without A Clue, a US airforce blog by Captain Doug Traversa]

Hamid also wondered if I knew about the ceremony when a young man's (he points to his lap) is cut.

"Yes, that's circumcision," I said.

Hamid continued to make sure. "That is where some of his extra meat is cut off?"

I burst out laughing. "We wouldn't put it that way. The foreskin is cut off."

Yes, do you do this in America?"

Well, what do you know? There is actually something both countries do have in common. "Many boys are circumcised in America; however, it is becoming less popular recently, though I would say most boys do still get circumcised."

Why do they get circumcised?" he asked.

"Some for religious reasons, some for health reasons, and some just because they think it makes their boy look 'normal.' Why do you do it?"

"It is our religion."

"Yes, but what is the purpose, according to the Qu'ran?" I asked again.

"It is for cleanliness," Hamid replied.

"I think this is the first time we've found something so similar in both our cultures," I observed. "This is an historic occasion."

And as an additional bit of info, they circumcise up to age three. Ouch.

The Knife Man

[Tales from the Emergency Department; in which a man who wallows in nostalgia, and secretly wishes he were a Victorian Knife Man rants about his work and what passes for a life.]

My last patient was a painful one. He admirably demonstrated the 'all mouth no trousers' phenomenon, however. He was wheeled into the Department, covered in blood, laughing and shouting. Waving his blood stained hands about he was shouting, mostly at the female staff:

"Darlin'! Oi! Darlin'! Guess what I done! Go on! Guess!" **Guffaw**

"Nah, I ain't tellin' ya! You don't even wanna know what I done, innit!"

What had he done? Torn his frenulum. This, for those not in the know, is the piece of skin on the underside of the glans penis, attaching it to the foreskin. It is essentially identical to the frenulum in the mouth attaching upper lip to gum. Sometime referred to as the 'banjo string'.

I'll leave it to your imagination how he said he did it. Tearing it is quite painful, and bleeds. A lot.. I should know.

His brash, loud exterior changed when I explained what we needed to do. The sentence contained the words 'needle', 'injection', 'penis' and 'stitch' in various order. Also 'local anaesthetic' and 'sting quite a bit'. It wasn't a warm, fuzzy sentence. No champagne and strawbobs here, either.

The repair was a breeze and, re-assured that he hadn't left too much of his blood behind in his bedroom, we sent him packing. On a no-sex embargo. I half expect to see him back before the week is out...

My Freakish Willy Is A Nightmare

[by Joan Burnie, Daily Record, Scotland]

Q. I am circumcised. It was done when I was a baby so I was never asked whether I wanted it done. I don't like it. I feel like a freak and I really don't think people should be allowed to do this to their kids. My dad says it's cleaner, but it's ugly. I hide in the changing rooms after swimming because I know everyone will laugh if they see it. Can I get it put back to normal? I'm 13.

A. You haven't said whether you were circumcised for health or possibly religious reasons. Either way, there is nothing freakish about it – not when there are millions of men around the globe who have had it done. I bet there are even a fair number in your school as well. Believe me, you won't be the only one. However, when you are quite a bit older and have stopped growing, you do have the absolute right to find out whether it is possible to have the operation reversed.

Members may recall the news story early in June of detectives raiding three safe deposit centres in London and finding vast treasure stacked away, much of it the result of illegal activity. One of the premises involved was the Hampstead Safe Deposit Vaults, which houses the Acorn post box. For almost a week, our post box was inaccessible, guarded by armed police. Unfortunately, when I did at last regain access, no treasures had found their way to the Acorn address. But I am assured that normal service has now been resumed. So, some letters from members to celebrate the fact would be welcome.

One of the features in this issue is an extract from Corsair by Tim Severin. This is a fairly graphic fictional account of the circumcision of two converts to Islam. I think we all get a frisson when we suddenly find mentions of circumcision in our reading. So, when you do come across such incidents, please do let me know – either a reference to the book and page, or ideally a photocopy. Then we can all share the pleasure.

Too little or too much?

Channel 4 has recently been broadcasting a series under the banner Embarrassing illnesses. Each programme focused on a different set of medical issues and patients, allegedly too shy to go to their own doctor, were nevertheless willing to bare all, often literally, before several million viewers. Unfortunately, I missed the last programme in the series which focused on men's problems. But the supporting website (<http://www.channel4embarrassingillnesses.com/video/consultations>) has a number of short 2 or 3 minute video clips that show patients undergoing diagnosis and treatment.

One such video that caught my eye was Adult second circumcision. I was intrigued. Second circumcisions tend to be a niche market for men who want to improve their penile aesthetics. I hardly expected the topic to appear in the medical mainstream. The patient was a rather jolly bearded gentleman in his late fifties or early sixties. He told the doctor that he had had a circumcision about ten years before to relieve a tight, painful foreskin. However, he was now suffering rashes and irritation on the glans. We were shown the offending organ and the skin of the glans did indeed look very red, scaly and sore. What we also saw was a substantial amount of foreskin – had this guy really been circumcised? The doctor diagnosed balanitis xerotica obliterans and, amazingly, a tight foreskin. Even after a circumcision, a phimotic foreskin remained which could not be fully retracted. Hence the inability of the patient to keep the area dry and clean and the resulting balanitis. The doctor recommended a second circumcision which the patient duly underwent. Three weeks later, the patient returned to the doctor for a check up. Both declared themselves well pleased with the result. Nevertheless, it was apparent that the guy was still not fully circumcised. There was still sufficient foreskin remaining to cover the lower third of the glans.

This raises the question – just how much foreskin should be removed during a circumcision? It is a subject on which the text books are surprisingly quiet. Surgical techniques are described but the degree to which the foreskin should be fully or only partially removed is rarely addressed. The circumcision chat lists discuss in painful detail the perceived advantages of high/low, tight/loose cuts. But this is a foreign language to most mainstream surgeons. Indeed, many patients referred for medical circumcision who attempt to discuss such matters with the surgeon are met with a blank wall of incomprehension. Even where the surgeon appears to listen, very often the patient wakes up to find that he has received the surgeon's standard cut and his wishes have been ignored.

Medical and religious circumcision are different. For Jews and Moslems, it is important that the male should bear a demonstrable sign of having undergone circumcision. It is necessary therefore for the glans to be fully exposed even when the penis is flaccid. The motivation for medical circumcision is different – there is a medical problem which has to be cured. Surgeons are by nature conservative. Because their trade is by nature invasive, they are trained to curb that invasiveness to the minimum required to solve the problem. The surgeon may well approach circumcision with the intention of removing only the amount of foreskin required to relieve the condition. Unfortunately, this approach as far as circumcision is concerned may not be the best.

Medical circumcision is usually carried out to alleviate one of two conditions – phimosis or balanitis. Phimosis is the condition where the foreskin cannot be drawn back to uncover the glans completely. A variation is that the foreskin may be retractable when the penis is flaccid but not when erect. This condition is quite dangerous, since the foreskin may retract during erection but get caught behind the glans. It then forms a tight band in the sulcus and starts to strangulate the glans – a condition called paraphimosis. Phimosis is generally caused by the opening of the foreskin being too narrow. The surgeon may consider that if he removes the end of the foreskin, this will relieve the condition whilst still leaving the patient with sufficient foreskin to cover his glans – a partial circumcision. However, this approach fails to recognise that foreskins vary in shape. Some foreskins are short and loose, perhaps not even covering the glans. Some foreskins are long, extending well beyond the glans yet sufficiently loose to be fully retractable. The problematic foreskin is the one which tends to follow closely the contour of the glans. In such a situation, the phimosis extends the length of the foreskin. If the top half is removed, the bottom half is still too narrow to go over the crown of the glans; the phimosis persists.

Two other factors can come into play. First, any operation can cause residual scar tissue. Circumcision can cause a slight reduction of skin elasticity at the point of the scar. Such scarring can therefore exacerbate any residual phimosis. Second, if circumcision is carried out pre-puberty, the boy's penis will be thin and undeveloped. During puberty, the glans will grow and thicken. If a childhood circumcision has left sufficient foreskin to cover the glans, the glans may well outgrow the foreskin opening, thus causing a recurrence of the original phimosis. In cases of circumcision to cure phimosis, therefore, the surgeon is well advised to perform a complete circumcision by removing the whole foreskin so that the glans is permanently exposed.

Balanitis is an irritation and soreness of the foreskin and glans. The bacteria and thrush that cause this condition thrive in the damp conditions that exist under the foreskin. Usually, complete removal of the foreskin means that the whole area can be kept clean and dry, and a cure is almost certain. But a conservative cut that leaves sufficient foreskin to cover the glans, even if only partially, means that the potential for dampness and harbouring of bacteria remains. Again, the complete removal of the foreskin is the solution.

Is it possible to remove too much skin? Obviously, yes. If one takes the extreme where most of the shaft skin is excised, there will certainly be insufficient skin left to accommodate the penis. Erection will be difficult and painful, with skin being pulled up from the pubis and scrotum and with the danger of the skin tearing. But no surgeon will go to such extremes. In normal circumstances, there is sufficient elasticity in the skin to accommodate an erection, even if there is no apparent surplus skin when the penis is flaccid. In practice, a circumcision so tight as to cause problems is rare.

So how does the surgeon decide how much skin to excise? Many surgeons appear to work by eye. Such an approximate way of working means that a margin of error has to be built in so that a loose cut is almost certain to result. It is much better if the surgeon undertakes a simple measuring exercise and marks the places to cut accordingly. Suppose that a complete circumcision is required leaving one inch of inner foreskin. During the prep for the operation, the surgeon stretches the foreskin down the shaft of the penis, measures one inch down the shaft from the sulcus (the ridge under the rim of the glans) and marks the foreskin. He then stretches the foreskin up the shaft and marks the shaft skin at a point one inch down from the sulcus. This gives the two extremities for the operation and the surgeon removes the skin lying between the two marks. If a slightly tighter result is required, the surgeon can cut slightly outside the two marks thus removing slightly more skin than the original measure suggested and putting the remaining skin on a slight tension. If a slightly looser result is desired, the surgeon can cut slightly within the two marks.

No article about the circumcision operation is complete without mention of the frenulum. A short or tight frenulum (frenulum breve) can itself be a reason for circumcision although these days frenuloplasty without full circumcision seems to be more popular. The function of the frenulum is to replace the foreskin over the glans during detumescence. Once the foreskin is removed, the frenulum serves no useful purpose. There is the possibility that, if the frenulum is left, the removal of the foreskin and the consequent tightening of the shaft skin will put tension on the remaining frenulum, in effect causing frenulum breve. Leaving the frenulum can also cause skin bunching on the underside of the glans which can be aesthetically displeasing. It is probably best therefore if the frenulum is trimmed back or preferably excised completely during a circumcision.

So, to answer the question posed by the title. The removal of too little skin is a greater danger than the removal of too much. Anyone seeking circumcision for themselves or their sons should make their wishes explicit. It is little use using vocabulary such as high/low, loose/tight. Rather, ask for a complete circumcision that leaves the glans completely uncovered. Better still, find a surgeon who understands the purposes and aesthetics of circumcision. In that way a result both aesthetically pleasing and medically satisfactory is more likely to result.

A Matter Of Technique

When I was cut, very ably, by Dr Zarifa, he explained that sex would be just as good, but different. Being cut needs different techniques, but, in my opinion, is much better.

One pleasure in the weeks after I was cut was to feel my cock head drying out. I lost the oversensitivity I had had with my overlong and very loose foreskin. Now when I am limp I have no sensations, but when I am even slightly erect I have intense pleasure. This means that the lead up to any sort of sex is much more powerful than it was before. The whole of my glans is now more sensitive, particularly where the frenulum was removed. In addition the edge of the head has flared a little and now gives great pleasure. As importantly, because I was cut high and tight, the shaft skin is also very sensitive when I am hard.

Before I was cut, I used to haul my foreskin back and work only on the head. Now I can stimulate my whole cock and the results are good. I can choose which bit of my cock to stimulate, and this changes not only from time to time, but also during each experience: one part will become over stimulated as another gains sensitivity. Penetrative sex is also more relaxing – condoms don't slip off any more!

To use lube or not to use lube? To use lube gives me much more immediate thrills, a dry hand gives gentler sensations. Both ways give intense orgasms which spread all down my lower body, where before it was a localised thrill round my cock.

A Family Tradition

As I was born in 1931 into a middle class family (my father was a solicitor), it is hardly surprising that I was circumcised as a baby. I have never had a problem with this – to me it seems a neat and hygienic solution. The majority of my contemporaries at Grammar School were also circumcised, as were my fellow officers when I had a short term commission during National Service.

So it was natural when my son James was born in 1959 that I asked the GP about circumcision. I was told that this was unnecessary and old-fashioned. The foreskin could be left to look after itself. I was disappointed but accepted the advice at face value. Not so my father. He was outraged by my doctor's attitude. His father had been circumcised, he was circumcised, I was circumcised, his grandson should also be circumcised. Even though I had sympathy with his point of view, I didn't see any way forward and, to end a heated discussion, I threw out the challenge: "OK, if it is so important, you find a doctor to do it."

I thought that this would be the last of the matter. But two weeks later my father telephoned to say that he had located a Jewish doctor in North West London who was experienced in circumcision and who was willing to treat Gentile babies. So a few days later, James was driven to the doctor's surgery and the deed was done. It really was a non-event. He whimpered a bit but soon settled down and within a few days he was healed. When his brother Stuart was born three years later, he made the same journey.

Fast forward thirty years and my first grandson, Sean, was born (to Stuart; James has given me two delightful granddaughters). I had the same conversation with Stuart as my father had had with me thirty years previously. But there was no moving Stuart. He saw no reason for circumcision and would not discuss the subject in any rational way. So Sean retained his foreskin.

It was ironic therefore that, when Sean was ten, that foreskin proved to be tight. Creams and stretching were tried but eventually the boy was referred for circumcision. Resisting any temptation to say: "I told you so", I offered to arrange for the op to be done privately. I also suggested that the surgeon check out Sean's younger brother, Toby, now seven years old. Toby was found to have a marginally tight foreskin and in the end it was decided that they should both have the op together. It was done at the beginning of the Easter holidays which has led to a few family in-jokes every Easter about shelling Easter eggs.

I have since discussed their status with the boys and both declare themselves 'cool' with being circumcised. Their attitude was helped when a school friend of Sean's had to be circumcised at the age of sixteen, much to his acute embarrassment and his friends' ribald amusement. I think both Sean and Toby realised that they could have been in the same situation. Both have declared their intent, when they have sons, to have them circumcised as babies. I may not be around to see it, but I hope that they keep to their word. After all, with the last five generations of males all circumcised, it is now a family tradition.

Experiences

I had an early obsession with circumcision. Indexes in medical books, in anthropology books, etc., were the first thing I looked at under the 'c'. If I had the money I usually bought the book whatever it was on. I learnt a lot about all sorts of things because I eventually read the whole book just because it had an entry on 'circumcision'.

Gyms, locker rooms, restrooms anywhere I could get a sighting I did; and I, from an early age, developed the precociousness to ask outright: "So, are you circumcised?" Some of my sister's boyfriends actually got offended by the question, but they soon learnt that if they weren't cut, there would not be second date with her. She wasn't obsessed, just not interested in a guy with a foreskin; eventually she had three daughters, so she wasn't able to pass on the family tradition.

I am RIC, and very happy with that. My glans is wider than the shaft and a traditional acorn shape. I know a couple of guys with severe phimosis (they're Irish and refuse even to discuss circumcision... sad) and their glans are tiny, stunted things trapped inside a tight foreskin. I am sure with a circumcision that would change, but who knows.

Also for me the aesthetic is the thing: a finely cut penis is a delight to behold (and hold). High and tight, low and loose and everything in between, just so long as the foreskin is gone. I didn't have the choice (parents are supposed to make good choices for their kids, and mine did in lots of other ways as well as circumcising me), but it seems to me that if a grown adult in full control of his faculties decides to have his foreskin removed just because he thinks it would look better then let him get it done.

Investigating The Difference

I became aware of circumcision at a young age, probably 4 or 5, from seeing my totally circumcised dad. He always went nude for a bit when getting ready for bed, so I had ample opportunity to observe it. Even at that age, I wished that my penis looked like his. He had a circumcision that left him no loose skin at all when soft. I suspect that he was circumcised as an adult and didn't like it. Thus my uncircumcised state.

Growing up, I not only knew which of my friends had been circ'ed and who hadn't, I knew exactly what type of circumcision they had. When I was 12 or so, I would ask my friends about being circ'ed and what it felt like to have their dick head out all the time. Most had no idea what I was talking about. I asked one friend this question and he didn't seem to have any interest or knowledge on the subject. Then one day we were urinating together and I pulled my skin back. Naturally we were checking out each other's cocks. His eyes about popped out of his head and he asked how I made my dick change like that. He had never known that guys with dicks like mine had a head like his hidden under loose skin. There we were, standing there holding our dicks, me with mine skinned back. I said: "Now our cocks look alike." Then I slid my foreskin up to touch the rim and ask him if he could do that. He was very tightly circumcised and was barely able to do it. Then, I let my foreskin roll over the rim just a bit and again asked if he could do that. At first he couldn't, then he wrapped his fist around the shaft so he could get a really firm grip on it and was able to roll a bit of skin over his corona. Then I pulled my ample skin over the glans and left it there. He pulled on his but to no avail. By then we were fully hard and he could no longer pull up enough to touch the rim, even when he wrapped his fist around it. The sight of a circumcised man trying to pull up some skin is still highly erotic for me.

After that we progressed to touching and checking out each other's equipment. I think he was as envious of my skin as I was of his ultra tight circumcision. I explained to him what circumcision was and he refused to believe that his parents would have that done to him. I replied that he must have a scar where they cut him. He admitted that he had noticed the brown ring and skin colour change on some guys. I even found a magnifying glass and examined his shaft, but he had no sign of a scar or skin colour change. I wanted him to ask his parents if he had been circumcised or not, but he wouldn't do it. To this day I wonder if he was circ'ed or was one of those rare guys born without a foreskin.

There was another kid I saw in the showers who didn't have a glans. His penis ended in a square blunt end with a round hole in the middle of it. The shaft skin just broke over the square edge of the blunt end of the shaft but didn't cover it. There was no doubt that he had somehow lost his glans. I finally got up nerve enough to ask him what had happened to the end of his dick. He told me that it had happened when he was circumcised as a baby. He had lost his glans and all of his inner skin but was still able to masturbate. The blunt end of his penis stump had become sensitive enough to allow him to orgasm when he rubbed it with a finger. I have never forgotten the sight of his truncated cock and have wondered how it worked for sex.

Condoms Usage And Foreskin

Condoms are tricky enough to put on with most couples getting caught up in the 'which way does it unroll?' dilemma. Now, add the dilemma of foreskin for good measure and you may be in a whole new realm of frustration. Looking at some condom forums and reading what uncircumcised men are venting about when it comes to slipping on condoms may make circumcised men count their blessings. The most common complaints seem to revolve around the condom 'bunching up' and/or slipping off. There was even a complaint about 'poking through' that I thought might need an entire essay to devote to.

Basic condom instructions for the uncircumcised man go something along the lines of this: pull back the foreskin, place the condom on the tip, pinch the very tip of the condom to squeeze out any excess air (and to leave a reservoir for the semen to accumulate) and unroll the condom until it reaches the base of the erect penis. Essentially, the only difference between a circumcised man and an uncircumcised man is the pulling back of the foreskin before unrolling the condom onto the penis. In theory, this is the way it should work, and maybe for most uncircumcised men it works just fine. However, if you are an uncircumcised man who is still having problems with condoms, read on for some helpful tips.

Once the condom is outside of the package and before you begin any rolling on, put a tiny drop of lubrication (always use water-based when using condoms) in the tip. This should work wonders when slipping the condom onto the shaft. This may also serve to make you more sensitive to the experience. As the condom instructions say, pull back the foreskin before slipping the condom on. Unroll the condom until it reaches the base of the shaft (do not forget to pinch the tip). Keeping the base steady, gently push on the foreskin until it is once again at the tip. This will allow the foreskin to have more 'breathing room' during sex. Putting a little water-based lubrication on the outside of the condom should also help with friction issues.

Some uncircumcised men who deal with the 'bunching up' of the condom swear by buying condoms that are a bit longer than actually needed. This allows some extra give on the condom so that the condom will be snug around the base and still have enough to work with to pull over the foreskin. Similarly, condoms with a large reservoir tip can also help. Test out different sizes and different types of condoms to find one which fits comfortably and suits both you and your partner.

Be patient. It may get frustrating if you are not wearing a condom that is comfortable. In the heat of the moment, you may be tempted to go ahead and have sex without a condom. After all, it's only once, right? Wrong. Condoms are still the number one line of defence against unwanted pregnancy and many sexually transmitted diseases. Recent studies have also indicated that uncircumcised men are twice as likely to get HIV from infected partners than their circumcised counterparts. As a rule, always practise safe sex.

Intermarriage, Conversion And Circumcision

by Rabbi Azriel Schreiber, [jewishanswers.org]

Question: My partner and I have been seeing each other for two and a half years now, and have recently been talking about marriage. I am Jewish (as are both of my parents), but he has no particular faith (although he says that he understands and respects Judaism more than any other religion). I would like to marry him, but only in a synagogue. He is happy to convert to Judaism apart from one thing – he is 41 years old, and the prospect of a circumcision at his age is daunting to say the least. Is there anyway that he could convert and be married in a synagogue without first being circumcised? Please help, I want to bring my children up in a full Jewish household, but you love who you love...

Answer: You are clearly an intelligent person, in love with a special person, and looking for a 'way out' to obvious difficulties. I think your last line is really the beginning. You wrote: "I want to bring my children up in a full Jewish household, but you love who you love..."

Experience, as well as the overwhelming evidence of studies, have shown that you are right – one needs a full Jewish home to keep families Jewish. It is also crucial to the long term closeness of the couple. Converts are full Jews, but they must be sincere converts. If you were out of the picture, would he still want to convert? That is a good indication of sincerity. Know that conversion is a serious thing.

Furthermore, it is crucial that your husband knows inside that he is a full Jew, and that your kids know their father is fully Jewish. Circumcision is central to Jewish law and to a male's Jewish identity. He'll never be part of the people without it. That being said, tens of thousands of adult men have gone through it. He should speak with other converts, as well as a mohel who performs adult circumcisions, to calm his fears.

A Tale From The Emergency Room

Here is yet another consequence of drinking to excess. One night stands can have many consequences that I guess don't seem like a big deal at the time – diseases, pregnancy, getting robbed, embarrassment, etc. One that many men might not think of is potentially serious but only applies to those men who are not circumcised. I am referring to the necessity of returning one's foreskin back in place after intercourse.

I had a young man come in one Sunday afternoon in severe pain. He did not tell the triage nurse the whole story since I am sure he was embarrassed. She thought he looked like he was having a kidney stone and sent him in. I asked what had happened and he told me his tale of woe. The night before in an intoxicated state of mind, he decided to hook up with someone he met at a bar. Their night was eventful for the fact that he hit a home run. Unfortunately, after his two minutes of bliss, he failed to return his foreskin back to its proper resting place. When he awoke in the morning he was in severe pain – I am sure made worse by the hangover. He said his penis was very swollen and he could not get the foreskin replaced (called a paraphimosis). When I looked, it was grim. I have seen these cases before but they are either in elderly demented nursing home patients where someone forgets to replace the foreskin after they put in a foley, or are in young men who come in within a few hours of the onset of the problem. He waited about 12+ hours. By now, it was so oedematous that every technique I tried failed. I packed the penis in ice to reduce swelling, but even using both hands I still could not get the glans back inside. It looked terrible and was starting to get a bit cyanotic.

I called the urologist who also failed in doing it at the bedside. Meanwhile this guy was miserable – he got plenty of dilaudid but still looked like we were performing a civil war-style amputation on him! Anyway, eventually the urologist bit the bullet and performed a dorsal slit procedure. This required a particularly painful-appearing penile block for anaesthesia. I bet this guy was thinking as he left the dept, “I should never have had that 12th Corona!!!”

A Military Experience

A friend of mine has an uncle in an old people's home near where I live. He usually goes to see his uncle every week but he was going abroad on business for a couple of weeks so I offered to visit instead. The uncle is crippled with arthritis but still has all his mental faculties. He was reminiscing about his time in Korea when he was doing National Service in the army. I asked whether it was true that the military required soldiers to be circumcised before they went overseas. This is what he told me.

*****

Lots of the soldiers I served with still had their skins so there was no compulsory circumcision. But I lost my skin when I joined up.

In those days, all boys had to do two years National Service in the forces unless they were medically unfit. A few months before you were 18, you had to go for an army medical. It was the usual thing – eyes, ears, chest and then you had to stand in front of the doc and pull your pants down whilst he felt your balls and examined your cock. He wrote something on my form and after I was dressed, a few of us were told to wait and see the doc. I thought perhaps I was going to be declared unfit and I started to worry I had some bad illness. But when I saw the doc, he said I had a tight foreskin and needed circumcising. He said it could be done before I joined up or could wait until I was in the army. He advised me to have it done before – I'd have more time to recover and my mates wouldn't have the chance to mock me. So I said yes to having it done before.

I didn't really know what the doc was talking about so when I got home, I went straight down the library and got out a medical book. When I realised what they were going to do to my cock, I wasn't very happy, but there was nothing I could do about it.

I got a letter telling me to report to a military hospital a few weeks ahead and on the day I travelled there by train. I had to get there in the afternoon and the op would be the next day. There were nine of us in the ward, all there for the snip. The corporal nurse was a bit brutal, winding us up, telling us to have a good wank that night, because Major Pattern who would do the op wouldn't leave us any spare skin to play with and he'd take our love string as well. We asked the nurse whether he was circumcised himself and he said, no thanks, he was happy with his skin, thank you very much.

The next morning, a corporal nurse came round with shaving bowl and cut throat razor to shave our pubes and balls. It was a bit scary having cold steel so near the crown jewels – one slip and the marriage tackle would be gone. But he knew his job and we all soon looked just like plucked chickens down there. Then we put on gowns and were taken off to the theatre. It was done under a general so all I remember is a needle being stuck in my arm and then being woken up. Back in the ward, I wanted to check what had happened but my dick was covered in bandages. We stayed in hospital for four days altogether. On the third day, the dressings were replaced so I saw my new dick for the first time. It was horrible – bruised and swollen and bloody. I thought I'd been ruined for life.

After ten days, I had to go to the local hospital to have the stitches taken out. My dick still looked fairly awful and taking out the stitches was painful. And then I had to get used to my dick head being uncovered. I felt it every time I moved and it got so sore, I wished I had my skin back to cover it. But gradually it settled down, and my dick healed, so I could see what it was going to look like in future. The corporal was right. The major took all the spare skin and there was just a groove where my banjo string had been. But I soon found a new way to beat off and it was nicer because I could get at the dickhead. I've got a long dick with a large dickhead so losing my skin really makes my dickhead stand out. I used to get lots of admiring looks and there were no complaints about performance!

When we were in Korea, some of my mates had itchy skins and were very uncomfortable. At least I didn't have that trouble. If I hadn't been circumcised when I was, I would probably have needed it later, when I started having sex. So I wasn't very happy at the time, but later I was glad it was done when it was.

Circumcision In Literature

[from Corsair by Tim Severin]

Dan and Hector have been seized by Barbary corsairs and sold into slavery in Algiers. To escape the horrors of the slave barracks, the two friends convert to Islam.

*****

"I hope that the abdal has a steady hand and a sharp razor," said Dan on the morning that he and Hector were due to profess Islam. The two friends were at Turgut's mansion preparing for the ceremony the captain had called their sunnet. They had already paid a visit to one of Algiers's public bath houses and were putting on new white cotton gowns.

"Judging by the number of slaves from the bagnio who converted to Islam, the abdal must have plenty of practice in removing that piece of skin," said Hector, trying to sound more confident than he was feeling. "I'll be glad when it's over. It will put an end to all the jokes about being too sore to walk straight."

"...or make love again," added Dan.

"I wouldn't know," confessed Hector. "I've never been with a woman properly. Just had one or two encounters with village girls, but always brief and they never meant anything."

Together the two friends made their way to the mansion's central courtyard where a small group of the other servants were waiting for them. Spread on the ground was a large carpet, on which stood jugs of flavoured drinks and trays of food. Hector's tutor in calligraphy had already arrived and Hector caught a glimpse of the abdal, the specialist who would perform the circumcision, as he disappeared into a side room with his bag of surgical tools.

Moments later the captain himself appeared. He seated himself at one end of the carpet and invited his two colleagues to sit beside him with the abdal next to them. Dan and Hector were to be seated directly opposite. When his guests had eaten their fill and the trays had been cleared away, the captain beckoned Dan to come forward. He stepped into the centre of the carpet and stood facing his master. Turgut asked him formally, "Is it your wish to acknowledge the true faith?"

"It is, effendi."

"Then raise your finger and pronounce the shahadah loudly and clearly so that all may hear."

Obediently Dan did as he was told, and recited the words, "There is no god but God and Muhammad is the messenger of God." To murmurs of approval, the valet then escorted Dan away to the side room, even as the abdal quietly left his place and followed.

Next it was Hector's turn. Rising to his feet, he stepped into the centre of the carpet, and at the captain's prompting held up his finger and repeated the words of the shahadah, as Dan had done. Then to everyone's surprise, Turgut stepped forward and gave Hector a formal embrace. As he did so, he whispered in his ear, "Don't worry. It happens at once and is a wonderful thing as Allah has wished. Praise be to God." Then he stepped back, as his valet led away Hector for his circumcision.

To his alarm, Hector could not see Dan anywhere when he was ushered into the side room where the abdal stood waiting beside a low bed. The only other furniture in the room was a sturdy stool. "Do not be afraid," said the abdal. "Your friend is recovering next door, and will soon rejoin the celebrations. The pain is quickly over. You may lie on the bed or be seated on the stool, whichever you prefer. Osma, the valet here, will remain to bear witness."

"I prefer the stool," said Hector, his voice unsteady.

"As did your friend. Pull up your gown, and sit down then, with your legs spread apart."

Hector did as he was instructed and the abdal reached forward and took the young man's penis in one hand and gently teased forward the foreskin. Next, as Hector peered down anxiously, the abdal was holding in his free hand an instrument which Hector first thought was a set of dividers of the type he himself used when measuring distances across a map. But these dividers were made of wood, each limb flat-sided. Hector broke out in a cold sweat as he realised it was a clamp. Expertly the abdal closed the clamp upon the foreskin, nipping it tightly so that it could not retract. Hector shut his eyes and clenched his fists so that the nails dug deep into the palms of his hands. He sucked in air and held his breath, while hearing the soft murmur of a voice saying, "allahu akbarre". Then came an agonising spike of pain which made him gasp, and a shocking moment later the warm spurt of blood striking the inside of his thigh. Even as he quivered with the pain, he sensed the blessed pressure of some sort of poultice or bandage being pressed to his wounded manhood.

A Question About Cleanliness

[from an Internet men's health forum]

Question: When one has a lot of foreskin, and is trying to keep clean, what advice can you give? It is a real concern, and at 67, I have been working on a satisfactory approach to the cleaning for about fifty-five years. I have about eleven inches of skin covering about 5 inches of cock shaft. The first six can comfortably be retracted to behind the knob of the cock. In my particular instance, that is a point at which a little muscle circularly constricts enough so that I cannot pull the foreskin back to the base of my penis and pubes. When the cock is flaccid, usually, I can reach past the constriction and all the way back if I could reach, but not far enough to do the cleaning I would like to do. I tend to be allergic to some soaps and have gotten rashes, ouch. Also, it is a daily reach, Q-tips are useless, they are much too short. No finger can reach down far enough. What is a man to do? Other things are too abrasive. Help?

Answer 1: What I usually do is just retract the foreskin all the way down, until all the inner skin is exposed, and then wash. If soap gives you a rash, just use some lukewarm water. Have you tried a hypoallergenic soap? Don't know if this is of any help, but it works for me.

Answer 2: Wash regularly. Usually if I can, I tend to clean mine right after urination. I don't use soap much, just water. Piss can make it smell bad and start smegma build-up. When I say I clean mine after peeing, this is being referred to at home or in private bathroom. I do not mean cleaning your foreskin at a public restroom! hehehehe... which by the way is a great way to get laid if you stand there with your dick out at the sinks.

Answer 3: Uh, retract fully, wash clean. If you're not using a mild soap, a thorough wiping using warm water should do fine. If you're not able to retract at this age, there is a problem, and you need to get your penis checked out for possible phimosis.

I Broke My Willy In Romp With The Missus

[An article by Ben Spencer in the Scottish Daily Record, 13 March 2007]

A red-faced husband had to have surgery after 'breaking' his manhood during sex. Robert McClenahan's pleasure turned to pain as he made love to his wife Emma. She said: "Basically, we were having sex and he missed and he broke his willy. We turned on the light and it was, well, bent."

With Robert, 38, writhing in agony, Emma, 32, rang the NHS Direct phoneline. She said: "They were all really giggling but said we should go straight to the accident and emergency department, which we did. A doctor said he should go home and put an ice pack on it."

The ice didn't help much, however, and Robert's pain got worse. Housewife Emma added: "The whole thing was really swelling more and more. It looked black. The skin was so tight, he couldn't retract it. Two days later, he had to go back in and they circumcised him."

Nursing assistant Robert has now recovered from the surgery. But he's still trying to live down the whole episode. Emma, of Colchester, Essex, said: "Everyone knows about it. He laughs about it now but he didn't at the time."

My Fight Against The Slow And Painful Decline Of Circumcision

An interesting article from CNN about the decline of the circumcision rate in the US states: "According to a study by the National Health and Social Life Survey, the U.S. circumcision rate peaked at nearly 90 per cent in the early 1960s but began dropping in the '70s. By 2004, the most recent year for which government figures are available, about 57 per cent of all male newborns delivered in hospitals were circumcised. In some states, the rate is well below 50 per cent."

I mean, crap. Those who know me know that I am passionate about few things – creamed chipped beef, masturbating in front of a mirror, and, well, that's about it. Those and, of course, circumcision. I am about as pro-circumcision as they come. While the jury is still out about whether or not I can actually procreate a non-dragon child, if I do have a son, he will certainly be circumcised – even if I have to perform the operation myself or with the aide of a Franciscan monk and doctor named Michel. This is not because I believe in the health benefits of circumcision but for one simple reason: uncircumcised birds look totally fucking weird.

I, as you might have surmised, am circumcised. I am sure that when my parents made the decision to have me circumcised, it was based on a simple factor – that's just what you do. At the time of my birth in 1979, popularity of circumcision reached a record high in the United States at 85%. True, since 1979, new shit has come to light about circumcision, namely that all that stuff about it preventing penile cancer and facilitating genital hygiene may not be as true (or at least unassailable) as it was once thought. And as the CNN article implies, an increasing number of people view circumcision as unnecessary and potentially harmful.

I readily concede these points. But then there's this: uncircumcised birds look like aliens. Four of my buddies in college – out of a few dozen – were uncircumcised. They celebrated this and I admit, I was a little jealous of their exclusive little club and their weekly 'Guys With Covered Wagons' poker games. But still, being a member of an exclusive club – even one that played poker every Wednesday night and got those potato skins from Rogie's that were covered in sour cream – is not worth walking around with a penis that looks like a sausage.

Since I am circumcised, I intend for all of my male progeny to be circumcised as well, regardless of potential health benefit (although that'd certainly be a plus) or possible pain (don't be a pussy – I don't remember feeling a thing). The reason why I'd like my sons to be circumcised is that I don't feel that I could properly relate to them if we had different-looking birds.

I've seen my fair share of uncircumcised birds, both after Billy Joel concerts and in countless hours of pornography, and in short, they terrify me. Admittedly, my natural inclination is to fear and hate what I don't understand (dry ice, the Swedish language, love, etc), so when it comes to matters of the penis, a sensitive (get it?) topic to begin with, it should not come as a surprise that I have such a strong opinion in this matter. And I don't mean to overly come down on my uncut friends – if your parents were hippies or immigrants or poor or wanted women to recoil at the sight of your penis later in your life, that's fine, man. You know what I always say – when you're judgin', you're not lovin'. But I just don't see how there's any way, when the doctor asks my wife/girlfriend/driver whether or not we'd like our son to be circumcised, I'll say, "Fuck it – let him keep the alien bird. If he's anything like his old man, the women he'll be involved with won't be able to tell if it's a penis or a finger or a strong breeze anyway, so I might as well save the $1200."

(I confess that I have thought about a scenario in which if I had two male children, one of them would be circumcised while the other would not. This would serve as a real-life science experiment to discover once and for all which is better: to be circumcised or to be uncircumcised. However, after spending a few weeks thinking about it, I came to the "duh" conclusion that both my theoretical male offspring would be so fucked up anyway (think: bat wings, fangs, etc) that they would not make for an ideal sample of the population and the experiment would be useless.)

Because I will surely have so little to bond over or talk about with my sons, at least I can ensure that our birds look the same. I can and I must. Statistics, CNN and the liberal media, and the influx of Asian and Latin American immigrants be damned - my sons are gonna get their birds chopped, just like their Pappy did. That, my friends, is an example of a true American standing up for what he believes in. God bless America, God bless me, and, most importantly, God bless my normal-looking bird.

(Well, it's kinda normal. It's just miniature, more like a toddler's than a grown man's. Which is really a matter we should tackle another day.)

Editorial

Many of you must have been wondering whether your copy of this issue had gone astray. My apologies for the long gap since issue 3. The main reason is that I have been extremely busy leading up to my recent retirement. Now that I am retired, I hope to be able to catch up a little with Acorn Society business and get two further issues to you before year end.

For anyone approaching retirement, the most frequent question is: "What are you going to do?" But the potential answer: "I hope to spend some time promoting the benefits of male circumcision" might raise some eyebrows. Yet it does disturb me that, in the United Kingdom, when Joe Public and his wife have a baby son, circumcision isn't even on the radar as an option. It would be good to change that perspective in some way. Watch this space!

Meanwhile, I still need more input from members. If any of you are interested in being interviewed for the magazine, in person, or by telephone, email or correspondence, please let me know. It is your newsletter, not mine.

A Fateful Signifier

My recent reading has included Arthur and George by Julian Barnes. This is a fictionalised account of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's involvement in the case of George Edalji who was wrongfully imprisoned for the mutilation of horses and other animals. The book contained a reference to another case of wrongful imprisonment – that of Adolph Beck.

In 1897, Beck was accused by a woman in the street of having swindled her of money and jewellery three weeks previously. The inspector assigned to the case learned that, in the past two years, twenty-two women had been defrauded by a grey-haired man who called himself 'Lord Wilton de Willoughby' and used basically the same modus operandi as Beck's accuser had described. These women were asked to view a line-up that included Beck, along with ten or fifteen men who had been selected randomly from the street. Because he was the only one with grey hair and moustache, he was quickly identified by the women as the man who had taken their clothes and jewellery.

Despite Beck's claims of innocence, he was charged with ten misdemeanours and four felonies. The felony charges were based on presumed prior convictions in 1877, when a man named John Smith had been sentenced to five years for swindling unattached women by using the name Lord Willoughby, writing worthless cheques, and taking their jewellery. He had disappeared after his release and it was assumed that Beck and Smith were one and the same.

Beck was found guilty and, despite maintaining his innocence throughout, was sentenced to seven years of penal servitude. In prison he was given John Smith's old prison number, D 523. England did not yet have a court of criminal appeal, but from 1896 to 1901 Beck's solicitor presented ten petitions for re-examination of his case. His requests to see the prison's description of John Smith were repeatedly denied. However, in May 1898 a member of the Home Office looked at the Smith file and saw that Smith was Jewish and thus had been circumcised, while Beck was not. This was the first piece of evidence that slowly swayed public opinion to the view that Beck's conviction was unjust. He was eventually paroled in July 1901 for good behaviour.

This case brought to mind a number of situations where the presence or absence of a foreskin has determined a person's fate. The film Europa Europa is based on the true life experience of Solomon Perel. The film starts with his Jewish Bris as an eight day old baby. But this is pre-war Russia, and his family is killed in a pogrom which he survives. Solly, a Jewish boy, becomes first a model Soviet student in Russia and then a member of the Hitler Youth, managing to pass himself off as a Nazi hero.

Solly's circumcised penis functions as the film's chief dramatic device. It is the one unalterable fact in his life. No matter how hard he tries to change his identity, his circumcision is the one vestige of Jewishness he can't deny. For example, a romance with a German girl, who wants to conceive a child for the Fuhrer, proves depressing; he can't consummate the relationship because it would give him away. But he survives and at the end of the film, the real Solomon Perel is briefly seen living in Israel.

Solly was lucky. There must have been many Jews on mainland Europe who escaped the initial trawl but were eventually betrayed by and exterminated because of their lack of foreskin. It is perhaps interesting to speculate what might have happened had Hitler successfully invaded Great Britain. How long would it have taken the invaders to recognise that circumcision was not necessarily an indication of Jewishness, but rather a class identifier? Very few upper and middle class males sported foreskins in wartime Britain.

In 1947, as part of the move to independence, India and Pakistan were partitioned. The divide was largely along religious lines, but millions were caught the wrong side of the boundaries. Hindus decamped to India, Moslems to Pakistan. But there was also the equivalent of ethnic cleansing on both sides – with the foreskin, or the lack of it, often the signifier. During the worst days of the partition, Muslims would ambush trains and murder every uncircumcised male, because they knew these were Hindus. Hindus used the same method to identify Muslims for death.

Even today in parts of Africa, the possession or lack of a foreskin can be fatal in certain circumstances. In the violence that followed Kenya's disputed presidential election in December 2007, a notorious gang, the Mungiki, mutilated genitals in the name of circumcision. The attacks were touched off by opposition allegations that Kenya's president stole the election. Many of the mutilation victims belonged to the Luo tribe of opposition presidential candidate Raila Odinga. Traditionally, the Luo community does not practise circumcision, unlike most other Kenyan communities. The Mungiki draws mostly from President Mwai Kibaki's Kikuyu tribe for whom circumcision is a rite of passage. A gang member called forced 'circumcisions' simple revenge on Luos for attacks on Kikuyus since the election. A woman in Nairobi reported seeing five men harmed in this way, including at least two whose penises were cut off and thrown into a fire. A surgeon at Kenyatta National Hospital, the main government hospital in the capital, said he had operated on two men with injuries to their penises, at least one of whom was a Luo. 'There were cuts around the foreskin, probably an attempt at circumcision,' the doctor said. A mortuary assistant in Nairobi said out of 78 bodies brought to his facility since the fighting started, two adult males appeared to have been crudely circumcised before being hacked to death. John Holmes, the United Nations undersecretary-general for humanitarian affairs, said he also had received reports of genital mutilation.

Circumcision as a religious or tribal rite long predates circumcision for medical and health reasons. When conflict arises, it is not surprising that an easily identified signifier, like the presence or absence of a foreskin, should be used to identify 'the enemy'. There is much controversy in the West about whether circumcision is a useful prophylactic and whether it should be imposed on non-consenting babies. But at least all of us, whether cut or intact, can safely walk down the street without fear of attack because of our penile status.

Of course, were all males of the same status, then circumcision could no longer be a signifier. But the decision as to whether circumcision should be universal or whether all men should remain intact is likely to cause a war of its own!

In the last issue, there was discussion about the tightness of circumcision when the penis is erect. The following images show cuts where the skin is tight on the shaft and the frenulum removed, but little pulling on the ball sac or pubic skin – perfect cuts!

Celebrity Circumcision

A couple of months ago I watched a very strange film by Peter Greenaway (is there any other kind?) called The Tulse Luper Suitcases (The Moab Story). Greenaway is notorious for his liberal use of nudity, frequently male, in his films. This film was no exception and although I had difficulty making head or tail of it, I couldn't fail to notice Greenaway's attitude to the young male star, J.J. Feild. I've seen Feild recently in Ruby In The Smoke and Northanger Abbey on TV and I wonder how he feels about his early effort in this film. More than once, Feild's clothing comes off and the camera lingers, almost embarrassingly, on his cock which is well and truly circumcised.

A little research revealed that despite his very English voice he was born in Colorado which probably explains his circumcision. I don't know if one or both parents are American, but he can thank either of them for his status. I should also point out that other male characters in this odd film get their kit off, though as I've never heard of them it would be a bit pointless to say who they are and whether cut or not. The better-known actor Steven Mackintosh is also in the film and though I've read on one website that he is circumcised, strangely he's one of the few who keeps his clothes on. So sadly I can't confirm if the information is true.

A Ridge Too Far!

His mother's wish, it was supposed,
He bore with pride the scar,
The knob developed, well exposed
Into a ridge too far!

His friends all rejoiced at the size,
And nibbled it with care!
The glans was huge, corona wise,
With such a mighty flare!

"I've got a beauty," he confessed,
"With it I am so pleased;
Yes circumcision is the best,
And not a whiff of cheese!"

"So thank you mother for that gift,
That neat and dainty scar!
With Dad and I, no body drift,
We shared a ridge too far!"

Debating The Merits Of Circumcision

Some two years ago I reluctantly resigned from the Acorn Society due to my view that it should no longer sit on the fence but be positively promoting circumcision for males here in the UK where, sadly, these days there is generally an anti-circumcision policy and little support for the benefits of the procedure. Recently I was handed some back copies of Acorn by my good friend and current Acorn member R.W. – Surrey.

In one of those back numbers (Issue 1/2007, page 9) I was delighted to read no less than eight responses submitted after the editor kindly published my 'letter of resignation' in Issue 6/2006. I had, until now, naturally not seen these letters since I am no longer on the circulation list, but they make interesting reading. There seems to be a huge amount of support for my view that Acorn should be much more pro-circ – yes, even more than it has become under the current excellent editorship! This is also borne out by the results of the survey which appeared on page 3 of the same issue where the first 18 headings of preferred topics for the magazine were to do with circumcision and its techniques.

One or two wrote to say they thought that an active forum for debate should be maintained so that those who were uncircumcised could be allowed their say; otherwise there would be no debate at all. I believe these people to be incorrect. There is plenty to debate about our 'special' state of being circumcised, its various forms and procedures, good and bad experiences, etc. We who are cut have taken positive action to be circumcised (or in my case my parents thankfully did that for me), whereas the uncut man has done nothing to attain his status. It seems quite natural for all men who have had the operation to want to unite in belonging to a Society specially and solely for them ... as a keen rugby player you wouldn't want to join a club for golfers would you? Your balls would be the wrong shape and size anyway!!

It may be of interest to members of the Acorn Society to know that, as I mentioned I would, I did set up a Pro Circumcision Group. Pro-Circ members of the Acorn Society are encouraged to join this by going to our Internet site: http://groups.yahoo.com/group/Pro\_Circumcision\_UK/ and applying to join by leaving a short message explaining your keenness on circumcision and membership of Acorn. The Group contains an active Message Board, interesting Polls, a Database of members who wish to get in touch with each other and of course an extensive Picture Gallery of cut cocks (plus some before-and-after shots).

At this time here in the UK we need all the support we can get in order to reverse the trend of the past few decades on this important matter. There are more than enough anti-circumcision and foreskin restoration pressure groups on the Internet, plus the medical profession and the Government combined with the NHS advocating non-circumcision policies as it is. We need to be proactive in promoting the many good medical and aesthetic reasons for male circumcision both for adults and neonatally (in my view quite the best time to be 'done'). Our Pro-Circumcision UK Yahoo Group sets an example to others, which I hope the Acorn Society will also follow.

Don't Be Scared to Circumcise Your Baby Boy

By Bernadine Healy M.D.

I wouldn't discourage anyone from discussing and even questioning the merits of infant male circumcision. But it's a bit much to claim that the 2 million or more parents in the USA who have their infant sons circumcised each year – and the thousands of doctors and hospitals that enable the procedure – are guilty of child abuse and genital mutilation. Yet that's the heart of a debate in the 7th December [2007] issue of the British Medical Journal, in which head-to-head columns respond yea and nay to the somewhat pointed question: "Is infant male circumcision an abuse of the rights of the child?"

British National Health Service consultant Geoff Hinchley leads with a strong yes. He maintains that the procedure is male genital mutilation – akin to female genital mutilation and other kinds of infant abuse that are now illegal in countries like Britain and the United States. He asserts that the procedure damages young boys by decreasing penile sensitivity, something that has been disputed in recent medical reports, yet he ignores considerable medical evidence when he states outright that "the procedure will provide no medical benefit". He wants boys protected from the procedure and invokes the U.N. declaration on the rights of children, which directs governments to take legislative, administrative, social, and educational measures to protect children from all forms of violence, injury, or abuse. He's supportive of parents putting off the procedure until the child or young man can make the decision for himself.

There's no doubt that what emerged as a cultural and religious practice dating back thousands of years has been medicalised. Circumcisions have been routinely advised for decades based on the premise that they allowed for better hygiene and on evidence that cervical cancer was less common in women married to circumcised men. Since then medical studies have questioned some assertions in favour of circumcision, such as diminished risk of penile cancer. Other studies, however, have reinforced its considerable benefits, in particular a lower risk of harbouring and passing on sexually transmitted disease. Multiple clinical trials from Africa have shown that being circumcised cuts a man's risk of contracting HIV by well over 50 percent. Circumcision does not substitute for condoms, of course. But the findings are strong enough to put the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and many public health mavens onto the circumcision bandwagon.

Before we overturn that cart, it might be better to focus on the question, "Does male circumcision bring enough medical benefit to justify risk?" Done properly, the medical and personal risks are minimal, if any. As I see it, the benefits are biologically plausible and are supported by the weight of current evidence. That said, the known benefits are not strong enough to rise to the level of mandating the procedure as we do childhood vaccines. Thus, as it always has been, circumcision remains a parent's choice.

I encourage parents to review the existing information. If they decide they want to have their infant son circumcised, they should have it done by a professional who has experience in performing the procedure and in providing local anaesthesia so that the child experiences no discomfort. I caution parents, however, against delaying the decision until the child is old enough to decide for himself. Get real. Not many teenage boys would relish the discussion, let alone the act. Nor do I think they would have the perspective to weigh the medical pros and cons.

In a time when it is appropriate to question the use or overuse of certain medical procedures, however minor they might seem, having these discussions in medical journals and in public circles is healthy. What is not healthy in this free flow of ideas is to diminish the real abuse of female genital mutilation with a trumped-up portrayal of the 'abuse' that infant circumcision allegedly exacts on our helpless baby boys.

Don't Have A Fit When You See Your Boyfriend's Bits!

From an advice column in *Miami Hurricane

Question: I just started getting serious with this guy I've been seeing, and I really like him. I was a little surprised, however, when he took his pants off the first time we hooked up. His equipment is 'fully accessorized' and I'm not quite sure what to do with the extra parts. He doesn't seem to be at all ashamed or embarrassed, and although he's very hygienic, it still kind of freaks me out. Am I a horrible person for getting grossed out by this? Do I need to be doing anything different? This is new territory for me...

Answer: There is absolutely nothing wrong with you for being caught off guard the first time you see an uncircumcised penis. It's perfectly understandable that you were startled when you realised your boy had a bun with his hot dog, but it's not really fair (and even a little shallow) to hold it against him and continue to be 'grossed out'. After all, the poor guy can't help it if his parents decided not to remove his foreskin when he was born. If you want to keep things up with this boy, you need to get over your aversion to uncircumcised men.

A good way to do this is to learn more about the practice of circumcision and its pervasiveness (or lack thereof) in our culture. Circumcision is most prevalent in the United States, South Korea, the Philippines, and the Jewish and Muslim faiths. A recent national survey found that 91% of men born in the 1970s and 83% of men born in the 1980s were circumcised. Compare that to the 11.7% of boys in their late teens and early twenties in the United Kingdom, and the near non-existence of the practice in South America. If you were a Scottish lass, you'd probably be grossed out if you saw a man that was circumcised.

One reason for the decline in circumcision in America is the vast growth in the Latin population. The practice of circumcision in Latin countries has, historically, been much less common than here in the good ol' U.S. of A. Your guy's ethnic background or religion could be the reason for his extra bits and pieces.

Besides the traditional religious motivations, circumcision was once thought to be a preventative measure for certain penile problems (cancer, infection, etc), and promoted as good hygiene. Although the practice of circumcision is disputed, recent medical studies have found that circumcision may aid in decreasing the risk for some STDs, infections, and chronic conditions. Still, if an uncircumcised man takes care to keep himself clean, it shouldn't affect anything, in the bedroom or otherwise.

The more, uh, 'experience' you have with uncircumcised penises, the more familiar they will become. A little get-to-know-you time with your boy and his package is probably a good idea. And hey, it's not like I'm telling you to pull your teeth out – I should hope this is a pleasant experience.

Best of Luck!

Cutting The Competition

From The Economist

Circumcision and other forms of male-genital mutilation are commonplace in many societies around the world. The origin of these practices, however, puzzles anthropologists and evolutionary biologists. They wonder what benefit they could bring, especially given the obvious risks of infection and reduced fertility.

Explanations have ranged from the pragmatic (a ritual that marks the beginning of adulthood and bonds men together) to the Freudian (having something to do with the pain of the separation from the mother). However Christopher Wilson, a neurobiologist at Cornell University, has a different idea. In a recent paper in Evolution and Human Behavior he suggests that male-genital mutilations are actually intended to prevent younger men from fathering children with older men's wives.

Dr Wilson takes his cue from sperm-competition theory, which suggests that males of promiscuous primate species have evolved features that maximise their own sperm's chances of fertilising an egg they might have to compete for. These features include large testicles which produce more sperm, and morphologically complex penises. Males of monogamous primate species, on the other hand, have smaller testicles and simpler penises. Human genitals are somewhere in between, perhaps reflecting the fact that people generally form pair bonds, but are susceptible to occasional bouts of promiscuity.

Some forms of genital mutilation have obvious effects on fertility. For instance, several African and Micronesian societies practise testicular ablation – the crushing or cutting off of one testicle. Some Australian aborigines engage in sub-incision, which exposes part of the urethra and thus causes sperm to leak out of the base of the penis. Circumcision does not have quite such clear-cut effects. But there are several ways it may affect fertility: most obviously, the lack of a foreskin could make insertion, ejaculation or both take longer. Perhaps long enough that an illicit quickie will not always reach fruition.

Older men are in a position to form alliances with younger men – passing on knowledge, lending them political support and giving them access to weapons. By insisting that the young undergo genital mutilation of some form as a quid pro quo, an older married man can seek to ensure that even if he is cuckolded, he will still be the father of his wives' children. Of course, the older man has probably undergone genital mutilation too, and seen his own fertility reduced. But that, if anything, increases his incentive to make certain that the young bucks are similarly handicapped. And if all the older men in a society conclude this is a good thing, it will rapidly become a socially enforced norm.

To test this theory, Dr Wilson made several predictions. Among them, he suggested that mutilation is more likely to be practised in polygamous societies (since a man with several wives is more vulnerable to cuckoldry), and is especially likely in those polygamous societies where a man's co-wives live in separate households from their husband. It should also take place in a public ceremony watched by other men, to avoid cheating or free-riding. And there should be a strong stigma against men who refuse it.

To test his predictions, Dr Wilson looked at a database of 186 pre-industrial societies. Some 48% of the highly polygamous ones practised a form of male-genital mutilation, and the number rose to 63% when co-wives kept separate households. By contrast, only 14% of monogamous societies practised mutilation. Moreover, and also as predicted, the mutilations were almost always carried out in public, often as part of a coming-of-age ceremony at puberty, with strong stigma attached to uncut men.

Dr Wilson's paper does not definitely prove that sexual competition is at the root of male-genital mutilation. But it does provide a plausible explanation for a puzzling practice. It is not likely, however, to have much effect on attitudes toward circumcision. The men who enforce and undergo the rituals are no more aware of the underlying evolutionary motivations than of why their testicles are the size they are. Those who engage in the practice for religious reasons will surely continue to do so. Otherwise, most of the Western world has already largely abandoned routine neonatal circumcision, which is seen as an outdated and unfortunate medical fad. The exceptions are America, where more than half of newborn boys are still circumcised, and Africa, where circumcision helps to stop the transmission of HIV, the AIDS-causing virus. There, infection really is a far greater threat to the number of children a man might have than the loss of his foreskin.

Why My Son Is Circumcised

I looked at a lot of information before deciding. The AMA report wasn't strong either way, just said there wasn't any reason to recommend it routinely. The Indian doctor said he'd done thousands, there was no real risk of anything serious happening, but you could tell he wasn't for it. Penn & Teller declared it "Bullshit!" But they seemed to be stretching the facts to justify a strong position.

My husband left the decision to me, although he leaned toward it for 'cultural reasons'. As I'm used to American men born in the 60s and 70s, the natural way does look a bit off to me. Like Elaine said, "No ... personality." But I also figured the absolute last thing that should matter about a man's appearance there was how his mother feels about it.

My dad was against it. "Completely unnecessary", he said. I asked about my brother. Well, that had been at my mom's insistence. Back then, doctors said it was (eye roll) more hygienic. "But it's not," he said. "All you've got to do is wash. Your grandmother was a nurse. She raised 7 boys. None of them were."

"Well, except for (eye roll) your Uncle Mike. But that didn't happen until he was 14."

Fourteen?

What happened was, he got an infection. So they removed it. But that doesn't happen if you're clean.

That settled it. I'm sure bad luck and/or genes played a role in my uncle's unfortunate situation. And we plan to do our best to convince our son to be however clean one would have to be to prevent an infection of the foreskin. But, well ... the potential penalty seems to greatly outweigh the offence.

I did make myself watch. I figured I owed that to the little guy. He screamed pretty loud, but no louder than when he wakes up alone or gets bored.

Adam's Circumcision

My grandson is now a man.

"Tell me Tok Mommy, will it be painful?" Adam, my eight-year-old grandson, asked me.

"Hmm, I don't think so. You go ask Tok Abah," I replied.

"Abang says it is not. But I don't want to use a clamp. Abang says laser is better."

That was a conversation between Adam and me. And the topic of discussion was circumcision – an important rite of passage marking a boy's entrance into adulthood. You see, I don't have a son and so I wouldn't know the difference between using a clamp or a laser. I wonder if Adam himself knew the difference. I suppose he does after having talked about it with Nik Adam Haris, my sister Lalin's eldest son. Twelve-year-old Haris, whom Adam refers to as Abang, was circumcised three years ago by the laser method.

I was told that the benefits of using a laser are: faster operation, limited or no bleeding, quicker healing, minimal post-op pain, pleasant experience and most aesthetically pleasing results.

"It is better because the wounds heal faster," Lalin said.

Adam is the grandson whom I raised since he was a baby. My husband and I have been preparing him for this important journey in his life – that first step towards adulthood. We thought that the December school holidays would be a good time for Adam to be circumcised – there would be enough time for him to recuperate. Somehow we weren't able to have it done during the first half of the holidays and had to settle for the second half. We chose Subang Jaya Medical Centre (SJMC) for Adam on the recommendation of our neighbours whose 12-year-old son had his done there recently. Secondly, it is near to our house. They also recommended to us the doctor who performed the surgery on Hisham.

So, last Friday we brought Adam to see Dr Zulkifli Laidin who assured us that it'd be okay for him to be circumcised this week because the wound would heal by the time school reopens. The day of the circumcision was fixed for the following Monday. The surgery was to be performed by Dr Zulkifli at SJMC, at 11.00am.

Adam was not to eat after 5.00am – five hours before the surgery. Why you might ask. After all it is a simple surgery. Not really...because his circumcision was to be done under general anaesthetic (G.A). We opted for G.A out of fear that he might get cold feet if the circumcision was done by conventional method. But of course the costs of having it done under G.A. is 10 times more than under local anaesthetic.

Adam was asleep by 10.00pm Sunday night after a dinner of Domino's pizza. We wanted to make sure he had enough to eat. He was up by 7.30am the next morning, had his bath, dressed up and by 9.00am we were already on the 1st floor of SJMC's North Tower, where the surgery would take place. I know Adam was quite nervous but he behaved very well. After the necessary registration and changing to hospital attire, he was wheeled into the operating theatre at 10.30am. And within 15 minutes the circumcision was complete. However, he was not out until an hour later when the anaesthetic wore off.

At about noon he was wheeled out of the day care surgery centre. There was my grandson, now a man! We had wanted him stay for the night at the hospital, but he was eager to come home. By 1.00pm we were already back.

A Mother's Circumcision Regret

I promised you something on circumcision. I've really been putting it off, because I wanted to create a post that was informative, factual, and covered all the bases. Unfortunately, I just don't have the time. I will preface this by saying that I have not done a whole lot of research on circumcision. I've glossed over the information and retained the basic overview, but other than that, this post is completely anecdotal.

Son #1: I was 19 years old. This is not a very valid excuse, but it's one that I use often for other issues as well. Take natural birth, for instance. I really had no idea that natural birth was something that a woman would actually choose to do. I definitely was under the impression that natural birth was for someone who did not have access to pain medication. The same thing goes for circumcision. I had no idea that NOT circumcising your baby was an option you would choose unless you did not have the resources to do so. Many things you learn through life experience, and I didn't have much. I had never heard anyone talk about refusing circumcision. I had never known anyone who wasn't circumcised. I had never seen any literature on the subject. This was also nearly ten years ago, and the internet wasn't what it is today. We now have a wealth of information at our fingertips, and we are constantly bombarded with all sorts of new ideas.

Anyway. During my pregnancy I learned that DSHS (Medicaid) would not cover a circumcision. You would think this would have been my first clue that perhaps the procedure was not medically necessary. But no, I just relayed the information to my parents, who relayed the information to someone else and by the end of my pregnancy a wealthy older woman had gifted me the $350 to pay for the procedure. The one smart thing I did was listen to my Dad, when he expressed an interest in having the baby circumcised according to Jewish tradition, on the 8th day of life. At that time, my Dad was the only real male in my life, and I figured "Hey, he has a penis, he probably knows what he's talking about more than I do". I later learned that Vitamin K levels spike on the 8th day of life, which aids in blood clotting. Wow those Jews are smart!

My obstetrician was appointed to do the circumcision in her clinic. She had explained that the baby would be given a topical numbing ointment to lessen the pain, and that the procedure would be quick. My father and I waited in the waiting room, admiring my sleeping babe in his infant carrier. My Dad read a book aloud to his first grandchild. The nurse came in to the room and took my son. I waited. And then I heard him screaming. It went on and on and I couldn't figure out why they weren't bringing him out to me. They said the procedure was quick. Why was he still crying? Had something gone wrong? I needed my baby NOW! I was panicked. They finally brought him out, wrapped in a blanket. His face was red and splotchy and he was furiously sucking on his hands. The nurse told me to nurse him for comfort. At that time, breastfeeding was not going well. I did the best I could, in a public waiting room, fumbling and nervous. I was given instructions and told to apply A&D ointment to a piece of gauze and apply it to his penis at each diaper change. The first time I peeked at his 'new' penis, I was shocked. He went into that clinic with a tiny, pointed penis. He came out of it with a short, fat, rounded thing. How did THAT happen? I shrugged it off.

Eighteen months later I gave birth to my second son. The same obstetrician, the same clinic. This time, I wasn't breastfeeding, and a bottle of formula was given after the procedure, which my newborn refused.

Luckily, we never had any problems with the circumcisions.

Six years later, I became pregnant with Rylan. I was totally armed with new information. I had chosen a homebirth, I was GOING to breastfeed, I had decided on cloth diapers, I was planning on co-sleeping, and I had purchased a sling. The only choice left to be made was circumcision. This time, I did something even stupider. And I have no excuse for it. I purposefully decided to be blissfully ignorant.

I knew where I could look for information and I ignored it. The Man wanted the baby circumcised and I figured "Hey, he's a man. It should be his decision". I did choose to tweak the system a little. I searched out a paediatrician who would inject local anaesthesia before performing the circumcision. The only thing that would hurt would be the quick jab of a needle. I also chose this certain paediatrician because he also used a plastibell, which would fall off when the penis was healed. No gauze, no ointment, no nothing. Lastly, this doctor preferred that the parents remain in the room during the procedure. I couldn't stand the idea of being there, but I insisted that The Man go. At least my baby would have someone familiar to comfort him. Once again, I sat out in the waiting room. I had nursed the baby in the car before we walked into the clinic. I figured he'd be set for awhile. My husband and my son left the waiting room to sit in an exam room for a long period of time, waiting for the doctor. By the time the doctor was available, my son was starving. My husband, wanting to be polite, did not call for me to nurse again. I waited and waited and waited. Finally, The Man appeared with our screaming baby. He was in a diaper, but nothing else, and my husband was clumsily trying to wrap him in a receiving blanket. He had been screaming so hard that The Man didn't even wait to dress him. I tried to nurse again, in another waiting room, with people gawking. I couldn't do it. We went to the car, we strapped the baby in, and he finally fell asleep, exhausted from the experience.

Again, the circumcision healed well. But after three experiences, all the same, I promised myself...never again.

This issue has come up for me a lot lately, since RyRy's four month long rash completely took over his genitalia. I wonder if it would have been this bad if there was foreskin to protect him. Foreskin serves a purpose! For an infant, it is there to protect them from urine and faeces and infection. It's not some random piece of skin. We are not imperfectly designed. Every last bit of us has been carefully crafted, with painstaking details. There is no reason for us to be doing this to our children. And furthermore, we have no right. At one point I had thought that if I should have a daughter, I would get her ears pierced as an infant. It looks so darling and I can imagine matching earrings to her outfits. Nowadays, I feel the same way about ear piercing as I do about circumcision. It isn't my body and it isn't my choice. Unless it is medically necessary, I have no right making those sorts of decisions for my child. I don't OWN them, after all. You wouldn't give your child a tattoo. You wouldn't give them a nose job if they were perfectly normal to begin with. Why are we permanently altering our little boys before they are able to make the decisions themselves?

Even if you are adamant about getting your son circumcised, make sure that you educate yourself on both sides of the issue. Learn from my mistakes. Don't be ignorant. Choose to be informed. For your sake and the sake of your children.

Circumcised – Or Not?

One time many years ago when Nadler was a Rabbi in an orthodox community, it was discovered three days prior to a Bar Mitzvah that the young man in question's mother had not been Jewish at the time of his birth. The caterer and florist had been paid. The sanctuary was reserved and Nadler was to be the Rabbi. The ball was rolling. As Nadler, ever punny, put it, once you've paid the caterer, you're really loxed in. All this in mind, Nadler had to tell the parents that this 13-year-old boy would need an emergency circumcision. Luckily, he had already had one and the parents felt confident that this was enough.

Unfortunately, since he was not Jewish at the time of the circumcision, it was not valid. He would need to be checked to see if the medical circumcision had been as complete as that performed by a mohel would be. To check this, the penis needs to be erect. The parents were not pleased with how this was playing out. To ascertain all of this, three other Rabbis would also have to be present to examine the organ in question.

The circumcision, they announced, was complete. Unfortunately, for this boy, he still needed an emergency conversion before the Bar Mitzvah. This means that a pinprick of blood would have to be taken from the penis since it was already circumcised. As it turns out, this very small operation on the day before the Bar Mitzvah made for a very uncomfortable gait on the day itself.

The Real Logic Of Circumcision

An article by David Aaronovitch

Years ago someone (I forget who) told me it was because of the sand; men who live in deserts are liable to get grit where it most isn't wanted and where it unfortunately doesn't turn to pearls. So the religious leaders of the desert folk – who doubled up as wise persons and doctors – transformed a rather radical way of dealing with the possibilities of sub-preputial inflammation, into a supernatural injunction. QED.

In the past few weeks there has been a smattering of bris talk. There was the claim that circumcision diminished the chances of AIDS, though safe sex still seems to me to be a better and less contingent option. And there was the news about how an increasing number of Jewish men were reluctant to have their sons circumcised, possibly seeing the operation as a rather violent intrusion.

This chat just got me interested in the why of it all. Of course, to some believers, God told Abraham to do it, and what more do you really need to know? But it's the anthropology and the psychology that are really fascinating here – so if you want a pretend-medical discussion of penile hygiene or (heaven forbid) a women-prefer-X debate on genital aesthetics, look for the appropriate internet site.

All right; God made his covenant with Abraham. So why, any child would ask the ineffable, might a God, creator or created, want that particular covenant? Sand was one answer, both simple and glib, but theologically unsatisfying. There are other hot places where the local religions don't demand this particular form of sacrifice, or require it later in life, and other body parts one might modify to take account of weather conditions. Muslims are not enjoined to circumcision by the Koran. The prophets all did it (including, of course, Ibrahim/Abraham) and that provides sufficient precedent, with the operation often being carried out as part of an adulthood ceremony. But mark this, in Islam the practice is also apparently known as 'tahara', or 'purification'. Why?

To help readers who might be as ignorant as myself, I began a determined search for the Jewish theological explanation of the brit, covering many websites in the couple of hours I had available. On one, an American mohel explained that circumcision brought together spiritual and temporal in the most obvious way by being performed 'on the most physical part', thus joining the forces of body and soul in serving God. According to this rationalisation, the physical sort of represents the spiritual, and making an alteration in one part of the physical symbolises the alteration in the spiritual. The mohel argues furthermore that this part is somehow more physical than any other part. More than your finger (see Yakuza), your earlobe, your septum (look it up), and therefore more symbolic. And it is certainly true that pagan religions are devoid of symbols representing the earlobe. Even so, this sounds like an evasion to me, or a euphemism.

So I turned to the being Jewish website, which offered this elaboration. 'When Adam was created,' it informed me, 'he had no foreskin'. This was because, according to the author, everything in the Garden of Eden, such as food and clothing, 'was easily accessible'. After the Fall, however, everything became complicated and – being Jewish implied – Adam grew a foreskin. So when God looked around for a covenant with the chosen people, presumably, he decided to make their intimate persons 'easily accessible' again. Why, however, choose a covenant which half the people couldn't fulfil? It could have been decided that all Jews, male and female, should be shaven-headed. Rabbi Simmons, from Ask Rabbi Simmons has a more Melanie Phillips explanation. "In Kabbalistic terms," he says, "the foreskin symbolises a barrier which prevents growth." And why is that? Because, explains the rabbi, "it is a foundation of Judaism that we are to control our animal desires and direct them into spiritual pursuits. Nowhere does a person have more potential for expressing 'barbaric' behaviour than in the sex drive."

Freud's view of castration anxiety might well suggest a boy who believes that, should he sexually misbehave, the Dark Mohel of the Night will come back for the rest. One only has to read Portnoy's Complaint, however, to know that humanity has once again thwarted the designs of the Almighty. There is, of course, something else being suggested in all this – something which resonates with another recent debate. Men need the covenant because their rampant sexuality demands to be kept in check, while women have no such requirement. Females can help out, however, by refusing to inflame men's barbarous instincts. This is the logic of the bris and the burqa – lose one covering, gain another.

Denmark may be about to ban circumcision for boys. The procedure would be forbidden until the age of 15 – the legal age in Denmark for a child to have sole jurisdiction over his own body. Interestingly, there would be no religious exemptions; indeed, this ban seems almost specifically directed against Judaism, Islam and any Christian sects where circumcision is a religious requirement.

If such a law is introduced, presumably there will be medical exemptions, otherwise boys with genuine phimosis will have to suffer ballooning prepuces until their fifteenth birthday! But any exemption will provide a loophole – what is the betting that Jewish babies will generally be found to suffer with phimosis. Either that, or such babies will be having an early holiday across the borders to a more sympathetic country.

Perhaps this is a test case for all European countries. Perhaps, if we wish to preserve the right for UK parents to choose infant circumcision, whether for religious or prophylactic reasons, the campaign that I call for in my Editor's column may not be a moment too soon in coming.

Let's start a campaign!

Sixty years ago circumcision was routine for over half the male infants born in the United Kingdom. In the decades since, that rate has plummeted and today, unless the baby is born into a particular religious or ethnic community, he is likely to remain intact. Yet the arguments in favour of routine circumcision remain as potent today as they were sixty years ago, and many (some would argue all) men are disadvantaged by not having been cut at birth. Is the situation irredeemable? Not necessarily, but it would need a large, concerted campaign to turn the situation around. What might such a campaign look like?

There are three groups of people that need to be influenced: the media, the medical profession and the parents. The media is taken to encompass newspapers, magazines, television, radio and the web. The media would be vastly important in any pro-circumcision campaign. It would have three functions: first, to raise the profile of circumcision and place it in the consciousness of parents as an option for their baby; second to provide information about the procedure; third, to put a positive spin on the process and convince parents that it is the best option for their son.

Articles about circumcision already appear quite frequently in the UK press. Yet they are very rarely of the type that will lead parents to think that circumcision is a relevant option for their baby. Articles tend to be by Jewish fathers or mothers, agonising as to whether they should respect their religious tradition; or circumcised men bemoaning the loss of their foreskins and with it, allegedly, thousands of nerve endings; or reports from Africa on the use of circumcision to combat the AIDS epidemic, articles that rarely suggest any relevance to the western world. Instead, we need articles that will make an immediate impact on parents – articles with titles such as: Circumcision: the sensible choice for your baby boy.

Once awareness is raised, the internet is likely to be many parents' recourse for further information. Many of the current circumcision sites have a charged overlay, directed as they are towards adults seeking circumcision for psychological, aesthetic or sexual reasons. Such sites will probably deter many parents. What are required are factual sites that give positive information about the benefits of routine infant circumcision. It is important that the sites dedicated to infant circumcision should appear high in any Google (or other) search. People rarely get to page 2 of their search results, and parents will soon give up the hunt if the first few search results take them to anti-circumcision propaganda sites.

Baby care sites constitute another potential source of positive information. If the editors of such sites can be convinced to accept entries that discuss the merits of circumcision, that has the advantage that parents looking for general information about the care of their baby may light upon the topic of circumcision and learn of all the advantages of having their baby son cut.

But if the media does give a positive spin to circumcision and parents begin to seek the operation for their son, they will immediately hit a medical brick wall. GPs, with few exceptions, tend to be opposed to routine circumcision. They will therefore seek to convince parents that it is medically unnecessary and barbaric, and will refuse cooperation in arranging the operation. Doctors need to be persuaded again of the medical benefits of circumcision – particularly in the prevention of phimosis and balanitis, in protection against HIV and other sexually transmitted disease, in facilitating hygiene and in enhancing the sexual experience.

It will probably be argued that the NHS cannot afford to offer routine circumcision to all male babies. But managers need to look more carefully at the economics. At least one in ten males will have problems with their foreskins, leading to the need for circumcision in childhood or later. A circumcision beyond infancy costs far more than ten routine infant circumcisions: the costs include initial consultations with the GP, with probably some ineffective treatment with cortisone creams first; the hospital consultations, the operation itself and the aftercare; not to mention the cost of sick leave during recuperation. Economically, the arguments favour the routine circumcision of babies.

Of course, this in part depends upon infant circumcision being provided at a reasonable price. The operation, whether carried out using the Plastibell or a clamp, is simple and quick. There is no need for high costs. There is no reason why parents should not make a reasonable contribution to the costs, provided that those who cannot afford it still have access to the service.

With respect to parents, the media is probably the most important factor in the first few years of any campaign. Unfortunately, because circumcision has now been out of fashion in the UK for almost 60 years, there is no longer a tradition of babies being circumcised. (The exception is probably amongst families where medical care is provided privately rather than through the NHS. There is some evidence that in such cases, circumcision has survived as the norm.) Fathers, even grandfathers, are now generally uncircumcised; mothers, even grandmothers, have no experience of circumcised men. Circumcision is therefore likely to be an alien concept. If circumcision can gradually be reintroduced, then the tradition will grow again. Circumcised fathers will seek to have their sons circumcised, just as happens in the USA. The question will turn from “Why are you having baby circumcised?” to “Why aren’t you having baby circumcised?” The UK will then start to be a circumcised nation again.

The above is a daunting agenda. But those against circumcision have formed themselves into a powerful lobby. They are excellent at placing articles in the media and are omni-present in terms of bulletin boards and discussion groups whenever the subject of male circumcision is raised – especially if the initial mention happens to be favourable. There is probably an equally large community that is in favour of male circumcision. The question is whether this community wishes to spend all its energies looking inwards, congratulating each other on their cut status; or whether they want to give other males the significant benefits they enjoy through circumcision.

Perhaps now, we are at a turning point with respect to routine circumcision. The proven protection that it provides against HIV infection offers a potent argument in favour. If we miss this opportunity, the United Kingdom will increasingly become the land of the uncut.

Are Women Interested?

[The following question and answer is taken from the October 2008 edition of H & E Nativist. The question was submitted by the Acorn member, R.W. – Manchester.]

Question:

I was interested in the question in the July issue about circumcision. To some people, circumcision is a fetish and raises all sorts of discussions for and against the practice – the naked glans versus the foreskin. I was circumcised at the age of three when it was considered the thing to do among certain classes, but nevertheless was still embarrassing to discuss.

Over the years I lost my embarrassment, especially when I became a nativist and saw how many men were circumcised. I know that many people consider it an improvement and I have also discovered that there are women attracted to men who are circumcised. They are called acuculophilic and a book has been published explaining this fascination with circumcision. I do not believe that any male should be circumcised at someone else's behest and that includes religious circumcision.

Answer:

I have often thought it was about time a woman's view was sought on this issue and your letter has given me the opportunity. While circumcision might well be a fascination for some people, I don't think it can be classed as a fetish.

That word, from the Portuguese 'fetich', meaning sorcery or witchcraft, came from the Guinea coast of Africa where it was used to describe especially designated objects used in primitive tribal worship, often with some kind of magical or sexual connection. These weird-looking things were made of natural materials – feathers, animal hairs or skins, even pieces of human bones, but in modern times the description has been extended to include manufactured materials such as rubber, plastics and silk and satin, for instance. Even my own admitted fascination with shoes (leather, plastic, shiny metallic, heels etc) can be called a fetish these days, but circumcision – no, I don't think so.

What you are talking about here is something used more generally to describe objects or parts of the body that command intense sexual interest and is better referred to as an obsessive interest.

The word acuculophilic refers to the Greek word for acorn so it is easy to see the connection here, with the head of the top of a circumcised penis looking a bit like the fruit of the oak tree. But even though, as you say, a book has been written about it, I wonder just how many women there are who are obsessively attracted to circumcised men. To be quite honest, I don't think there are very many women – hardly any in fact – who are this way inclined. When a woman first meets a man, what comes through and is of most importance, is their character and personality, and whether a man is circumcised or not is one of the least important factors in a relationship.

You don't think to yourself: "I wonder if he has been circumcised and if he's not, he can take a running jump." Well, that's my experience anyway, as well as that of all the female friends and acquaintances I know.

Okay – in naturism, the penis is in full view, so we can see instantly if a man is circumcised or not, but exactly the same etiquette applies as if he were fully clothed. One thing I do agree on is that no man (or woman either) should be circumcised on a whim or some religious belief, although I do realise there may sometimes be exceptional circumstances to take into consideration.

It has been an interesting exercise dealing with your letter, but at the end of the day I would say that it is mainly men and not women that have the most interest in this subject.

[Note by R.W. – The book that I referred to in my letter was An Innocent Obsession by David Catesby. The book was compiled by David from notes left by his wife after her death in a motor accident. She was the main acuculophiliac concerned, but many of her friends and associates were active in the subject of circumcision. My main criticism of the book is that it promotes circumcision as an aid to male hygiene but never mentions the protection circumcision offers to the male from unhygienic women.]

The Right Thing To Do

As to the real logic of circumcision, I find it impossible to accept God telling some 90-something old man to circumcise himself with a sharp rock; I believe that it all came out of the weather and stinky guys facing the fact that cheese dicks smelled poorly and the foreskin which was a problem could be fairly easily removed, especially at the beginning of the second week of life. Don't forget that the largely Muslim Arabs also remove the foreskin (same weather).

Now, my father who was anti-semitic was heatedly opposed to circumcision; thus my operation at 29. This old guy believed that the largely Jewish medical doctors found a way to increase their pay during the Great Depression by advising circumcision for all boys at the princely rate of $50 even though the whole delivery and prenatal care was $100. Folks were having fewer children during the Depression Years and every male delivery was a very nice addition to the doctor's income. I know that the charge shrunk (poor choice of words) over the years because my cousin was circumcised for $17 according to my aunt.

I had to convince my Jewish lawyer to circumcise his own son by telling him that it hurt a helluva lot more as an adult and no boy was about to have the conversation requesting same at a later date. I told him that I was sure that he was going to hang out with other Jewish boys and that it was a stupid move not to let him fit in. I reminded a nurse when I was having seven way bypass that she had never even asked her sons the question even though they were in a highly circumcised neighbourhood. I gave her food for thought, at least. The subject had come up when a Seinfeld rerun of the hilarious circumcision and bris was on in my hospital room and she chose to watch it, hooked by the lines that made her kind of vulnerable.

I still find it odd that society lets the woman have so much to say about the decision when they don't have to show their private parts anywhere near what guys have to. I am ashamed of our modern physicians who take no responsibility for advising anymore. It was the change of one vote on the small panel of the American Medical Society that left them in the "we don't recommend" position. I believe it was only about three people who made this decision but with our representative form of government folks never learn anymore because they do not read. I have the book of the physician who is still very sure that it is the right thing to do, and he was the chair of the committee for many years.

Modifying My Cock

For a long time my foreskin has been encircled by what became, over time, a series of very large piercings, originally occupied by a cluster of steel rings. Due to their interference with cock action, the rings were removed some time ago. With an erection, the said piercings created a ring of loose skin which visually interfered with the otherwise smooth shaft outline. It was also a bit of a nuisance in that it had to be held back to allow the glans rim to be effectively stimulated.

However, things have changed. With the use of a pair of small, tightly-gripped pliers, tightly knotted thread and a scalpel, over a couple of sessions recently I have cut away all my piercings; i.e. I have shortened my foreskin. OK, it's not exactly a total circumcision but it's a good start. The last cut made, and the sight of a bit of me, soft and cold on a piece of tissue on the table, was an amazing sensation.

I'm already finding it great to be (at least partially) free of foreskin. It is a real pleasure to know that my head is uncovered at all times – and for all time. I do still want to lose a bit of shaft skin to tighten it up.

Curiously, it occurs to me that when I got dressed in the morning, one thing I habitually did was to pull my foreskin forward. I'm not sure now why I ever did it, and dropping the habit was easy. What is it about circumcision that makes us want to expose and possibly desensitise our most sensitive part when it was never meant to be exposed – masochism? For example, my next goal is full exposure of my inner foreskin by tightening up the shaft to get it to stay pulled back.

I have always enjoyed being able to alter my cock, and although it has taken a number of years, I have my glans pierced, my urethral opening enlarged – held open by the end ball of a vertically placed barbell. I've had two Prince Alberts, both now cut/ broken away, adding to my sub incision. Although now somewhat faded, I did also once have my whole glans tattooed red. I also prefer the clean shaven look 'down there'. Of course my biggest change (?) is yet to come. I wonder if any other Acorn members have any advice to offer on the subject?

What's The Difference?

In the following photos, some guys are cut, some are skinned back. It isn't always easy to tell the difference.

A Foreskin Is Not Just For Christmas

I met Saul at a gay disco when I was 19. I was in my first year at Uni and quite naïve and shy. To use a cliché, I was bowled over by him. He was ten years older than me, had money, was really good looking, suave, knowledgeable about books and films, and great in bed. Within two weeks I had moved in with him.

I realised early on that he had a thing about circumcision. When we were looking at porn mags or watching videos, he would make comments like: “God, that’s a great cut” or “That guy could really do with a good trim”. He was cut himself. He had a nice cock, about six inches but quite thick and a good sized glans – great to get your tongue round! I was uncircumcised with a rosebud foreskin that extended beyond the glans. Saul was never unkind about it – he didn’t slag it off as dirty or smelly or slimy, as I’ve sometimes heard foreskins described. But he would tweak it sometimes and say things like: “You’d be better off without that” or “If you’re not careful, I’ll take my scissors to that”. I just laughed it off as a joke.

One Sunday afternoon when we were snuggling up together after sex, he whispered in my ear: “Do you know what I would really like for Christmas?” (A few days earlier I had asked him for ideas for Christmas presents.)

“What?” I asked.

“Your foreskin!”

“Pardon?”

“Your foreskin!”

“What do you mean?”

“I’d like you to get circumcised.”

I had never really thought about circumcision. Most of the boys at school, most of the guys I had had sex with, were uncircumcised. Occasionally, you came across a cut guy – so what? I had never even asked Saul about when or why he had been circumcised. It was a non-issue.

But I was infatuated with Saul, it was obviously an issue for him, so, after thinking about it for a few days, I said “Yes”. Saul arranged for me to see a private doctor and to say that I was getting irritation from my foreskin. The doctor didn’t even ask me to drop my pants; he just wrote a letter of referral.

Saul came with me to the surgeon. When the surgeon examined me, he asked: “How much foreskin would you like me to remove?” Saul answered: “Oh, the lot! And the frenulum.” The surgeon looked quizzically at me, but I just nodded. In those days, I knew nothing about the different types of circumcision. I just thought a circumcision was a circumcision.

So I ended up with what I now know to be a high and very tight circumcision. As Saul said, with obvious pleasure: “You’ve been well and truly skinned.” Saul nursed me through the aftercare. I had very little pain. The only real discomfort was erections – I slept away from Saul for a couple of weeks! – and a very tender glans, fully exposed for the first time. Once I was healed, we could have sex again – and it was hot. My circumcised cock gave Saul a fantastic turn-on. He loved to run his tongue round the scar and in the groove where the frenulum had been. He just couldn't give me enough blow jobs and every one was fantastic. I was in danger of ODing on oral!

A few weeks later, Saul ended it and threw me out. He said he was bored with the relationship. I was devastated. I was also very upset about my foreskin. I didn't mind being circumcised. It was neat and clean and sex was just as good as before. But I felt that I had been tricked out of my foreskin. I learnt later that Saul had done this sort of thing before. I don't think it was deliberate. He just liked guys younger than himself but didn't like their foreskins. So he persuaded them to dispose of them. He probably thought he was doing them a favour. But as far as I was concerned, I had sacrificed a permanent part of myself for a temporary relationship. After all, to adapt a phrase, a foreskin is not just for Christmas, it's for life!

Forcible Retraction

Since birth, my son had an undescended testicle that occasionally allowed gravity to prevail. He needed to have an orchioplasty: a surgical reconstruction of the testes. It was also recently discovered that along with the undescended testicle, he had an inguinal hernia. Both were to be operated on in our local Children's Hospital. We authorised ONLY these two necessary medical procedures.

Prior to the surgery, during our consultation with the surgeon, we specifically explained our two utmost concerns. One of our strongest concerns, aside from our son being put under anaesthesia and receiving a caudal epidural block, was that his genital integrity should not be compromised. We explained to the surgeon that we had made the educated decision to refuse to circumcise our son when he was born. One of the last things the surgeon said to us during the consultation was that it was a non-issue that our son was intact. He said absolutely nothing about adhesions, phimosis or retractability of the foreskin, all of which he later claimed to be the basis of his decision to perform this cruel procedure.

It wasn't until hours after the surgery, during a diaper change in a rest area on the way home from the hospital, that we realised, to our horror and disgust, that the surgeon had forcibly retracted our son's foreskin. Just as most babies' and toddlers' prepuces and glans are adherent in nature, our son's foreskin was only about halfway retractable and otherwise fused, prior to surgery. During his diaper change (post-surgery), we realised what had happened to our son, as his foreskin retracted completely, revealing blood, and a red, raw, open wound. Fortunately, the effects of the anaesthesia still had not worn off during this incident.

We were not asked permission to allow the surgeon to perform this barbaric procedure and certainly would not have given any authorisation to do so. We were not advised by anyone after the surgery (until the surgeon returned our urgent phone calls once we were back at home) that our son's prepuce was forcibly and surgically stripped away from his glans penis (just as a fingernail would be torn from the nail bed), prematurely exposing what should be an internal organ. The surgeon's excuse for performing this horrific procedure was that our son had a (phony and commonly over/mis-diagnosed in prepubescent boys) condition called phimosis, as well as adhesions and a build up of smegma. The definition of phimosis did not apply to our son and certainly shouldn't apply to anyone as young as our son. Our son's previous paediatrician, whom we trusted whole-heartedly with guidance on how to care for our son's intact penis and who had seen our son just prior to our move to another state, never raised any concern over phimosis, smegma build up or adhesions.

Because of the actions of the surgeon forcibly tearing the flesh of the balano-preputial lamina (which connects the foreskin and glans – the synechia membrane) and destroying the skin that is considered the first line of defence, our son has experienced swelling, redness, painful urination, sleepless nights and anxiety. Our son has been exposed to potential iatrogenic infection, adhesions and acquired phimosis. During his most recent bath, our son retracted his own foreskin no longer halfway, but about three-quarters of the way, revealing adhesions that have already re-attached the glans to the prepuce, preventing any further retraction. We can only hope this condition will resolve itself over time, allowing him natural, non-painful, full retractability by or near puberty as should naturally have happened. Although, it is disheartening to say, we have been advised by medical professionals and doctors that our son will probably need to have the foreskin surgically separated from the scar-connected glans in the future (as the synechia has already been damaged).

Our son is two years old and had many years before him for his foreskin to naturally separate from the glans in a non-traumatic fashion without any uninvited medical intervention. Our son has been traumatised. His body has been violated. He will likely suffer further physical, mental and emotional pain throughout life and consequently, require additional surgeries to correct his penis, all of which would have been avoided had the surgeon only performed the two authorised procedures.

Just How Drunk Do You Have To Be?

[From the internet blog of a triage nurse]

Drunk man in triage won't tell me why he is here, refuses to talk to anyone but the doctor, and "it better not be some God damn girl either". It's a small ER and we are not busy so I walk him back to a room even though I am annoyed and tempted to let him have a therapeutic wait.

Doctor (man) comes out of the room a few minutes later and he is chuckling and shaking his head. Apparently the man had gotten drunk a few days earlier and decided he wanted to be circumcised so he got out his trusty buck knife and trimmed off his foreskin. By now we are all cringing a bit. The doctor goes on to tell us that, as if that wasn't enough, a couple of nights later while drunk he decided to trim it up a bit and make it a little neater. Now it is terribly infected and he'll probably need surgery.

So we were all wondering, just how drunk DO you have to be to circumcise yourself? He ended up with a couple of surgeries, a suprapubic catheter and a prolonged hospital stay due to the infection and the DT's.

Too Much

I like foreskin on men, but I have been with a few that just have too much of it. When they are soft, it can be rather ugly. I like appealing cocks – a guy can be attractive and have an ugly cock. That is a big turn off to me.

Don't get me wrong. I have gotten past the initial shock of an ugly cock, if it is clean, and smells good. Some guys with foreskin need to keep the thing clean. I am not giving a hummer to a guy with a smelly dick – it is just not going to happen.

When the cock is hard, the foreskin can be pulled back, exposing the head – if it has not grown too tight around the head. This can be a painful thing for the man with the foreskin. Some men have had the foreskin removed because of this.

I have to say I like a little foreskin; it gives my tongue something to do! As far as getting some of the foreskin removed, it can be done, and it is a rather minor surgery. Carlos had some of his foreskin removed – not all of it, just some excess. I have to say he did it to please me; I mean, I loved him anyway, but we have good communication between the two of us. It has made our sex life better. He said his excess foreskin was sometimes a nuisance, and caused him some pain. He says that sex is better now for him... So there you have my thoughts and my experience of it... Carlos has a very pretty cock now, soft or hard.

Circumcision Is An Art

Issue 2008-3 was as interesting as ever, but I seemed to detect some concern about the future of circumcision. Apparently, less circumcisions are being performed nowadays than, say, thirty years ago. It seems that the NHS abandoned the practice in the 1950s and even private practitioners are performing less circumcisions. It is an art in my opinion, and one that is less available due to a dearth of skilful people able to perform the operation.

It is an art, when one considers what is involved to achieve the result required through whatever technique or method is used. I watched Dr Z remove my frenulum and some skin from the shaft in August 2006 and appreciated his skill and patience. I hope society does not lose the skilled men or women able to perform this service for those who desire or require circumcision.

I was circumcised in 1941 at the age of three, at the behest of my mother and due to phimosis. At first and for many years I was embarrassed by my circumcision because I knew I looked different from other boys who were uncircumcised at the time. It gave rise to some sniggers and ribald comments, as one would expect from certain members of our neighbourhood who didn't understand. As time passed I appreciated my circumcised condition more and more, especially after my re-circ in 2006. In my opinion, circumcision should be available to all boys and men, when they say they require it and not as an act of compulsion or for religious reasons. Males should have the last word on what happens to their bodies.

Good Advice?

Reader 1: My husband and I are adopting a baby boy from another country. He will be around 8 months old when we bring him home. Please tell me the reasons to and the reasons not to have him circumcised. We're not sure of the health benefits of circumcision. We don't want to cause him any unnecessary pain.

Doctor: Circumcision is not necessary. The procedure is traumatic shortly after birth, when it is ordinarily performed, but it can be a serious discomfort for children your son's age. Follow your pediatrician's advice, but, in my opinion, circumcision can be avoided. Your job with your new child is to be supportive and prevent discomfort, not to start off on the wrong foot.

Reader 2: It never ceases to amaze me when adult men reject circumcision for newborns. The woman who wrote to you for advice on this subject because she was adopting a baby boy from another country asked for both pros and cons, but you gave her only the negatives. We all know that circumcision is not necessary, but an uncircumcised penis is never as clean as a circumcised one. I have been told this by almost every woman that I have been intimate with. And yes, I do bathe every day and before every date. But more than one long-term girlfriend has told me that it is very off-putting in bed.

I know this is not the one and only reason to have a baby circumcised, but men do not seem to want to admit that this can create problems in the bedroom. I also read years ago that almost all cases of cancer of the penis were associated with an uncircumcised organ. In the case of the woman who wrote to you, I would be more concerned that she was considering the procedure for a baby boy already 8 months old. In my opinion, it should be done shortly after birth to minimize discomfort or not done at all.

Reader 3: I agree. But circumcision is a very personal matter. In any case, uncircumcised men would do well to pay meticulous attention to cleanliness. If this doesn't work, adult circumcision is a viable option.

Reader 4: My father has just had surgery to remove a growth on his penis that was cancerous. It is believed that the cause was from not being circumcised. I, too, have problems caused by not being circumcised. My question is, what should I do? Is this treatable with medication, or is surgery necessary? I pray you can give me some guidance.

Doctor: Penile cancer is more common in men who haven't been circumcised than those who have. If you are having difficulties, such as chronic infection or cancer, you should see a urologist for advice and treatment. Although adult circumcision is uncomfortable for several weeks after the surgery, it may be your best option. Follow the specialist's suggestions.

Circumcision For Converts

[A question, with answer by Shaykh Hamza Karamali from SunniPath, the Online Islamic Academy.]

Q. Can you explain the ruling regarding circumcision in the Shafii madhab? Is it wajib or even fardh? And does a new convert get circumcised according to Shafii madhab? I am asking for a brother who recently accepted Islam and follows the Shafii madhab and wants to know the ruling for him regarding the circumcision, since he would have to expose his awrah to another man.

A. All scholars agree that circumcision is a religiously praiseworthy act, but they differ regarding its obligation. The position of the Shafi'i school is that circumcision is obligatory, but other scholars have held that circumcision is merely recommended. Because of this difference of opinion, scholars are generally easy-going and gentle with recent converts to Islam on the issue of circumcision.<sup>[1]</sup> The most important goal with new Muslims is to preserve and nurture their newfound faith, and imposing difficult rulings such as circumcision on them early on may well drive them away from Islam altogether. If, of his own accord, a new Muslim insists that he wants to get circumcised, he will be doing something praiseworthy by scholarly agreement. It would be permissible for him to reveal his nakedness to the doctor to get circumcised, although this would have to be limited to the extent of the need.

And Allah knows best.

[1] Shaykh Amjad mentioned that the scholars of Hadramawt do not emphasize the issue of circumcision when calling desert Bedouins – most of whom do not get circumcised – to religious practice. Imam Hasan al-Basri used to say, “People – black and white – accepted Islam and whether or not they had ever been circumcised was never made a matter of investigation.”

Australian Doctors Rethink Anti-Circumcision Stance

By Jason Gale, [bloomberg.net]

Australian health officials may want to encourage greater use of circumcision for infant boys as research shows the procedure can help prevent the spread of HIV, the country's top AIDS expert said at an AIDS conference in Sydney, Australia last year.

The surgical procedure performed on adult men in Africa reduced their chances of getting HIV through heterosexual intercourse by as much as 60 percent, according to the World Health Organization. The finding is encouraging doctors in Australia to rethink their opposition to the practice, David Cooper, director of the National Centre in HIV Epidemiology and Clinical Research in Sydney, said in an interview. "I think the stance will be softened and that pediatricians and obstetricians will explain to parents a more balanced view of the advantages and disadvantages of circumcision", Cooper said. Doctors are "looking at it with less disdain than they did several years ago".

After the Second World War, Australia conducted routine circumcision of all newborn boys, partly to avoid hygiene problems related to germs that can linger in unwashed foreskins. The millennia-old technique, which involves removing a sleeve of skin covering the tip of the penis, fell out of favour in the mid-1970s as doctors concluded that the risks of surgery outweighed the benefits. Data collected in 2004 showed fewer than one in eight Australian males are circumcised by six months of age. In the U.S., more than two-thirds of adult men have had the procedure, mostly in infancy. "There is always going to be a controversy about whether to be cut or uncut," said Cooper, who is also a professor of medicine at the University of New South Wales. "It's now pretty clear that it's a low-risk procedure and does have a lot of benefits in addition to protecting against HIV."

Circumcision, considered a rite of passage in some religions and cultures, is controversial because the surgery may introduce infection, and cause bleeding, nerve and tissue damage. Some researchers say it's unlikely to stem the spread of HIV in Australia, where 83 percent of the 16,400 people living with the virus are men who acquired it through sex with men, rather than heterosexual intercourse. "As most HIV infections in homosexual men occur after receptive anal sex, circumcision is unlikely to be an effective HIV prevention intervention in Australian gay men," researchers at the center said in a study presented at an AIDS conference in Sydney. "It's a very effective intervention, but you have to have a certain prevalence of the infection to make it an effective prevention strategy", Lewin said in an interview at the AIDS meeting. "In Australia, you would have to be circumcising a lot of men to prevent one case. I think as a strategy in Australia, it's unlikely it will be taken up."

When other circumcision-related health benefits are weighed, the procedure "could be recommended by doctors in Australia", said Robert Bailey, professor of epidemiology at the University of Illinois in Chicago, who led one of the circumcision studies in Africa. He continued: "Certainly parents ought to be fully informed of all the benefits as well as the risks of circumcision. It is plausible that circumcision may reduce HIV transmission in men who have sex with men because circumcised men have a lower incidence of herpes and other ulcer-causing genital diseases that provide openings for HIV to enter and exit the body. Also human papilloma virus, the wart-causing virus linked with certain cancers, is less common in circumcised men. It is very well established that cervical cancer is much more common in the female partners of uncircumcised men, and penile cancer is less common in circumcised men.”

Royston's Little Op

Royston has been having UTI problems since one month old. He's been through so many urine tests and has been under antibiotic since the first month. Yet each time, the urine test showed germ infection. After several tests and, with each time, a different germ being found, the doctor is beginning to suspect that Royston might not have UTI after all. He might be just having infection at his foreskin area. He has seen two paediatricians and both recommended circumcision for him. So, yesterday, we brought Royston to a doctor recommended by Raffles Hospital for the op.

At the clinic, the doctor begins by explaining to us how common circumcision is in the States and among some ethnic groups and how simple the process is. And given his age, he'll recover in a few days time. The op begins by the doctor using a marker to make a mark on his foreskin. That will be where he'll cut. After that, he stabbed Royston at the base of his penis with the anaesthetic jabs (yes, he really uses stabbing actions to pop the needle in). I think that is the most painful part of the op as Royston cries during the jabs. But I think the anaesthetic worked immediately because Royston is back to normal in a while.

The doctor then proceeds to use several pincers to pull on the foreskin and hold it in place. Next, he uses his ops scissors and cuts the extended foreskin away. And the final procedure is to put in a plastic ring around the penis to protect the wound for the next few days. That ring will automatically drop by itself in 4-6 days time.

The whole op took about ten minutes at the most and there's little blood. So not too scary. But for the next two days, my poor Royston might feel a little pain when the anaesthetic effect wears off. Hopefully with this op, his germ in urine problem will be gone and spare his body those antibiotic treatments. He'll go for his review and urine test next week. Hope for the best.

Oh ya, in case you want to know: the op cost me $481 bucks!

Penile Washing After Sex Not A Substitute For Circumcision

Cleaning the penis after vaginal sex does not protect a man from infection with HIV, according to a study conducted in Rakai, Uganda and presented in the circumcision session at the Fourth International AIDS Society Conference in Sydney in July. Dr Fredrick Makumbi of Makerere University Institute of Public Health, Uganda, who presented the study, said that his study team had been surprised by this finding given that genital hygiene has long been thought to be protective against sexually transmitted infection. He emphasised that men who washed using soap a few minutes after intercourse had the highest risk of infection with HIV. He speculated that this could be because washing with soap and failure to dry resulted in wetness, increasing the chance of cells becoming inflamed and thus more vulnerable to infection with HIV. Dr Makumbi also suggested that washing soon after sex could remove enzymes in vaginal fluid that help neutralise HIV.

Three randomised controlled trials in Africa have shown that men who are circumcised have a lower risk of becoming infected with HIV. However, circumcision is not universally possible or acceptable, and genital hygiene has been suggested as an alternative. Therefore, investigators from the large Rakai circumcision trial analysed data from 2,552 uncircumcised, HIV-negative men to establish if post-coital washing helped to protect men against infection with HIV. Investigators interviewed men about their cleaning habits after they have sex. This was correlated to the incidence of HIV seroconversion during the study. During a total of 4,378 follow-up interviews, 83.0% of men reported cleaning after each time they had sexual intercourse. The HIV incidence in this group was not significantly different to that in the group who never cleaned, 1.69 per 100 patient years versus 1.22 per 100 patient years, respectively. When men who cleaned were asked how soon after intercourse they usually cleaned, almost half (49.2%) responded that they clean within three minutes. In this group of men, HIV incidence was 2.32 per 100 patient years. This was significantly higher than the incidence of 0.39 per 100 patient years among men who waited at least 10 minutes after sex before cleaning. That is to say that waiting 10 minutes before cleaning decreased the HIV incidence to less than 20% of that among men who washed right away.

Differences were also noted in HIV incidence depending on what cleaning method was used. Washing only, reported in 46.9% of interviews, was associated with an incidence of 2.20 per 100 patient years. Using a cloth and washing was used in 40.6% of cases and was associated with an incidence of 1.04 per 100 patient years. And using only a dry cloth, 12.4% of cases, was associated with the lowest incidence, 0.55 per 100 patient years ( $p = 0.0442$ ). In conclusion, the authors noted that while cleaning the penis after sex is common in this rural Ugandan population, caution should be taken in promoting it as an alternative to circumcision.

Editorial

A Happy New Year! And apologies that this, the last newsletter of 2008, is a little late.

This edition has a European flavour. My editor's column talks of the Cutting Club, an internet club for circumcised men, based in Germany. There are well over 5000 cut men, mainly German, which is at least a start in creating a more circumcision friendly culture. There is also news of a Hungarian website promoting circumcision, plus an account from one Hungarian of how he lost his foreskin. All this is some antidote to the news from Denmark in the last edition about a possible ban on male circumcision for boys under 15 years of age.

Time passes, and once again we are at subscription renewal time. I hope that you have enjoyed the 2008 Acorn experience and have found at least something of interest in each newsletter. It is amazing how much there is to say on this subject that fascinates us all. Please check your details and let us have your payments. Unfortunately we can no longer accept postal orders. UK cheques or cash only please.

The Cutting Club

For men absorbed by the subject of circumcision, the internet has been a god-send. Twenty years ago, guys with this interest were isolated. They felt that they were unique, peculiar even, in the nature of their preoccupation. Finding others with a similar interest was revelatory and indeed the Acorn Society was a trailblazer in this respect. It allowed members to explore openly their fascination with circumcision, an interest which previously they had felt necessary to bury. For many, it was simultaneously exhilarating and cathartic.

The coming of the internet has revealed just how ubiquitous the interest in circumcision is. This fascination transcends language, religion and age group and spreads across all continents. And why should this not be so? Circumcision is perhaps the oldest and is certainly the most widely practised surgery on males. Its survival from antiquity through to the present day is witness to its utility and to the benefits it is still seen to confer. Even today, circumcision is a life enhancing experience for many men. The removal of foreskin validates their masculinity.

Internet aficionados will be familiar with the many web based groups dedicated to circumcision. Typically, these are mailing lists where any member can send messages to all other members, exploring any aspect of the topic that interests them. The way in which messages are configured can differ from list to list. On some, you can explore a thread – a group of messages on a particular issue sequenced in date order; on others, all messages are placed in chronological order.

The Cutting Club is rather different. This is an internet club for cut men. It is based in Germany (www.cuttingclub.de). However, it has English translations of the main pages and many of the members are either British or English speaking. There are two levels of membership. The basic level is free. The premium level costs €2 a month.

There are 5789 members overall and 214 in Great Britain. Members are asked to complete a short profile of themselves. This includes height, weight, body type, cock length and diameter, age when cut, style of cut, sexual tendency, and preferences with respect to sexual activities – active/passive in relation to wanking, mutual masturbation, oral and anal. Of course any or all of these fields can be left blank. Thumbnail photos can also be posted. Some members post no pics, some of face only and some of their members.

It is possible to sort through the members and select on criteria such as geographical location, age etc. Any of the members can be contacted by email via the website. One then has a choice as to whether to respond; and a dialogue and who knows what else can ensue.

There is a whole range of photo galleries on the site. In these a selection of (usually attractive younger) men display their bodies and more particularly their cocks – all well circumcised, of course. There is also a selection of videos in which those cut cocks are put through their paces in a variety of situations.

Some galleries and videos are available to all members but the full range can only be accessed by premium members. However, ordinary members can earn points by uploading stories or photos, and these points can then be used to access the premium member materials.

One feature of the home page is 'member of the week' in which a recent member, and particularly his member, is highlighted. There are also members' stories. These are usually outlines rather than detailed accounts. For instance, one member wrote:

"At the age of ten I was interested in what other boys had in their trousers for the first time. We compared our dicks while showering after going for a swim. My best classmate was circumcised and bragged about his dick and I asked myself why I hadn't been circumcised. That was the time when I wanted it too. I wanted to be like him and other circumcised boys in my class. A phimosis was diagnosed shortly after and fortunately I had to undergo circumcision anyway. I'm really honest about it. Even today I like circumcised boys better than the ones with a 'sausage casing'!"

There is also an advice section where a doctor (Dr Cutter!) sympathetic to circumcision answers any queries on the subject. For instance:

Q: I was circumcised eight years ago and I am satisfied with my foreskin-free penis. However, if I have an erection it hurts at the bottom side of the glans and the glans bends downwards. Is there anything I can do to make it better?

A: The frenulum actually does have merit in an uncircumcised penis. It keeps hold of the foreskin. Without the frenulum the foreskin, if it isn't a really tight one, would slide back and forth anchorlessly. Normally it should be possible to pull back the skin if the penis is fully erect without the frenulum dragging too firmly on the glans and causing tension.

However, 30 per cent of all uncircumcised men have a frenulum that is too short. If it is kept like that after a circumcision it often tenses at the bottom side of the glans = especially if the little ribbon is too short. In this case it will pull under the glans which will lead to distortion of the penis eventually. Empirically untreated cases like that lead to a break of the frenulum which is really painful and accompanied by heavy bleeding most of the time. Furthermore micro breaks can arise that can result in scars during the healing process. By further breaks the tissue can scar over again and the flexibility of the frenulum gets more and more limited. Only a full removal of the frenulum can avoid problems like these. A frenulum that has been removed this way will lead to an even skin surface and therefore is desirable for aesthetic reasons.

There are also a number of articles on aspects of circumcision. Recent additions include: Circumcision does not repress appetite for sex and With a foreskin, there is a higher HIV-risk!

What is perhaps most amazing about the site is that it is German based. It has always been thought that Germany, with its anti-semitic past, was a country where circumcision had made few inroads. If such an internet club can flourish in Germany, why isn't there an English speaking equivalent based in the UK or the USA? Perhaps, if there were an internet savvy member, the Acorn Society itself could sponsor such an innovation. Any volunteers?

A Hungarian Circumcision

I was circumcised as an adult, shortly after my 35th birthday, and I am very satisfied with the results of the operation, the look, the easy care etc. I am also very proud of my circumcised penis, I feel that it helped me to be more sure of my manliness.

In our country (Hungary), circumcision is very seldom performed. It is a usual rite among religious Jews, but most of the people of Jewish origin in our country have abandoned circumcision. Obviously, circumcision is performed for medical reasons to treat severe phimosis or other penile illness, but the operation is unknown as a social custom or a standard prophylactic measure. (I believe that none of my classmates at school was circumcised, except for possibly one boy.)

In our family circumcision was never mentioned nor practised. Like most boys, I was born with a tight foreskin that was loosened when I was 3. However, I had a lot of problems with my tightish prepuce and I highly disliked pulling it back and washing it. These sorts of troubles ended when I started to masturbate at around 13 with pulling the skin back and forth, and the regular motion of my foreskin over the glans made the opening large enough and the skin loose enough.

I first came across with the term 'circumcision' when I got Dr. Spock's best-seller, Baby and Child Care in my hands which was (then) advocating circumcision as standard care of the penis. (I understand that later he changed his views and was not recommending circumcision.) Though I cannot remember when I had first seen a circumcised penis, I do remember that I was very much impressed with the result of the operation. In later years I read as much on that subject as I could, including ethnographical books and travellers' memoirs on circumcisions among native Africans and Australians, books on religious customs (i.e. Jews and Muslims), as well as medical and sexual advisory books, pamphlets and popular Q&A publications. Thus I learned that circumcision is a social 'must' in the USA and in several other English speaking countries, and I also read personal accounts of men who chose to be circumcised as teens or adults.

From my readings I became an ardent (though quite silent) fan of circumcision, but I did not have the courage or the possibility to submit to circumcision. Nevertheless, I kept my foreskin retracted as often and as long as I could. (Actually, I wanted to try how it feels to be circumcised, plus I wished to look circumcised when changing for doing sports or in the showers.) Then, about four years ago I developed a tiny infection on my glans. First I was very scared of having something more serious (i.e. a cancer or the like), as I learned that the lack of circumcision might result in such illness. (Actually, it was not sore or itching.) After two or three weeks, I went to see a friend of mine who became an MD. He looked at my penis and told me that it was a minor fungus infection. He gave me a prescription for a cream and suggested that I keep the foreskin fully pulled back until the infection disappeared. He explained that fungi, like normal mushrooms, grow in a warm and humid environment like underneath an un-retracted prepuce, while the bare glans always stays dry which prevents such infections. He added that this is the basic rationale behind circumcision among the people living under a hot climate, and he said that he would recommend circumcision if I was ready to go for that. I knew that he, though himself uncircumcised, was in favour of circumcision as a doctor. (We did actually discuss that issue years before. Then it turned out that his younger son had to be cut for health reasons.) Though I murmured something like "I am too old for it", in fact, I decided to have it done if and when I had the time and courage.

A few months later I called him and asked his help to find a urologist willing to do a circumcision without apparent medical reasons. He was not surprised at all; moreover, he said he supported my decision and agreed to help. Within a few days he assigned me to a well-known urologist in town, with whom I made the necessary arrangements and he performed the operation on a cold Friday morning in February 1996. I was circumcised under local anaesthesia, and the operation lasted only about half an hour. I received a tight bandage, and my penis looked like a mummy, fully covered with cloths.

After a brief rest I was able to go to work, so I did not miss a day. I felt no pain at or ever after the operation. (Actually, the surgery assistant told me that he underwent the same and the operation is a lot less painful after the late twenties than before.) To my surprise, the dressing was removed the following day. I was very excited to see the new look of my male organ. It was great. The glans was bare and free from any excess skin. It seemed to be a bit swollen, but the doc told me that it was normal. I was told to be careful when taking a shower and to avoid any situation that may cause an erection.

I received a low, fairly tight circumcision. The skin of the shaft was seamed to the skin right beneath the ridge of the glans, so I was left with no inner foreskin and the frenulum was also removed. I had no problems with getting used to the circumcised penis, as I had kept the foreskin fully pulled back for several months before the operation. I found that, though the skin of the glans became coarse and dry, I had lost no sensitivity at all.

The circumcised penis helps penetration, as there is no excess skin moving back and forth, so the contact with the female organs is direct and very exciting. I am still coming very soon, sometimes too soon. As circumcision is rare in our country, I was afraid about what my friends with whom I did sports would say about my circumcision. I expected they would laugh at me or pull my leg, but I experienced no negative reactions at all. They were a bit surprised, though they said they understood my reasons. I met my wife after my circumcision. She had had no experience with the circumcised organ before and she is very fond of my form. We agreed that if we have sons born (which we hope to happen a.s.a.p.) the boys will get circumcised before they leave the hospital.

As I am still very interested in circumcision, I have searched the topic on the Internet too. (It was long after my own circumcision.) I was very much amazed to stumble on the many anti-cut sites which made me a bit nervous about my decision, but I realised quite soon that the information they give is inaccurate and highly biased.

Hungarian Circumcision Website

The foregoing is an account of my circumcision in February 1996 at the age of 35. Two years later, I started to use the Internet. Naturally, the phrase 'circumcision' was one of the first things I searched on the net. I found an incredible amount of material there, in favour of circumcision as well as against it. I was quite surprised to learn that RIC is so hotly debated in the USA. I thought it was so much of an established social practice that it was beyond any dispute, just like breathing or eating, or just as smallpox vaccination.

I read through everything I could and I realised that most of the anti-circumcision propaganda is a simple lie, and thus very dangerous. Everything they wrote about being circumcised was so different from my own experience. In the meantime, I was pleased to find the pro-circumcision websites and I was thrilled to find many circumcised Hungarians as well.

I started browsing the Hungarian web, I think, in 2000, and then I found many discussion forums, 'ask the doctor' and FAQ places which dealt with circumcision. Having read them, I made a few findings:

- Many teenage boys and young men struggle with a variety of penis problems, mostly with tight foreskins.
- There is a lot of mis-information and lack of information about circumcision. Many men would not even know what exactly they cut off when a man gets circumcised nor what a circumcised penis looks like.
- Despite all of the foregoing, circumcision is not all that rare and unusual in Hungary.
- Non-medical and non-religious circumcisions are also something not unheard of in Hungary, so I was not a complete fool either when I got it done at 35, without any medical reason.

Reading was soon followed by writing, and I started responding to questions put up in discussion forums, and wrote private e-mails to those who asked about circumcision. In the course of my correspondence I have not only helped many boys and men, but I have also learned a lot. I also got into contact with Dr Ferenc Fekete who started his private men's health clinic in the early 1990s. He is now the most renowned specialist in adult male circumcision in Hungary and does about 120-150 circumcisions per year.

I have also realised from my correspondence that many boys and men do not even understand that they should go to a doctor and that the example of others, of those who have already had the operation, may be crucial for them in taking the first step. Many of them find me with their questions, and now I often get questions from women whose husband, boyfriend or son has a problem.

The idea of the website is not my own, even though I have been of the view that a popular, though still professional, website could be very useful. A few years ago there was a short-lived trial, which was carried out by a young guy in his mid-20s who got circumcised in 2001, but that site became inactive after a few months. (The said page was revived last year by its owner; however, it has still been quite inactive to date.)

In early autumn 2005, I started to exchange e-mails with a young guy also in his mid-20s, who was up for circumcision that October. He was having it done partly from choice, partly because of a minor tightness. After his circumcision, he asked why not to create a properly done website; if I could supply the contents, he would be happy to do the IT parts, as he was working as a website designer. We started working, and quite soon we came up with the basic concept for the new website. We decided that our website:

- Should be nicely done in terms of graphical display, and should convey the idea of safety and cleanliness, and thus be appealing to the eye, trustworthy and convincing.
- Should be a site which a mother of a toddler boy or a young teenager may look at without any problems. Therefore, despite the fact that it is to be about the male genitalia, there should not be anything which is of direct sexual or pornographic content.
- Should clearly state that we do not give medical advice, so browsing through should not replace a visit to a doctor, even though all information on the page should be accurate and properly verified.

While doing the IT work on our future website, we continued collecting materials, and whenever I discussed circumcision with someone, I always made reference to the page in the making. We were both pleasantly surprised by the reception of the idea, and people always asked about when they should expect the page to be up and running. Once the test version was ready, we showed it to many people, and we got extremely good feedback.

Since we both had jobs, and the home page making was voluntary work, the whole process was quite slow. At one point, we sought help from another 'club member' and another IT specialist who completed the work for some money. (Otherwise, the whole exercise was done on a free of charge basis, except that we have to pay for the ISP to keep up the website.)

After about 18 month of work, we could open the page in August 2007. In the past 14-16 months, the website (www.korulmeteles.hu, all in Hungarian) has proved to be immensely successful. It has also become very clear that this kind of information is very necessary especially as most young people now get their information via the Internet. Such information was not previously available in Hungarian.

There are about 3-5 new circumcisions every month which I help the guys to get through or help them after the operation. I also receive many personal accounts and even photos before and after, which I put onto the website. Honestly, I am very proud of it.

Andras – Budapest

Denmark And Circumcision

[In the Editorial, issue 5/2008, it was noted that Denmark may be about to ban circumcision for boys until the age of 15. R.W. responds.]

In my opinion, Denmark has got it just about right in banning the circumcision of boys until the age of fifteen. I would go even further; and ban circumcision until any boy or man requests it. All males should have the right to determine what happens to their bodies. Religious circumcision is an anachronism and not in keeping with the modern world.

If, or when, a boy decides to have a circumcision, it should be in full knowledge of the facts and not done at someone else's behest. It would be a great help if he was shown photographs of circumcised males with explanations of the different methods of obtaining a result. Personally, I think a circumcised penis looks a lot better than an uncircumcised one, especially when erect, but looks are not the only factor in this subject. Unless there is an urgent medical reason for the operation – let the male decide. The zealots have had their day!

Tight Foreskin.....?

Q. I am 30 and I have a tight foreskin. I am stretching and after 2 weeks I am able to pull the skin when flaccid and hold the same at erection but there is a little discomfort as the skin gets tight and I end up masturbating. I use a lube while doing this. I see that the skin has definitely loosened up a little bit but still when erect it's not coming back. Shall I continue the same process or is there any better one?

A: One thing that really helps is to sit in a warm bath and the skin gets softer. Put the forefinger and the one next to it close together on the left hand, and slide the end of the foreskin over those two fingers while you are not erect. If you are erect, you won't be able to do it. Once you slide the end over the two fingers, spread the fingers to stretch the softened end of the foreskin. Don't do it to pain, but just until you can feel the stretching sensation. Do this a few times for several sessions of warm baths and you will find that the foreskin will retract completely on its own when you become erect. Don't force the skin back when it is still too tight, cuz it can get stuck behind the crown of the knob. If the knob starts to swell, that can be a problem.

Why not a shower? Because it's easier to do it sitting and relaxed, and it's easier to keep your gear under warm water to get the skin soft. When the job is all done and the skin slides back, go back to showering.

You have good gear and you are lucky to be natural. I thank my parents that I am too. You will have amazing detail sense of feel in your Love Life and good control because you can feel more of where you are progressing to control stimulation. Always keep the skin covered over the knob when not in use to preserve the high sense of feelings in the knob and the underside of the foreskin.

Wearing It Bare

Like most uncut males, the masturbation method that I discovered at puberty and used into adulthood was moving the outer foreskin, with the inner foreskin fairly still on the head. I just assumed that jacking off was more difficult for my cut friends due to lack of a foreskin. Wanting to know how they did it and what they felt, I experimented. That's how, long before I started living skinned-back, I learned how to jack myself with the head of my penis bare.

I'd begin by pulling the loose skin all the way to the base and holding it there with the thumb and index finger of my left hand, simulating a circumcised look. With my right hand, I'd then stroke the skin on my shaft, moving it only enough to tug on the head on the backward stroke and not enough to push any over the rim on the forward stroke. I found this tugging on the head without even touching it was as stimulative as rubbing on it. I also found that my hard shaft itself was sensitive to stimulation in a duller but deeper way than the head. The three free fingers of my left hand, meanwhile, were free to play with my balls. When I'd want that additional zing to bring myself off, I'd rev up the tug rate and allow the index finger of my right hand to brush very lightly the sensitive underside of the head. This whole combination can give me a climax that I feel deeper in my internal sexual organs than just in my dick and its root.

For me, this method became the quickest way to jack off. I use it when I feel like raping my horny self to get a badly wanted orgasm as soon as possible. When I'm not as driven, and/or I have time to prolong my experience, I use the traditional method. Sometimes I make such slow, sweet love to the head of my dick and bask in its simple pleasure for so long that I almost don't care whether I orgasm or not. Sometimes when I choose to end a long session without allowing myself to come, my sexual high can last the rest of the day. Hey, I can come any time, but that's something really special! Everybody should try it once in a while. The key is deciding not to go all the way before you even start.

Skipping a few orgasms will not harm your body, so long as you ejaculate semen every week or so to flush out your system. Billions of men have practised tantric sex in India and Taoist sex in China for centuries. In both tantra and the Tao, beneficial forces are believed to accumulate in men during sessions of intercourse in which the male climax or certain of its aspects do not occur. Such men are allowed to come during sex, but the more times they opt not to, the more the mystical benefits. Unfinished masturbation is a learning tool for those wishing to make their sexual reflexes voluntary in preparation for tantric or Taoist marriage. Neither India nor China seem to have suffered any lack of fertility as a result!

...but I digress. Before adopting the skinned-back lifestyle (only a few months ago), I'd usually do a combo. I'd enjoy the traditional rub for a while until I decided to come, then I'd switch to the bare-head tug to take myself to the more profound orgasm that it would give. Since beginning to wear it bare, I use the bare-tug method more than before. That doesn't mean that I don't roll it forward now and again for the traditional foreskin rub (especially when I'm not going to finish the job). The answer is that you can do it either way. You can use the time that it takes to train your foreskin to stay back to learn how to jack yourself without a foreskin. That way, if the hoped-for foreskin shrinkage happens, you'll still be a happy man with a happy dick.

Since wearing it bare, I have noticed no loss of sensitivity to stimulation. The inner surface of my foreskin was very tender when first exposed. I put up with it, and it very slowly got more used to touching clothes, but it still has a way to go. It was never erotically sensitive anyway, just tender skin. My glans is as sensitive as ever. I'd read that it would dry out, peel off, and toughen. All that happened was an almost unnoticeably slight peel of the epidermis, just one cell layer thick (like a slight case of windburn). That was in the first week. It's the same penis it always was – just bare-headed.

I enjoy nudism, although I'm rather new to it, and I look forward to showing off my new look next summer. That's what this is all about for me. Skinning back is a way to be and feel more naked

But I'm Not Circumcised.....

A Romanian man told me about his induction into the old communist Romanian Army 20 years before the Iron Curtain fell. Daniel said his foreskin was short and tended to retract, giving him the appearance of being circumcised. Males in Romania usually were not cut, unless they were Jewish; he was therefore mistaken as a Jew when he was being inducted, totally nude, with about 100 others, none of whom were cut and most of whom joined in his persecution after the fun started.

Daniel said about half the Romanian army medical and clerical staff were females who started harassing him big time, handling his cock and balls roughly and generally taunting him because they thought he was Jewish, few of whom survived in Romania under the Nazis during WW2.

Probably fuelling this persecution, Daniel was not a communist party member, and kept wondering if he would wind up dead as this nude abuse spun out of control. You can imagine his horror at that moment – no titillation at all.

What They Did To Me

I was not circumcised at birth as I was born in Russia, where the practice was unpopular and perhaps even unheard of or even illegal. My family emigrated to the USA when I was 8, and as soon as we got here, the home of the brave and the land of scalpel wielding surgeons willing and able to disfigure young boys, everyone around me started putting on the pressure to go and 'get cut'. I come from a Jewish home and my natural whole penile status was seen as a mistake, an error that needed to be remedied immediately. Physically, there was absolutely nothing wrong with me, and yet every time I went to the JCC (Jewish community centre) pool and got in the showers, I was made to feel embarrassed or ashamed. For years before it actually happened, circumcision haunted me. My family made jokes about 'the axe' and I, being only 8 or 9, would cry myself to sleep sometimes, shaken by horror. I had nightmares about it. In fact, one of the reasons I let them talk me into it, much later, just before my Bar Mitzvah at the age of 13, was to finally get it over and done with. To rid the spectre floating constantly over my head (no pun intended).

I have since pretty much renounced my Jewish roots, but 6 years ago, when I was much more impressionable, ignorant, and naive, I was going to Hebrew school and kind of digging this whole religion thing. Part of me actually wanted to go through with the 'covenant with god', I wanted to sacrifice whatever necessary to have him on my side, and for the Jewish community to consider me 'really Jewish' and 'really a man'. So I let the rabbi and my father talk me into it. The night before the hospital appointment, I remember having crazy doubts, and then letting my father write the whole thing off as 'just a snip', a routine procedure, like getting a nail clipped.

We get to the hospital, me and another friend in an identical situation (another reason I let myself get talked into this, a good friend of mine was also doing it). This part is a bit difficult for me to think about but I guess I should just get it all out. Skip the initial proceedings and they're strapping me into the surgery bed. Yes, strapping me in, so I can't struggle. They talked me into doing it under local anaesthesia, I'm not sure how...something about money and possible complications. My dad didn't like the idea of me getting drugged up. This part drives me insane. Before any anaesthesia is applied, a female nurse comes up and begins the torturous preparation process. God this is awful, she's got a bottle of antiseptic in one hand and a firm grip on my poor, sensitive glans, which had until then never even seen the light of day. To tell you the truth, I don't think it had even fully separated from my foreskin yet. So here I am, howling like a madman, while this heartless woman is tearing the hell out of my penis, forcibly retracting the skin and dousing the head with abrasive chemicals. To add insult to injury, she not only ignores my complaints but blames it on me! Accusing me of being a dirty uncut unhygienic kid! How would she like it if I pulled out her clit hood and deadened her most sensitive parts with rubbing alcohol! God I think I've been slightly and unwillingly misogynistic ever since.

Anyway let's get to the actual thing of it. The rabbi shows up, the surgeon shows up and they get to work. I get a blindingly painful shot in my scrotum, yes you heard me, let's all wince, another one in the base of my penis, and another one somewhere else, I don't remember. I don't think the anaesthesia fully set in before they started but then again that's what I always think at the dentist's as well. In either case, what the doc called 'not pain but just pressure' amounted to the worst pain I've ever experienced in my life. A whole lot of tearing, screaming, cutting, and sewing up later, I was done and stumbling back to the car. I was relieved and traumatized at the same time. I hadn't realized that the worst was yet to come.

My exposed glans had been wrapped up in tape, and within two weeks they expected me to take it off. Think about this, a primarily internal organ, which had been kept moist by the body for 13 years, is suddenly exposed to the elements and covered in dry cloth. What do you think happened? It fused. That's what happened. It took me 5 hours in a bloody bathtub to tear the cloth off, one painful millimetre at a time, and with each pull I remember seeing raw bits of my old glans coming apart and floating away. For weeks even a sudden blow of air would hurt. Don't even mention showering or urinating.

For me, that initial pain is hardly the worst of it though. In principle, that's how the glans should be, ultra sensitive. What maddens me is the fact that after all the trauma it underwent, the tearing and bleeding and exposure, it was forced to act in self defence and changed form, became essentially calloused. Forget the foreskin itself, it's important of course, but I realize now that more important to me was its use in keeping the most sensitive organ of my body in its proper state. Every time I look down at my dried up, wrinkled, bumpy glans I'm reminded of what they did to me.

The Kindest Cut

How circumcision is the secret weapon in the battle against HIV/Aids

After weeks of waiting, Michael Phiri decided to take matters into his own hands. The 16-year-old from George Compound, a township outside Lusaka, was so anxious to be rid of his foreskin, and so frustrated after being turned away from the circumcision clinic at the local hospital for the third time, that he took a bread knife and did the job himself. The resulting bloody mess had one positive outcome; it sent him straight to the top of the queue for surgery, and he got his operation performed, as an emergency, by the urology specialist Kasonde Bowa. "He had made a good start, with a dorsal cut as far as the rim of the glans, but things had got difficult from there," a smiling Dr Bowa says, with admirable understatement.

As Zambia's leading expert on circumcision, Bowa tells this story to illustrate the soaring demand for the procedure that is sweeping Lusaka and other towns across sub-Saharan Africa, as word spreads of its remarkable preventive power. After 25 years of research and the expenditure of billions of pounds, it turns out that the oldest surgical operation in the world, performed since antiquity, is the best defence we have against HIV/Aids.

In crisp shirt and tie, despite the sweltering heat, Bowa tells me of the benefits of circumcision. We're standing outside his cluttered office at the University Hospital, where the exotic flamboyant trees that pepper this sprawling city shed their vermilion blooms on to the patients waiting in the shade below. Bowa started Zambia's first pilot project offering circumcision as a defence against HIV in 2004. It was soon overwhelmed. “We were operating three afternoons a week but had such high demand that we were unable to cope. We needed more space and more staff.”

The simple act of removing a man’s foreskin reduces his risk of contracting HIV by about 60 per cent. The reason is that the moist underside of the foreskin is thickly supplied with Langerhans cells, a key route for entry of the virus into the body. Langerhans cells are also present in the glans (head) of the penis, but after circumcision the skin of the glans becomes drier and thicker, denying the virus an easy point of entry. Circumcision, if rolled out across the continent, offers the first real prospect of saving lives by preventing infection on a significant scale. Estimates suggest that if universal circumcision were introduced across sub-Saharan Africa, it could prevent 300,000 deaths in the next 10 years and three million deaths over the next 20 years. It is sometimes described as a “surgical vaccine” – with good reason.

Zambia has been among the first to offer the operation and pilot new services, and other countries are following its lead. Yet, globally, only 1 per cent of total AIDS funding is earmarked for male circumcision. Progress towards delivering the single most effective preventive measure yet discovered against the pandemic is agonisingly slow.

Across the road from Bowa’s office, what is believed to be the world’s first dedicated circumcision clinic outside a hospital or research programme is doing brisk business. Launched last year by the international charity, the Society for Family Health, following Bowa’s lead, the New Start centre is sited in an anonymous, dusty building behind the YWCA. Its appearance gives no hint of the pioneering work carried out within. This is deliberate; the charity fears that the service would be besieged if it were more widely advertised.

As I watch, John Banda, a shopkeeper, aged 29, climbs on to the table in one of the three operating rooms, clutching his green surgical gown and grimacing at the ceiling as Aggie Mahule, one of half a dozen nurses and clinical officers given two weeks’ training to carry out the procedure, injects local anaesthetic into the base of his penis. “Relax and feel at home,” says Aggie kindly as she swabs the surgical area with disinfecting iodine. John, fearful of the pain and, possibly, for his manhood, makes no response.

Next door in the ‘recovery’ room, Richard Chimuka, 31, a computer trainee wearing a black designer shirt and low-slung jeans, sits with his legs apart, looking relaxed and pleased that, for him, the operation is over. The surgery was over in 12 minutes – and no, it wasn’t painful, he says. Does it bother him that the operation was performed by two women? “Actually, I felt excited about it – like putting my painting in a gallery”, came the smooth reply.

It’s not difficult to persuade Zambians of the virtues of circumcision. It is already practised traditionally by the Luvale and certain other tribes in the North-Western Province, where the HIV rate is half that in the rest of the country (6.9 per cent of the population in the region is infected, compared with 14.3 per cent for the country as a whole). In Lusaka, one in five of the adult population is infected (20.8 per cent), one of the highest rates in the world. Surveys have shown wide acceptance of the procedure and increasing interest among parents wanting the operation for their children.

More than 1,500 men have had the operation since the New Start clinic opened in August 2007, and more have been circumcised by mobile surgical teams that visit hospitals in Kafue and Kabulonga, an hour's drive from the city. This is good for them, but in the context of the country's epidemic – 100,000 new infections a year – it is like using a water pistol against a forest fire. In a week spent in Lusaka, I searched for any agency, charity or expert opposed to rolling out circumcision – and I could not find one. Among the dozen organisations I visit, all voice their support – only the level of enthusiasm varied.

“It is the most important defence against the disease that we have,” says Mannasseh Phiri, a GP and Zambia's best-known AIDS activist. “The trials have shown that it really does work, it is relatively easy to do and it is a lot cheaper than putting people on drug treatment.” Jeffrey Stringer, director of the Centre for Infectious Diseases Research in Lusaka, which is piloting a neo-natal circumcision service, tells me: “If we had a vaccine as effective as this, we would be jumping up and down in the streets. A 60 per cent protective effect is fantastic. It is one of the most effective preventive strategies we have.” Yet, as Steve Gesuale, head of the circumcision project at the Society for Family Health, points out, there is “very little funding from donors, very little government support and very little going on”.

Despite the lack of public support, the message about the benefits of the operation is reaching all levels of society. In Garden Compound, the densely crowded township close to the centre of Lusaka, the tiny Viro Clinic – “We prolong and save” reads the legend above the door – displays a poster in the window advertising male circumcision. Outside, the faded red and blue plasterwork is crumbling. Inside, the three cramped rooms contain a pot plant reaching almost to the roof, an examination couch doubling as the operating table, and a small fridge. Beside it, on a table, a teddy bear is propped against a broken clock, along with red plastic roses. Violet, the smiling receptionist, says demand for circumcisions has increased. “There are more in the winter [June and July] and in the evenings and early mornings when it is cooler. The wound heals better”, she says.

Interest in circumcision has spread beyond the capital, to the country's vast hinterland, according to Karen Sichinga, chief executive of the powerful Churches Health Association of Zambia, which runs one-third of all Zambia's hospitals, mainly in rural areas. “The demand is increasing in our mission health facilities”, she says. For Sichinga, the operation does not carry the moral dilemmas involved in handing out condoms or preaching abstinence, an important factor for a faith-based charity. But she, like some others, is cautious of treating it as the silver bullet, the “answer” to AIDS that has been so desperately sought for so long. “Science has proved that the benefits outweigh the disadvantages”, she said. “But you have to work hard to persuade people. Over 90 per cent of Zambia is Christian, not Islamic.”

From township clinics to mission hospitals in the furthest reaches of the country – all such facilities will need to be recruited if the target of 500,000 circumcisions in five years, notionally set by the Society for Family Health, is to be achieved. Even that represents only half the number required to curb Zambia's HIV infection rate, calculated on the basis that four operations are needed to prevent one infection. Some experts, including Bowa, warn that even if the money is available, the vast increase in staff and facilities needed will take time to deliver. Others are more optimistic. Hospitals are already being used at weekends, with existing staff paid extra, and discussions are under way to hold circumcision clinics in the evenings. High-risk groups could be targeted first – the military, the police. It is not as simple as rolling out a vaccination programme, but there is already experience with cataract surgery, which is provided to hundreds of thousands of people across the world by staff with basic training, and circumcision providers from several countries in Africa have travelled to India to learn from the cataract experience.

Bris Avrohom

Bris Avrohom is an organisation founded in 1979 to help Soviet immigrants assimilate into American life and lead them back to their Jewish roots. Today the organization has branches in Jersey City, Hillside, Old Bridge, Brooklyn, N.Y., Minnesota, Toronto and Ukraine.

Bris Avrohom, which means 'covenant of Abraham', provides financial and social support to newly immigrated Russian Jews, as well as classes and literature to help them reconnect with their history and customs. One of the most significant services provided by Bris Avrohom is the re-creation of Jewish customs and celebrations that immigrating Jews missed while living in their home countries. The services include performing circumcisions, or brissin, for babies and men who were never circumcised – the oldest so far was 75.

Law Fails To Reduce Number Of Botched Circumcisions

Six years after a law was brought in to try to stop circumcisions being performed outside of the Swedish health system, it is being estimated that 2000 boys a year are now being given the operation unlawfully. The National Board of Health and Welfare is blaming a lack of resources and poor information and is warning that many boys are suffering serious complications after the surgery.

It is now looking into ways to reduce the number of those undergoing the procedure illegally and says one problem is that many Muslims say they are met with suspicion when they arrange circumcisions in hospitals for their sons. The newspaper Svenska Dagbladet reports that only eight of Sweden's twenty county councils, which run local health services, offer the operation if it is solely for religious reasons.

Editorial

The editor's column in this edition is a paean of praise for the foreskin. Since I elected to shed my own prepuce some years ago, it may seem odd that I should be authoring such an article. But the truth is that I receive very few contributions from members actively promoting the benefits of the foreskin. I would love to hear from intact members as to why they have chosen to retain what many others, voluntarily or involuntarily, have long since discarded.

In a letter to the editor (page 8), D.B. complains that previous newsletters have encouraged members to lobby for routine infant circumcision. I will return to the merits and demerits of RIC in another editor's column. What I do dislike is the Gestapo-like attitude of the NHS to the question. Parents seeking circumcision for their sons are mostly given very short shrift – so much so that circumcision is virtually a non-option. At least let there be some choice about the matter. It is therefore welcome to see that an increasing number of circumcision clinics are being established, a topic I hope to return to in the next edition.

In Praise of the Foreskin

Within the Acorn newsletter, the foreskin is not a popular appendage. There is much discussion as to the best means of removal and the benefits of a foreskinless life. Yet millions of men world-wide live happily with their prepuces and there are even 17% of Acorn members who have chosen to stay intact. Perhaps therefore it is time to reappraise this superfluous piece of skin.

What can we say in praise of the foreskin? Quite a lot, actually.

First, it is natural. Every male is born with a foreskin. (There may be exceptions, but so few that they can be counted as birth defects – albeit of a non-serious nature.) Indeed, it is this very naturalness that has come to be the main weapon in the anti-circumcision toolbox. The foreskin, it is argued, is as much a part of the body as fingers, toes and ears. It is as unnatural routinely to amputate it as it would be to amputate these other appendages. Admittedly, it can cause problems, but they can be dealt with as they occur. We do not perform routine appendectomies to prevent future cases of appendicitis. We wait upon events. The only similarly preventive operation was tonsillectomy, where it was once fashionable to remove healthy tonsils from young children to prevent future problems. But that operation, as a routine, is now out of fashion. Indeed, the very real function of the tonsil in preventing disease is now recognised. Similarly, the anti-circumcisionists say, it is time to honour bodily integrity with respect to the foreskin.

Second, the foreskin is a remarkable feat of evolution. The easy solution would have been for the penis to develop without a foreskin: a simple rod with the shaft covered with just sufficient skin – rather like a finger; perhaps with a little slack to accommodate erection and tumescence. But no, nature rejects the easy solution. Instead, we have an extremely sophisticated mechanism. The skin on the shaft is mobile. Instead of being joined immediately to the penis at the point where the shaft meets the glans (the sulcus), the shaft skin continues and extends typically to beyond the tip of the glans. (Foreskin length varies so that in some men, it extends well beyond the glans whereas in others, it barely reaches the tip – indeed the extremity of the glans may peep through.) The skin then doubles back on itself, forming a double layer, and is joined back to the penis on the shaft at the sulcus, the ridge between the glans and the shaft. At the point of the fold, there is a ridged band. The nature of the foreskin then changes so that the inner foreskin is mucosal rather than normal skin. The ridged band is sometimes referred to as the frenar band because of the way the muscle sheath at the tip of the foreskin is connected to the frenulum. This muscle sheath helps to contract the tip of the foreskin so that it remains positioned over the glans. On the underside of the penis, the foreskin is attached to the glans by the frenulum. Sometimes referred to as the love string, the frenulum is an elastic band of tissue in the form of a cord within a web of skin. It sits within the v-shaped groove on the underside of the glans and tethers the foreskin to the penis.

The wonder of the penis is that, as the male becomes sexually aroused, the penis engorges with blood and becomes erect. The Cowper's glands, sitting inside and at the base of the urethra, emit a lubricating fluid (pre-ejaculate or pre-cum). As the erection grows, the foreskin gradually retracts, distributing the lubricating fluid across the glans as it folds back. At full erection, the glans is fully exposed with the foreskin sitting in its retracted state in the sulcus, the groove at the base of the glans. Once orgasm and ejaculation have been achieved, the penis gradually detumesces. The frenulum now guides the foreskin back over the glans so that the glans is once again covered as the penis becomes flaccid.

Evolution is based on the survival of the fittest. Over aeons of time, as each living organism develops and mutates, nature gradually chooses the better solution in favour of the less favourable. The sophisticated foreskin mechanism has therefore developed as the preferred design for penile covering; this is true not just for man but also in many other mammals – the bull, the horse, the ape to name just a few.

Third, the foreskin has a purpose. The glans is extremely delicate and highly sensitive. The main function of the foreskin is to protect the glans from damage. During infancy, the foreskin is attached to the glans and protects it from urine, faeces, and abrasions from diapers. Throughout life, the foreskin keeps the glans soft and moist and protects it from trauma and injury. Without this protection, the glans can become dry, calloused, and desensitized from exposure and chafing.

Fourth, the foreskin is an aid to masturbation. This of course is not to imply that circumcised men cannot masturbate – they can and do! However, this has to be a learned technique. Some ingenuity is required to find ways of pleasuring the cut penis, whereas the intact penis has a natural mechanism ready to hand (literally!). This is why the Victorians, with their aversion to masturbation, saw circumcision as a means of discouraging if not preventing the practice. As the male baby explores and learns about his body, he naturally discovers his penis. He finds that touching it and rubbing it gives particularly pleasant sensations; he will obviously want to explore some more. He will find that rubbing the foreskin on the head hidden beneath is what gives greatest satisfaction. There is an advantageous spin off to this activity since the boy will at the same time be loosening any adhesions between the foreskin and the glans. Sooner or later will come the day when the boy discovers that the foreskin will retract and he uncovers for the first time the source of his pleasure. It is but a short step from there to discovering that repeatedly covering and uncovering the glans in rapid succession maximises the sensation until one glorious day an orgasm occurs, possibly dry at first but eventually the first awesome moment when his balls send forth their first load of sperm laden semen.

So, with all this going for the foreskin, why has it had such a bad press? Why, ever since ancient times, has there been such a vogue for its removal? It has to be recognised that an individual foreskin does not always perform in the optimum ways listed above. There can be problems – tightness and irritation being the most common. Foreskins can also be high maintenance – especially in hot climates. It is interesting that circumcision is indigenous in the hot countries of Africa, the sandy countries of the Middle East and the humid countries of the Far East.

Although circumcision has now been absorbed into religious and tribal customs, the origins may well have been the high volume of problems suffered by the uncircumcised; removal of the foreskin was a simple preventative measure. As far as the USA and the UK is concerned, circumcision became the vogue in the 19th century, originally in response to the scourge of masturbation. As masturbation came to be seen as a natural activity rather than an abomination, the justification for routine circumcision morphed into a health and prophylactic measure.

But particularly in the Western world, where daily showers are the norm, is the foreskin any longer high maintenance? Just how much time does it take to wash under the foreskin daily and to retract it when urinating? In other words, should we start admiring the foreskin for the wonder of evolution that it is, and leave nature alone?

Thoughts From Anthony

Roundheads get more time in bed; there's no need to "unwind" at the end of the day!

Whilst cavaliers are still 'appeeling', roundheads are 'flaring' to go!

Those circumcised are certainly more forward; they don't need to draw back!

The penis is like a book; ladies prefer 'friction' to 'non-friction'! That puts the roundhead more than a chapter ahead!

Zsolt's Story

[In issue 6/2008, we published an article about a Hungarian website which promotes male circumcision, and promised some personal stories from that site. Here is the first of them.]

I first saw porn movies in my mid-teens, and I wondered why I did not see the foreskin of the guys. I liked the sight, but I did not know why it was like that. Later we had a chat about the matter with the guys at school, and they told me why. This was the first time I heard about circumcision.

A few years later, in 1991, when I finished my military service, we often went to the nudist beach with my that-time girl-friend. Once we saw a family, father and two teenage boys, and they all were freed of their foreskins. My girlfriend became very excited by the sight of the uncovered glans, and she suggested that I should wear the foreskin pulled back. I did it, and telling the truth, it was a very pleasant feeling for me too, so I decided it should always be like that. Unfortunately, it usually slipped forward after a short while, and often trapped my hair, which was very bad. Then I developed a new technique: I pulled back the skin then I pushed a bit forward, so the rim of my glans kept it in its place. It worked out very well and after a few month my foreskin became shorter, and it hardly covered half of my glans when pulled forward. I wore my foreskin pulled back for more than eight years and I looked like as if I were loosely circumcised.

When I started using the Internet in the late 1990s, I started collecting information about male circumcision, about the methods and results, and I also learned that it could be done to adults too. I was hesitating for about a year what to do, while I read everything I could on the web, from doctors' Q&As to medical articles and discussion forums. At one point, I found an e-mail address to a doctor on a health advisory site, and I wrote him a letter asking about getting circumcised.

I received a very kind answer from him in a few days. He suggested Dr Fekete and also gave his telephone number. After a few days of further wavering, I phoned him and I got an appointment. By then I had another girlfriend, and I spoke to her about getting circumcised, and she convinced me that I should do it and she said she would back me in everything.

I went to see Dr Fekete, and after spending 30 minutes with him, we agreed that I will let him know if and when I had finally made up my mind. This was in early February 2000. In about two weeks, I made my final decision and phoned him. "OK, Zsolt", he said. "I will see you next Tuesday morning, at the Urology clinic." He also explained to me how to get there. I had a very simple digital camera, and I made a few pix and waited for Tuesday to come.

Tuesday, 29th February 2000, has arrived. TOP SECRET. No one knew of my big project. I took my backpack and as if was going to work I went to the hospital. The closer I got the more excited I became. The doctor told me not to eat anything before the operation and to drink more than usual.

I got to the clinic and went to the reception, where a few very good looking girls, ten years younger than me, were sitting. Oh, dear, I thought, that is something. How would I tell them that I came to get circumcised? Fortunately, the doctor appeared and I said that I came to see him. He also asked if had changed my mind. "Nooooooooo, not at all", I told him, I still wanted to get circumcised. "OK", he said. We checked in and he told me to wait for him on the second floor. A nurse of my age (28) appeared and took my data, then a young doc appeared and asked me if I was nervous. I said certainly I was nervous, so he gave me some pills and suggested that I walk around until the pill had its effect. I did not know what it was, but in about a few minutes I was calling the doc by his first name. Dr Fekete shepherded me to his office, inspected my dick and asked how much he should cut off. I told him to remove the whole foreskin, as I wanted to be fully circumcised. "OK", he said, and told me to wait some more.

In a few minutes a guy in a green uniform appeared and took me to the surgery. While I was undressing I thought that it was the point of no return, but the doctor asked me once again if I really wanted it. I said a very strong and crystal-clear "YES." I lay down on the surgery table and the surgery assistant fixed my legs to the table with some straps. I asked him to explain what was what, and what was to happen, so he could keep me busy. By then I was not at all excited, I was rather in a kind of euphoria, I guess because of the pill I had got before.

Then a very kind elderly lady appeared and she washed my private parts with some dark liquid, I guess it was a disinfectant. Then they put up a sheet to hide from me what was to happen and they started the operation. There were already four of them busy with me. Dr Fekete said that he would tell me what was happening. I got 4-6 injections to my dick, and that was the most unpleasant part of the story. After a few minutes I felt as if I was sunbathing on the beach, with my hands behind my head, and I was just listening to the chatting of the team. They were joking and teasing each other, and we all had a very good time. In about 20-25 minutes, they were ready, put a dressing on my dick and were gone. The surgery assistant took me back to the room where I started the whole thing about an hour before. Dr Fekete showed up soon. I paid him for the operation, he looked at my organ, gave me a few suggestions about post-operative treatments and told me to go home.

So I went. I took the metro, then a tram, then the suburban rail, and I got home. I was prepared that it would hurt like hell, but nothing. I phoned the doctor and asked what would happen. He said it could not be worse than a not too strong tooth ache, but nothing serious. I was very lucky and I felt no pain whatsoever in the 2-3 weeks I was healing. Next time when I went to see the doc he told me that if there had been no pain before, then there could not be any more. (Honestly, I was hesitating with getting circumcised because I was afraid of the pain. Bloody hell, if only I knew ...)

The stitches fell out by themselves, and I could try the new form just three weeks after the surgery. It was so wonderful without a foreskin. To make love without it is even more wonderful.

Since then we have gone to the nudist beach close to Budapest (in fact, abandoned gravel pits turned into a free nudist beach), and I have often chatted with a few mature women about my circumcision. In fact, they realised that I was circumcised and asked me about it. I also saw that some uncircumcised men pulled back their foreskin when they saw me.

*****

I wrote the above story of my circumcision in 2001-2002. Now, eight years after my circumcision, I am still so much obsessed with it, I have become a 'circumcision maniac'. I feel so much better, so much healthier since my circumcision, and I am very proud of my circumcised dick, which looks terrific, as Dr Fekete really did a great job. By now the scar-line is almost invisible, just the colour difference between the inner foreskin and the skin of my cock shaft shows that many years ago, there was indeed a circumcision done. I am now 38 and still unmarried, but I have had many girls in my bed probing my circumcised dick, and they were all, without exception, very satisfied with it. Honestly, I think that every man should be circumcised, as soon as possible, but it would be never too late. I think that with my future sons I will wait until they turn 7-10, when they will know, largely because of me, what is circumcision and they will be mature enough to understand why is it important to be circumcised, so they could agree to it.

Ten-fifteen years ago, circumcision was very rare in Hungary, but now it has become quite popular among young men. I regularly see circumcised guys on the nudist beach, older and younger alike, and I always look it up on the Internet including on Andras' excellent web-site (www.korulmeteles.hu), which is all in Hungarian, and it is clear that circumcision has become a lot more common and a lot more accepted in Hungary in the past ten years. (I am also thankful to Andras for translating my story into English.)

Finally, I have a very good story: Only very recently, I bumped into an old class-mate of mine, whom I have not seen for more than ten years. We talked about many things, about what happened to us since we have last seen each other, and I mentioned in passing that I got circumcised years ago. There was a meaningful silence for a second, then he admitted he had wanted to get it done for many years, but he was not brave enough. We talked about it for at least two hours that evening, and I very much pushed him to get circumcised as soon as possible. I also gave him the web-site link and the name of the doctor who did mine. A few days ago, I spoke to him once again, and he said he had made up his mind and would get it done as soon as he had the money. So be it ...

A Letter To The Editor

I was somewhat taken aback by the Editor's Column in issue 5/2008. For some years there has been an attempt to keep Acorn neutral in the arguments for and against circumcision, but now you seem to have truly nailed your colours to the mast and are encouraging us to lobby for RIC.

I am totally against this principle, as I feel strongly that boys and men should be able to choose for themselves the condition of their penis. I would not go so far as to label RIC infant mutilation, but I do consider that it is an unwelcome practice that should not be carried out at a stage in life when there can be no defence.

I was circumcised as an adult purely by choice, thinking that it would improve my sexual sensations, but I was wrong. Before circumcision I had a fairly short foreskin, which sometimes would reside in the skin-back position, so I was aware of the feeling of an exposed glans, but also conscious of the cheesy smell of a covered glans, despite frequent washing.

One cannot deny the fact that an exposed glans is much cleaner and has virtually no odour, but what I had not realised was that the stretch nerves in the foreskin play a large part in the sensations of erection and intercourse. After circumcision these nerve endings are lost and I no longer experience the exciting feeling of a swelling penis. Intercourse and masturbation are still good, but different.

I have no doubt that some men benefit from circumcision, especially those with long or tight foreskins, but it is wrong, in my opinion, to promote the idea of circumcision as being the wonderful procedure that will bring sexual bliss to all men, because it simply is not true. I decided to be cut after months of communication on pro-circumcision sites, where I was constantly being told it improved sex 'a million times'. I now realise that I was being drawn into it by circumcision fanatics, and fanatics are not good in any situation.

I have no huge regrets at being circumcised and, on balance, I am very happy with my penis, but I would say to anyone who is thinking of having it done: "Be cautious; consider your present condition and be aware that it may not improve your sexual life."

And if you have boys of your own, do not have them circumcised as babies, because then you are depriving them of the opportunity of considering it for themselves. Whatever the outcome, there is no doubt that going through the procedure is an incredible and exciting experience.

Please keep Acorn sitting on the fence and do not fall into the trap of fanaticism.

Acorn Cuff Links

[An article from Pleasure Zone in the FT magazine]

When I first started my leather goods and accessories shop, we sold cuff links by Emma Willis, whose double-cuff shirts I often wear. There was one particular design – a little silver-gilt acorn – that I loved and found myself wearing every day. So in the end I went to the chap who made them for Emma and had them recast in a pale rose gold, with a set of dress studs to match. That was over a decade ago and they are still the only cuff links I wear.

I always wear double-cuff shirts for work – button cuffs only if I am going to be in the office all day, or I'm leaving at noon to do something relaxing. I love cuff links but I don't see that a man needs a collection if he finds the perfect design, which these are. They go from day to evening never looking too formal or underdressed, and I love their significance – the acorn was a favourite symbol of the Renaissance artists, and one the pre-Raphaelites also use, and I enjoy that historical link. Also that classic proverb about mighty oaks growing from little acorns reflects my approach to business and the way that it's grown.

Submitted by Koteka – London & Lancashire

The cuff links can be obtained from Emma Willis, 66 Jermyn Street, London SW1Y 6NY ([www.emmawillis.com). The cost: silver at £450, silver gilt at £520 and gold at £1600.]

Recruiting New Members — And A New Webmaster!

Over the past few years, the Acorn Society has held its own with respect to membership numbers. Each year, a small number of members decide not to renew or, sadly, pass on; normally, however, we recruit sufficient new members to make up the shortfall.

This doesn't mean that more members would not be welcome; they would. It is one of my constant complaints that I receive too few contributions to the newsletter from members. On the other hand, I know that lots of you feel that you told your story some years ago when you first joined, and now have nothing more to say.

So an influx of new members would be welcome to add fresh experiences and different perspectives.

How can we attract these new recruits? Often word of mouth is the best method. For instance, I have just received an application from someone who has heard about us via a current member and is very enthusiastic about joining. I have a plentiful supply of back copies of the newsletter, so if you would like a few to pass on to likely recruits, just drop me a line.

Of course, it could be embarrassing to proselytise openly, but often the subject of circumcision can be discreetly introduced into the conversation; it is usually apparent from the response whether this is a topic of interest to the guy concerned or whether the seed has fallen on barren ground. I have, for instance, used a general discussion on the scourge of AIDS to mention the success of circumcision in Africa in reducing HIV rates. The degree to which the guy expresses interest in the trials and the results can indicate whether he shares our unusual interest in circumcision.

But these days, the main source of information about circumcision and therefore our main potential source of recruitment is the internet. The Acorn Society has a website (www.acornsoc.org.uk) but sadly the original webmaster is now too busy to keep it up to date. In particular, the website has an archive of extracts from past newsletters. The last extract is from 2004. So anyone coming to our website probably assumes that we are now inactive, and goes away again. Also, this out-datedness inhibits me from circulating details to the various circumcision mailing lists, which could be an abundant source of new members.

So we badly need a new Webmaster. Is there a member out there who is IT savvy, who has a basic knowledge about running and up-dating websites; and who has a little time to give to the Society? If so, your help would be very much welcomed. If you think that you could assist, could you please get in touch with our production manager, Vernon, in the first instance via the Acorn mailbox or by e-mail: production@acornsoc.org.uk. This assistance could be vital to our future prospects – you could well be the future of the Acorn Society!

The Royal Princes

I remember that in an earlier newsletter someone suggested that if it became well known that the Royals were circumcised this might start people (both male and female) thinking that circumcision would be a good thing for males, for their male partners and male offspring etc. I think it was widely assumed that Prince William had been circumcised shortly after Diana's death but I have not heard or read anything about Prince Harry – so maybe he still has a foreskin??

Concerning William, there has recently been a video on the circlist web site showing him having a pee during what I assume to be a rugby/football game. It clearly shows his glans uncovered therefore suggesting that he has been circumcised. As the video is foreign (Spanish I think) it may be a fake but I do not know. The picture of Harry Potter star Daniel Radcliffe is a fake and I have seen pictures (again on the Internet fake or not) of the real owner of that penis.

If members have not seen the Prince William video, go to the circlist web page (www.circlist.com) and scroll down to recently added articles and click on the Prince William entry. The fake Harry Potter picture is at the circumstitions web site.

Polish Immigrant Grandma Gets Grandson Circumcised

Recently our housekeeper stopped me and told me that her daughter had a new baby, and it was the first boy. She told me about the delivery and how the mother was doing and then said "but they left a bit extra down there (pointing sort of to her stomach), if you know what I mean." She said she didn't know the word for it, but was concerned it wasn't right. She knows I'm in the medical field and always asks me medical questions. I had thought she was still talking about the mother and was not at all certain what she was trying to get at (she has quite a heavy Polish accent) when she said "you know the boy... he has too much skin 'down there'... they didn't finish it properly."

At this point I realized she was talking about circumcision. So I said "Oh you mean he wasn't circumcised... that's where they cut off the foreskin on his penis." She said "yes, can you write it down for me?" She proceeded to say that in 'her country' (Poland) they don't do it to boys and her sons were never done, but that now they are here in the USA she wants to make sure her grandsons are given 'all the advantages, just like the American boys...' and she pointed out they were American now and should be just like all American boys. I told her to talk to her daughter about it and just to take the little lad back to the doctor and ask for him to be circumcised.

Two weeks later when she returned she told me that they had taken my note to their doctor who had circumcised the boy right there in the office during that visit. They were very glad to have it done and she said "we both think it looks much better and is healthier too" and of course I agreed.

I asked her if this was common among her peers and she said that it was regularly discussed by the Polish women in her circle here in Chicago (where we have the second largest collection of Polish people in the world... the first being in Poland itself). She said all of the moms-to-be and grandmothers like her wanted to make sure it was 'done' and that since it was covered by the insurance, why not get it "as the boy would be better off and more accepted too."

Hopefully all the immigrant women in the USA are working to get their American born babies well circumcised. I did tell her that it isn't just for babies and that they can get their husbands and older sons done too. Hopefully a few older skins will get clipped as well!

Ritual Circumcision

I've seen ritual circumcision of pubescent and post pubescent boys in Africa by a shaman, and ritual circumcision (brit mila) of both adults and babies by a mohel.

I have witnessed ritual circumcision in Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda. In each case the boys were given a fermented drink to consume about 20 minutes before the ritual. Some were pretty much stoned; others not so. There was nothing else given. Most boys were pretty stoic through the cutting. A few cried. A few boys were held during the procedure, but most shrugged away anyone who tried to hold them.

I have talked to both young boys and men before and after. The adult men were more concerned and hesitant before, the tribal boys were all eager as this was the sign that they were, at last, becoming MEN. Most had a stiff upper lip (they were not stiff elsewhere) but a few winced quite a bit but held back the tears.

The actual cutting was rather quickly done. The severed skin was not discarded. I asked what was done with it and was told it was eaten. I don't know whether they meant it was consumed by tribal members or by animals, or what. I took it to mean that the shaman consumed it. A white powder (maybe ashes) was blown onto the boy's cut cock. This I was told was to stem bleeding. It seemed to work. Most boys were able to walk away from the stool on which they were sitting by themselves (with legs spread apart).

I saw one Jewish circumcision where the baby was given a bottle with wine to suckle before the bris. The father did the circumcision and collected the blood, which he drank. Babies tend to cry when they are cut.

In one case, the man (a friend) who was being circumcised had almost no foreskin, and he was merely pricked (no pun intended) – no real cutting (there wasn't much to cut). He was a gentile and was getting married. The father of the bride (a Jewess) did the pricking.

My own circumcision was done when I was an infant. Unfortunately, I don't remember (and I'm sure I cried), but I am very pleased with the result. I just appreciate it every time I see or take hold of my cock

Circumcision Debate Pits Science Against Religion

Article by Sally Thorner, Baltimore [wjz.com]

A circumcision debate is pitting science against religion. It's the same basic procedure whether it's done in the hospital or the home. But there is one major difference. Two babies – both newborn boys – are having very different experiences. Like 70% of males, they are circumcised, but their response is pitting science against religion. What's up for debate is the management of pain during their surgeries.

“The moment that we are waiting for”, said Rabbi Moshe Rappaport. “It might be a little uncomfortable, and at the same time, it might be very magical.” In the Jewish religion, a Mohel performs the ritual circumcision, called a bris. Rabbi Rappaport minimizes the baby’s pain with a numbing solution and wine for the baby to suck on. “There’s something right when the baby has a natural reaction to a bris and cries for a short time”, he said.

While the ritual circumcision typically happens in the home when the baby is eight days old, the medical circumcision happens in a hospital soon after the baby is born. A baby in the hospital is given Tylenol and sucks on sugar water. The big difference is they receive an injection to numb the entire area. “It’s inconceivable to me that there are even questions about this any more”, said Dr. Myron Yaster. Dr. Yaster is a paediatric anaesthesiologist and an Orthodox Jew. As a physician, Yaster’s views on babies and pain trump his religious beliefs. “Historically, it was long believed that babies or newborns did not feel or remember pain to the same degree that older children and adults do”, he said. “We now know that that’s completely incorrect.”

In a recent study, Canadian researchers found that boys who are circumcised without pain relief are more sensitive to pain later in life. “The parents are the consumer here. Do they want their child to experience the pain or not? There are techniques that are available, very easy to do, very simple, that will eliminate the pain”, Dr. Yaster said.

“Pain is okay”, Rabbi Rappaport said. “It’s a ritual, a covenant, a connection.” It’s religion vs. science and a debate over pain management that doesn’t end here. “Everybody looks at pain as being bad”, Rabbi Rappaport said. “Pain demonstrates a connection to your well-being.” “You have to separate belief from fact”, Dr. Yaster said. “There is belief that my children need to be circumcised but there’s also fact: I don’t have to do it painfully.”

Methods even differ from doctor to doctor. Not every procedure includes a shot to block the pain. Some believe the pain from the shot is as bad as the circumcision itself, so if you decide to circumcise your son, you should ask the doctor or the Mohel how he or she plans to control your baby’s pain.

Just A Little Off The Top

So here I am, thumbing through the stacks of typical barbershop magazines, all at least 14 months old. American Rifleman, Golf Digest, Popular Mechanics, Guns... Wait a second. Here’s a different one. Some Biblical Archaeology Review thing. How’d that get here? No matter. It’s different, different than yet another article on the sight on that new .50-caliber handgun or the challenges on the back nine at Colonial.

Whoa! Here, about 50 pages in, an article titled “Circumcision: Who Did It, Who Didn’t and Why.”

Even in a guy-friendly place like a barbershop, that’s a headline that will cause a shudder. Even in America, where a majority of the male population is circumcised and a large majority of that majority has been so marked since they were a week old and so have a very poor memory of the procedure. Be brave and read on. Circumcision has a long history in the ancient world, as early as 23 centuries before it was practised on Jesus Christ. The Egyptians did it, as did the Canaanites, Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Phoenicians, Arameans and – perhaps most famously – the Israelites. The Assyrians and the Babylonians did not.

The oldest known depiction of circumcision is on a wall relief of a tomb just southwest of Cairo. Two boys reaching puberty are being altered by a priest. One of the boys tells the priest: “Rub off what is there thoroughly”, and the priest answers him: “I shall make it heal.” Neither priest nor pubescent apparently addresses the single most glaring unanswered question raised by the whole matter: who started this whole business and why? If a guy comes by pointing a jagged oyster-shell at your groin, wouldn't you expect him to be able to give you some sort of an explanation why this process is desirable? (The most logical explanation is simple. The male organ simply looks better post-circumcision than it does pre-circumcision. And looks matter: consider how visual an animal the human male is and just how much time he spends gazing at himself.)

But even if the origins weren't clear, the effects could be. In something known as the Ebers Papyrus, Egyptians offered a remedy for the discomforts of circumcision: “dzrt, honey, cuttle-bone, sycamore, fruit of dzja are mixed together and applied thereto.” There's no further explanation of dzrt and dzja. These must be archaeologist talk. Then there was the account given in the Great Karmack Inscription of the Libyan-Mediterranean invasion of Pharaoh Merneptah (1212-1202 BC). In this account, we learn that the Egyptians had different punishments for prisoners of war. Circumcised prisoners had their hands whacked off. Uncircumcised prisoners lost their genitals.

Among the Egyptians and most other Semitic peoples, circumcision was commonly a puberty rite or an initiation to marriage. In Arabic hatana means “to circumcise” and the words for “bridegroom”, “son-in-law” and “father-in-law” are all derivatives. (It's amazing the depth and width of knowledge that can be collected at a barbershop. Ladies, study your man when he returns from his favourite tonsorial parlour. Doesn't he look smarter?)

Obviously, the Israelites put a different spin on everything by mandating circumcision for every boy-child who had reached the ripe age of eight days. No longer is it a matter of hygiene or matrimony. Yahweh himself told Abraham: “Every male among you shall be circumcised. You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin (besar “orlatkem) and it shall be a sign (“ot) of the covenant (berit) between me and you.” Not that the Israelites of the Old Testament didn't sometimes find ways to take advantage of their special custom in intertribal squabbles. The article tells of the Hivites of Canaan, whose prince Shechem “defiled” Dinah, daughter of the Israelite patriarch Jacob. Shechem, the Book of Genesis tells us, “loved the girl and spoke tenderly to her.” So his father proposed a compromise to Jacob's sons: “Intermarry with us; give us your daughters in marriage and marry ours.” But Jacob's sons declared no marriages could take place because the Hivites weren't properly altered. The Hivites agreed to the new conditions – ah, the price of diplomacy – and it was done. But it was all a ruse. The Israelites slaughtered them “on the third day, when they were still in pain.” (When I read this, I let out a moan that resounded throughout the barbershop.)

My shuddering continues as the article cites the First Book of Samuel, in which David purchases Saul’s daughter Michal for the bride-price of 100 Philistine foreskins. But the topper comes at the end of the story of the Israelite wandering in the desert. Poised to lead his people back to the Promised Land and celebrate Passover, Joshua is instructed by Yahweh to “make flint knives and circumcise the Israelites again a second time.” In the name of all that’s holy, why? Scholars speculate that perhaps the Egyptians didn’t involve the entire glans and corona while the ancient Israelite practice involved the complete prepuce or foreskin. Maybe during their long captivity, the sons of Abraham had adapted the Egyptian method and thus the need for “a second time.”

I put the magazine back on the stack, fishing for my handkerchief to deal with the chilly sweat now covering my forehead. All the while reflecting on the full meaning of “a second time.”

The man behind the barber’s chair is motioning to me. He’s holding scissors. Snip, snip. That’s OK pal. Maybe some other time.

Christian Parents Seek Out ‘Holistic Circumcisions’

[By Nicole Neroulis, Religion News Service]

Mark Kushner pulled up to the Watson family’s suburban Philadelphia home a week after the birth of their first son, Colin. In the dining room, he unpacked the tools of his trade: sterilized surgical instruments, topical anaesthetic, prayer shawls and a small bottle of kosher wine. The shawls went back into his black bag. But to Megan and Christopher Watson’s happy surprise, the mohel – pronounced ‘moyle,’ the title for a Jewish ritual circumciser – had copies of several prayers appropriate for the Presbyterian parents to read for the occasion. “We thank you for the miracle of human experience in the birth of our child”, they recited, as Kushner gently rocked their infant before the procedure.

Kushner, who is based in Philadelphia, and Philip Sherman, a mohel in the New York City area, say they have performed more than 30,000 circumcisions since training together in Israel in the 1970s. Most of their business comes from traditional brit milah ceremonies for 8-day-old Jewish boys. But in recent years, they have increasingly catered to Christian families who eschew a hospital procedure in favour of a $300 to $800 house call – a trend Sherman has dubbed ‘holistic circumcision’. “They want their babies circumcised in the comfort of their homes surrounded by family and friends, and they want it performed by someone highly experienced, who brings spirituality and meaning to the practice”, he said. “And it’s over in 30 seconds, compared to what hospitals do, which can be from 20 to 45 minutes, with the baby strapped down.”

Many Christian clients, including the Watsons, liked what they saw at a friend's brit milah, also known as a bris. Others are conservative Christians who want to follow Old Testament tradition, or learned about holistic circumcisions from the Internet, their doctors or word-of-mouth, Kushner said. Yet this anecdotal rise in Christians calling on mohels comes as the U.S. circumcision rate – historically much higher than in other parts of the world – is in decline. In contrast to the 85 percent reported in 1965, just 65 percent of all male newborns in American hospitals were circumcised in 1999, according to the most recent figures from the National Hospital Discharge Survey. Reliable data on religious circumcisions outside hospitals is hard to come by.

Megan Watson acknowledges that she had mixed feelings about having Colin circumcised, but deferred to her husband's judgment. At least at home, she said, they could comfort their son throughout the process, and she could breast feed him soon afterwards.

As Christopher Watson held his screaming baby's legs still on the tabletop pillow, Kushner snipped the foreskin off the tiny penis. The process took less than a minute. Afterwards, the infant's wails surrendered to a wine-dipped cotton swab, then his mother's breast, while Kushner relayed a list of instructions about how to care for the wound over the next three days. A week later, with Colin completely healed, his mother said she would wholeheartedly recommend using a mohel to other non-Jewish families who want their sons circumcised. "Everything is wonderful. We've been having some good sleep-filled nights; Colin's been sleeping about four, five hours at a time," Watson said. "He's a pretty happy baby."

Friendly Action?

[From the Electric New paper, Singapore]

A 15-year-old Hong Kong boy saw his friend urinating and thought his foreskin was too long. So he did the unspeakable to the 11-year-old victim: he cut off the foreskin with a pair of scissors in a public toilet. To gain the victim's confidence, the older boy even whipped out his membership card with St John Ambulance. To take the victim's mind off the pain, he made him read an English school book.

The incident took place on 17th June last year. In court, he pleaded guilty to causing hurt. His lawyer said in mitigation that he's a genius with an IQ of 145, and came in fourth position in his school's cohort. He was also an avid reader of first aid manuals. The judge asked for a probation report and a psychological assessment on the boy before adjourning the case to Friday. The boys cannot be named to protect their identities.

Editorial

A recent article in Men's Health (reprinted in an abridged version on page 12) had the challenging title: 'Should all males be circumcised?' Men's Health has been notable in the past for its anti-circ tendency. This article in contrast is well balanced – indeed, if anything, it shows a pro-circ bias. Certainly it takes to task in no uncertain manner the more virulent wing of the anti-circ movement with its constant outpouring of untruthful propaganda.

The pity is that the article appears only in the American edition of the magazine. Do the editors feel that circumcision is a matter of no interest to guys in the UK? This may now be the land of the foreskins, but is the matter settled for ever? Does our population not merit information? Is a debate not warranted, especially since the article is so eloquent about the potential health benefits of circumcision? Perhaps a few comments on the magazine's discussion website are called for!

But at least circumcision is now available on demand in the UK and my Editor's column tracks the welcome rise of circumcision clinics over the past few years.

Circumcision Clinics

Google the phrase 'circumcision clinic' and about 22,000 results appear; confine the search to the UK and there are still 7,500 entries. I doubt that there are quite this many clinics in the UK – multiple entries are rife. Nevertheless, it indicates just how prevalent circumcision services now are. How different this is from forty years ago when elective adult (or even infant) circumcision was extremely difficult to arrange. Access to the operation was via GPs who tended to view anyone seeking circumcision as more in need of a psychiatrist than a surgeon.

Perhaps the first crack in the ice was the Marie Stopes Clinic which advertised male circumcision, vasectomy and other minor surgical procedures in the pages of Forum magazine. The surgeon was a Dr Hassan and there are several Acorn members who were once separated from their foreskins by his scalpel. For those in the know, Dr Sifman in North London, Dr D'Silva in Luton and Dr 'John Smith' (a pseudonym) in the North of England were also prepared to undertake adult cuts and revisions.

Then cosmetic surgery clinics began to add male circumcision to their list of operations; but the charges were often exorbitant and the outcomes not particularly aesthetic. With the dawn of the internet, however, it became possible for other clinics to offer services on line at more reasonable costs. What these clinics realised was that the demand was not just from adults; it was also from parents for the circumcision of their sons, especially where this was a cultural or religious requirement.

First into the field was Custom House Surgery (www.circumcisions.co.uk) in East London where Dr Zarifa has built a formidable reputation as a sympathetic practitioner who will attempt to meet the demands of patients, or their parents, with respect to the type of circumcision undertaken. Meanwhile Dr D'Silva's clinic has morphed into the Circumcision Centre (www.circumcisioncentre.co.uk).

There are now many other clinics in various parts of the country advertising on line. As might be expected, www.baby-circumcision.co.uk is just for babies. The clinic is in Golders Green, London, the centre of a large Jewish community. The clinic is run by a mohel with ten years experience who is now offering the service to everyone including the Muslim and African communities. Circumcision is performed with the traditional shield and scalpel method without anaesthetic.

But most clinics cater for babies through to adults. The Integral Medical Centre (www.integralmedical.co.uk/circumcision-london) for instance, runs a circumcision clinic in Harrow Wealdstone (North West London). It uses the Plastibell method for babies and young boys, forceps guided or sleeve resection for older boys and adults. Its prices run from £120 for a baby under one year to £500 for adults. This includes two free follow up consultations. The site promotes circumcision very positively:

“Circumcision is a great way to protect yourself or your baby son throughout life. Surgical foreskin removal has huge medical benefits and significantly reduces the risks of developing the following unpleasant and life-limiting illnesses.” The site then goes on to detail these benefits: prevention of urinary tract infections, phimosis, balanitis and penile cancer; reduced risk of HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases; and reduced risk of cervical cancer for partners.

The internet sites of some clinics are basic in the information that they offer. Others promote the benefits of circumcision, give details of their services plus costs, have a list of frequently asked questions, have testimonials from satisfied patients (or their parents!) and even supply photographs of the end results of previous patients.

One of the most comprehensive sites is the above mentioned Custom House Surgery in East London (www.circumcisions.co.uk) where costs vary from £150 for a baby under two months to £600 for an adult circumcision or £800 for a revision. On its home page, the Custom House Surgery has sections dealing separately with the different needs of babies, boys and adults. It also specifically addresses the question of frenulum removal:

“This can be a variable part of circumcision or a single separate procedure. The frenulum is the web of skin which attaches the inside lower tip of the foreskin to the glans where it stretches on retraction down the cleft on the underside. It differs in individuals, being very tight in some when, on retraction, it pulls down on the head of the penis causing pain. A tight frenulum, which is called frenulum breve, may be an uncomfortable problem. In others the frenulum is apparently absent because it was either torn early in life or never developed. Quite often the frenulum is automatically removed during a circumcision. However, some men wish to have a circumcision but retain the frenulum. Very occasionally patients opt to have only the frenulum cut and removed, preferring to retain their foreskin and remain uncircumcised.”

The clinic also undertakes re-circumcisions: “Custom House Surgery has also been able to assist those who have been circumcised earlier in life and are unhappy with the result. Re-do circumcisions are often performed to remove excess foreskin left from a previous operation.”

The site has a good frequently asked questions section and also a section of patient comments. Typical is a letter from a father in SW England:

“My son (age 10 years) had a retractable, but very tight foreskin (which intermittently tended to get a bit inflamed and which had also on occasions got ‘stuck’ when retracted). After much debate (and a discussion with him about his feelings on the matter) we decided that we would go ahead and have him circumcised whilst he was still young enough not to be hugely embarrassed by the procedure.

“Having taken time to explain things fully to him, he was not in any way frightened of the surgery. The bruising and swelling all settled within about seven days and the stitches dissolved completely after two weeks. After healing my son has a very pleasing cosmetic result, with a straight scar line and a fully uncovered glans. He has been delighted with the outcome and has said to us that it looks and feels much neater and is much easier to keep clean. He also feels much more relaxed about passing urine (which in retrospect he had found a bit directionally unpredictable whilst he still had a foreskin!)

"In summary; he has not been adversely affected in the slightest way by the procedure, nor has he become at all self conscious or embarrassed after it. Prior to the operation he had chosen to keep it a secret from his school friends. However, after his return to school (his operation was done during half term) he has had a full discussion with his friends about his experiences. He has said to me that his advice to any boy considering whether to have the operation or not would be 'go for it' – certainly as a parent I feel we made the correct decision and any concerns that I had about my son having it done at this age were completely unfounded."

One of the overseas clinics with a very high reputation is The Circumcision Center run by Dr Cornell in Atlanta, USA (www.circumcisioncenter.com). Dr Cornell specialises in adult circumcisions and revisions and performs over 250 operations each year. His website is very comprehensive and includes photographs of previous patients, some with both 'before' and 'after' pictures. The Reed Centre in Florida, USA (www.penisdoctor.com) run by Dr Harold Reed, has a similar high reputation although circumcision is just one of a range of penile operations offered by the Centre including lengthening and foreskin restoration.

The proliferation of circumcision clinics is welcome since they offer a direct service which by-passes often hostile GPs. But the main advertising route is still the internet. This is fine for those parents who know that they want their son circumcised and are internet savvy. But there are many parents who are not aware of circumcision and its potential advantages and never consider it as an option. It is therefore a welcome move that clinics are beginning to use other media to advertise their services. For instance, Peter, a member in Essex, has sent in the adjacent ad from his local free newspaper.

The various foreign scripts at the bottom of the advert indicate the market that the advert has in mind – the Muslim ethnic minorities. Unfortunately, the website consists only of a home page with little detail – although it does state that all age groups are catered for. It is apparent therefore that the clinic will deal with males of any age, colour or creed. It is excellent news that such clinics are prepared to advertise in the more popular media. Anything that raises the profile of circumcision and alerts parents to the possibility can only be a good thing.

The Acorn Society itself does not keep a list of circumcision clinics or practitioners. The Gilgal Society (www.gilgalsoc.org) (PO Box 53515, London, SE19 2TX) does excellent work in this respect, providing advisory leaflets and lists of practitioners for the price of postage and packing. If you do discover new circumcision clinics yourself, the Gilgal Society would no doubt be pleased to hear to add them to their list.

Meanwhile, the Acorn Society is certainly interested in hearing of experiences at the various clinics. If you yourself, or someone you know, has undergone circumcision at a clinic, do give us your impression and ratings, and share with us your experience.

Who Is Circumcised And Who Is Not?

I have always been very interested in my friends' penises, often just checking whether or not they were circumcised. (Size was also important too.) At school, where we often played around, most boys I saw were circumcised like myself. Sometimes we managed to wank together but I could often observe mates when we peed together. Although I agree generally with keeping foreskins where possible, I have to admit that a cut dick (soft or hard) is much nicer to see than an uncut one. Uncut soft dicks look rather untidy, as many lady friends will agree.

I was circumcised for serious phimosis as a schoolboy. Phimosis is more often associated with boys with large penises. As an older adult, I am proud of my large penis when erect. (Just under 7" and thick should not be hidden away!) Inspection invited at any time by appointment...

Over the years, I have kept a note of the cut or uncut state of as many of my friends as I can recall. It's all completely inoffensive to anyone else but fascinating to me; so if any readers care to let Acorn have pics of their own dicks (erect or otherwise) for passing on to me, I should be very grateful indeed. No-one needs to show their faces if they are at all shy, but a note of your age at the time of the pic would be very helpful! Genuine pics of our cocks, taken in private, always fascinate me. Two cocks together – even better.

A Balanced View

Many thanks to the editor for a very good and well balanced edition of Acorn (1/2009). It was good to read his Editor's Column with its description of the foreskin and also Zsolt's story.

I think many of us who are in favour of circumcision are enthusiastic because we were glad to be shot of our foreskins either because of phimosis or in my case balanitis. Many though, greatly value their foreskins which are a great source of delight to them.

For many years I lived in areas where circumcision was taken for granted. At school in the North West, half of us were cut, and half weren't. I then worked in two areas with a large Jewish population, Manchester and North East London, and again circumcision was not an issue. It was when I moved to South West London that I entered a circumcision free zone. It was after I moved that I was cut and this was noticed in the changing rooms. I have had a number of gentle questions over the last five years. I refuse to give advice though I echo Zsolt's story that if you are keen to be cut wear your foreskin back for a period. I also echo DB's advice that many of the pro circ sites are over enthusiastic.

This is where Acorn comes in. I find it easier to hand over a copy of Acorn to someone who is particularly interested and tell them to do their own research. A couple of years ago a guy told me that his two teenage sons wanted to be circumcised; what would I advise? The answer was that that was not a road I was going down; it was between the three of them (actually I think I was rather evil and said 'Why not try it first?'). But this edition of Acorn puts the issues evenly and if I am ever asked again about circumcision I shall simply give copies.

Campaigning Tactics

The Editor's Column in issue 5/2008 was headed: 'Let's start a campaign'. I'm used to campaigning so here are some thoughts.

Firstly, don't sit down on the Town Hall or the Ministry steps with a placard as this will get you arrested. I've seen this from both aspects.

Secondly join the Establishment. I'm a member of Diabetes UK and they have hammered home time and time again the medical aspects of diabetes, and acceptance and government money is now flowing in and research is accelerating. They have proved their case. We now have enough evidence that circumcision can reduce the rate of HIV transmission, and we now need accurate figures as to how it reduces other sexually transmitted diseases. When I last enquired of the NHS I was told that no statistics were kept. Anecdotal evidence from World War 2 supported the belief that US soldiers who were cut were less likely to suffer STDs than British soldiers. We now need evidence.

Thirdly, we need to promote circumcision as part of a balanced sex education programme. I am sad to read account after account of those with phimosis or balanitis who are into their 30's and 40's without realising that something can be done. I was in my 50's and with a lot of intense pain before I realised that there was a remedy.

Fourthly, we need to point out that circumcision is not some sort of grotesque painful mutilation but, with the right surgeon, a fairly painless procedure. It doesn't leave you numb, and in my case has left me with increased pleasure.

A Strange Case Of Double Standards

[An article by Laura MacDonald from Indymedia UK]

Another child has died from male circumcision in England – apparently the third such death in 25 months – and boys (from babies to teenagers) are being regularly treated in hospitals for serious injuries or infections resulting from ritual genital cutting. NORM-UK, the charity concerned with the foreskin, calls on the government to implement fully the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and give both boys and girls protection against ritual wounding – in all its forms.

Amid the clamour about the death of baby Jaden Mack in a dog attack, and the continued reverberations of the 'Baby P' case, another child death was reported rather quietly at about the same time. Nine week old Celian Noubiwe died as a result of a wilful wounding, commanded by his parents. He's the latest in a list of children to die in this way, and for every Celian there are around 100 who are treated for life threatening injuries but who survive.

The injury and death figures for this particular type of wound are in fact rather comparable to those for dog bites. In the last 25 months it's understood that 3 children have died* following it and thousands overall will have required some form of follow-up treatment for issues such as blood loss, persistent pain or infection. The police have taken photographs of some of the injuries, which presumably then were filed away, as the government has made it clear no prosecutions can result.

In fact the government has said that anyone is free to inflict this on a child, anywhere any time. In a recent letter to NORM-UK, the Department of Health said that the only way in which this kind of wounding could result in a prosecution is if the perpetrator had "pretended to be a doctor". This would mean that the mechanic who burned off part of a 3 year old's body with a soldering iron (as reported in September on More4 news) apparently acted perfectly legally...

So what is it that makes us turn our faces away when a child spends a period in hospital because adults burned him or cut him, or when a baby bleeds to death in his cot over a long lonely night? The answer is a fear of criticising religious practice. The excision of around 50% of a child's penile skin is considered a duty in two large religious groups and we don't like to talk about either the direct harm or the collateral damage... because doing so might offend. We're even careful to construct the statistics so that the deaths simply disappear. When NORM-UK asked the Department of Health about circumcision deaths in late 2007 they told us, "the Office of National Statistics holds mortality statistics and these data show no evidence of death where circumcision was listed as the secondary cause".

It's easy to see how this result is achieved – just as Haringey's ex-Children's Services Director knew, hitting targets is all about what you choose to measure. So for example when in 1991 Raju Miah had the most sensitive part of his genitals excised, and never woke up, the death was recorded as 'narcotic poisoning' (i.e. an overdose of anaesthetic). Not a circumcision related death then. Neither apparently was the death of baby Boma Oruitemeka in London in 1990 from severe haemorrhage after circumcision (without anaesthetic). In this case the Coroner Dr Douglas Chambers was almost endearingly frank about his own reasons for avoiding the issues: "I'm not going to stir up that hornet's nest" he said, "oh no thank you not at all."

In Ireland in 2005, hearing the case of baby Callis Osaghae, Judge Kevin Haugh (the late) drew the lines more clearly. He instructed the jury to put their "white western values" aside. So dutifully they did, finding the man who razored off one of the most blood and nerve rich areas of the baby's body not guilty of reckless endangerment. Fourth generation genital cutter Osagie Igbinidion walked free from court complaining of the "immense pain and distress" he had gone through during the trial process. Callis had no chance to tell of his pain and distress – he had died in 2003 with not a drop of blood left in his body. Although the humanists spoke up for Callis, those concerned with human rights – and more particularly child rights – generally remain silent in such cases. They like to think that (male) genital cutting injuries are a competency issue and not intrinsic to the practice. Yet complications have been recorded in as many as one in two boys, deaths are regular in both developed and less developed nations; and the intent of the surgery is – as the sage Maimonides admitted – a reduction in sexual pleasure.

Long-standing human traditions are clearly important. Yet the belief system or habits of one person cannot over-ride the absolute rights of another – be they one day old or 100 years old. So we don't allow the ritual facial scarification or even tattooing of a minor and we've banned all ritual female genital mutilation practices from small incision to radical excision. We're stepping up action against forced marriage, and we've criminalised those who would not 'spare the rod' or even the heavily applied hand. All this is scripture, tradition, belief, culture and hadith notwithstanding. So if that mechanic had put down his tools and spanked the boy hard as a punishment for crying he could have faced prosecution for common assault.

The NSPCC campaigned for this new law, and in fact want it taken further so that any and every smack is classified as assault – as does the Children's Commissioner for England Sir Al Aynsley-Green. Yet they will not campaign to protect boys from sacrificial genital cutting, or even to have the use of anaesthesia or sterile medical equipment made compulsory. When asked why, they cite, "the sensitivity of the issue".

We call on the NSPCC and the government to end this shameful relativism, and start applying the values we have all agreed: every child matters and human rights, including the right to bodily integrity and personal autonomy, are universal.

* We have been unable to ascertain the details of the death which apparently occurred in London in Summer 2008 after a male circumcision. It seems likely that over the years there have been others which, like this one, simply pass 'under the radar'. The third death – that of baby Amitai Moshe on 9th February 2007 – comes to inquest at Hornsey Coroners Court, London on 20th April 2009.

Circumcising Tyler

[At the end of last year, a father recorded his thoughts on the internet as he arranged the circumcision of his adolescent son. The account will be serialised over the next few editions of the newsletter.]

Part 1 – Why Tyler isn't circumcised

17 October 2008

I believe RIC is brutal and psychologically damaging. Look at all the bad jobs done with RIC 99% of the time. The glans hasn't fully developed yet, there are complications that go undiagnosed, and yes, there is evidence of extreme pain, problems with maternal bonding, and keeping a freshly circumcised penis in a diaper. I think the cons outweigh the pros in this instance, all anti-circ ethics aside. If I look at it as objectively as possible, I'd say the only reason RIC is attractive is because it's relatively cheap and your son won't be conscious of it.

When my first son was born 13 years ago anaesthesia was not nearly as widely used as it is today and, again, my RIC was poorly done and I've seen plenty of men with RICs I'd say were too aggressive. While there are doctors out there who know what they are doing, there are plenty who don't and I see no reason to trust the sexual and physical health of my sons to a roulette wheel of possibilities. Those are the reasons I'm still wholly against RIC.

When I look at other cultures that circumcise, I find that the best time to do it is just before puberty. The penis is still relatively small yet large enough to be circumcised carefully, the glans has matured, and you can have your son circumcised the way you want him to be by a doctor who specializes in penises, not vaginas, or is fresh out of med school.

Because of my beliefs, neither of my boys are cut. I originally believed that they should choose for themselves. However the new information about circumcision helping to prevent STIs has changed my mind and my ex agrees with me. I plan to have my oldest, Tyler, who is in early stage 2 of puberty per his paediatrician, circumcised soon.

I'm in the unenviable position of having to convince an adolescent that circumcision is the best thing for him and having to find a doctor who will do him the way I believe is best. His paediatrician is going to provide me with a referral to a paediatric urologist he says does excellent work. Unlike an infant he'll have full anaesthesia, an expert doctor, and the risk of fewer complications. I do not see his age as a drawback other than I think that I waited a year or two too long. I also think that, in an Iron John kind of way, his circumcision will help him feel like he's now becoming a man.

I must admit I have no idea what I'm going to say to him about it and I want to convince him without giving him an ultimatum. He knows I'm getting a revision and has no desire to know anything more about it. Otherwise I don't know how he feels. He has never approached me or his mother about it other than asking once why he wasn't circumcised. We simply said we didn't think it was good for babies and he just accepted that.

I'd like him to approach it enthusiastically. If I have to bribe him (he wants a Wii and an iPod touch), then I'll do that too. I've talked to him about the importance of condoms and having sex responsibly. Even though I've done that and I think he's a responsible kid, I'm frankly terrified that he'll catch something. Girls these days are really forward and seem to be far more willing to put out than when I was young. I don't think he's sexually active yet but I could be wrong. I first had sex when I was his age and my parents didn't even think I had started puberty until I was 16!

My long consideration of a revision has led me to Circlist and a bunch of other groups. I now understand just how psychologically important circumcision is to a man and that many find it erotic. That's OK. I've learned far more than I thought I would and am extremely glad I waited so long to do something about my revision so that I might have all the choices before me. I feel so certain about the value of circumcision that I'm not only putting my own penis on the line, but my son's as well even though I don't relish the thought of having to raise the subject with him. But I'm the dad and I've been a good dad. I've made unpopular decisions before because I believe they were for the best and I've talked to my kids about difficult subjects because that's what I signed-up for the minute I agreed that we should start trying to have kids.

So even though it may be difficult for me and my son may not like the idea, I am still prepared to risk my popularity with him for the good of his health. That's the approach I think I'm going to take first though for all I know he'll love the idea. When I think about whether it's worth the effort now or whether I should have had him RIC'd, I still prefer this way. My RIC was a bad job and I didn't want that for my sons and I still stand by that.

26 October 2008

As far as my son is concerned, things aren't so hot. The paediatric urologist my paediatrician referred me to didn't work out. He did, however, refer me to another paediatric urologist in the same practice and I spoke to him on Friday. This new guy is a breath of fresh air. He immediately agreed that circumcision is a good idea for all men and even spent a fair amount of time telling me how important it is for health and hygiene. When I asked him if he would do a low and tight, he quipped: "That's the only way to do 'em!" and then went on about the importance of removing the inner mucosal tissue. I hated to tell him he was preaching to the choir but I was so put at ease that I made an appointment for my son to see him on 26 December. Because Christmas is on a Thursday this year, the holiday vacation is unusually long and this doctor believes that should be enough time to allow my son time to heal before school starts again in January though he will not be able to participate in sports for a while. We'll be in his office at 8am and, if the consult goes alright, there's no reason Tyler couldn't be freshly circumcised and out of there by 10am.

Should All Males Be Circumcised?

[An edited version of an article by Charles Hirshberg
from the American edition of Men's Health.]

The day your wife gives birth to a baby boy, the kind, bespectacled face of Marvin L. Wang, M.D., is one that you want to see coming through the recovery-room door. Co-director of newborn nurseries at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston, Dr. Wang has a perky, conversational bedside manner that puts everyone at ease.

I have to hustle to keep up with him as he strides energetically between hospital rooms. Right now he's congratulating a pair of new parents. Larry is standing on wobbly legs, looking both ecstatic and shell-shocked, while Joy sits serenely, holding their newborn son to her breast. Dr. Wang jokes with the new parents a bit and then says, "I understand you may want to have a circumcision for your baby." Larry and Joy don't answer immediately. At last Larry says, "Well... we don't know." Dr. Wang smiles. He's familiar with the befuddled expression on Larry's face.

Circumcision, of course, is the surgical removal of the penile foreskin from the glans – the fleshy crown of the penis. It is one of the most commonly performed procedures in American hospitals and, except for abortion, it may be the most controversial. The procedure has long been known to reduce the spread of a few rare, serious diseases, and to prevent a few annoying, uncomfortable ones. But in 1999, the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) determined that the risk of surgical complications, though small, nearly cancelled out the benefits. They neither discouraged nor recommended the procedure. Since then, 16 states have eliminated Medicaid coverage for nearly all circumcisions.

But 2 years ago, a consortium of experts convened by the World Health Organization and UNAIDS (the United Nations' HIV program) announced that circumcision should indeed "be part of a comprehensive HIV prevention package". It did so because three separate, meticulous medical trials in Kenya, Uganda, and South Africa, involving more than 10,000 men, had proved that circumcision could reduce the risk of female-to-male HIV infection by approximately 60 percent. This discovery is one that, over the next two decades, could save three million lives in Africa alone.

Now, no one believes that the potential health benefits for American males are nearly as great, or as urgent, as they are for men in Africa, where HIV is spread mostly through heterosexual intercourse. Still, similar study results are turning up on this continent as well. A team of researchers from the CDC, Johns Hopkins, and the Baltimore health department examined the records of more than 1,000 African American males – all heterosexual – who tested positive for HIV at Maryland clinics. Uncircumcised men were 50 percent more likely to be infected. These results have caused many U.S. doctors to reconsider their positions. "I've always told families that the health benefits of circumcision are real, but not enough to warrant advocating that all boys be circumcised," says Lise Johnson, M.D., the director of healthy-newborn nurseries at Boston's Brigham and Women's Hospital. "But I find these HIV studies pretty striking. The weight of scientific evidence might be shifting in favour of circumcision."

Larry, the new dad, is circumcised himself but never thought much about circumcision until his wife became pregnant. "Joy kept saying, 'It's up to you,'" Larry tells Dr. Wang, "but when I finally said I wanted to do it, she said, 'Whoa! We have to talk.'" After a few uneasy moments, the new father's feelings spill out. "I guess I don't feel too strongly either way," he says, looking at his son tenderly. "But if there's a risk of hurting him..."

Dr. Wang says the operation rarely hurts much anymore; since the 1990s, it's become routine in U.S. hospitals to anaesthetize babies before the procedure. For every 1,500 circumcisions, there are maybe three complications, nearly all of which amount to a little unexpected bleeding or a treatable infection. In return, according to the AAP, circumcised boys have a lower risk of urinary-tract infections and penile cancer, and, indeed, "a slightly lower risk of getting sexually transmitted infections (STIs), including HIV, the virus that causes AIDS."

Circumcised or not, every man owes his foreskin a great debt of gratitude for its service in the womb. In the third month of gestation, when the nascent penis begins to bloom, the foreskin forms a little protective blanket under which the rest of the penis can safely grow. But once you and your penis are fully baked, the advantage of a foreskin is not clear. Some scientists speculate that it protected the prehistoric penis as it swung, naked, through thick forests and over tall grasses; and unless you take your penis on that sort of excursion, they argue, you don't need a foreskin.

That perceived uselessness may be one reason circumcision has such a long and varied history. Archaeological evidence suggests that the practice may be at least 6,000 years old. Muslims and Jews, along with the aborigines of Australia, the Aztecs and Mayans of this hemisphere, and many other cultures all independently adopted this squirm-inducing practice, and it seems unlikely they'd have done so unless they were convinced that it conferred some earthly benefit. Here in the United States, foreskins were left mostly undisturbed until the second half of the nineteenth century. But it wasn't until the North Africa campaign of World War II that American doctors turned into enthusiastic circumcisers. More than 145,000 American GIs based there slacked off on their cleaning regimens and came down with foreskin-related ouches – chiefly, balanoposthitis (inflammation of the foreskin and glans), phimosis (a foreskin that's too tight to retract over the glans), and paraphimosis (a foreskin stuck in the retracted position). After the war, doctors advanced a theory that circumcision reduces rates of cervical cancer – a hypothesis now confirmed by scientific research. Circumcision became routine, but anaesthesia wasn't part of the plan. That, more than any other factor, may have provoked the fiery anti-circumcision movement that casts its long shadow over the Internet.

Isaac is a newborn whose mother, months before she gave birth, made the decision to circumcise him. He awaits Dr. Wang atop a small operating table. His expression is blasé until a nurse standing over him slides a sugar-coated pacifier into his mouth. His eyes open wide and he commences sucking with gusto. Sugar, Dr. Wang says, is known to send a rush of endorphins to certain parts of the brain, dulling sensitivity to pain. Dr. Wang gently wraps Isaac's legs in a soft harness. Until fairly recently, he remarks, it was standard practice to restrain babies' arms, too. "But it's distressing to them to be tied down like that, and it's really not necessary."

Fortunately, Dr. Wang says, circumcision is no longer performed in American hospitals without anaesthesia. After a quick examination of Isaac's manhood (if that's the right word for it), Dr. Wang administers four evenly spaced injections of lidocaine around the base of the baby's penis; Isaac shows no distress. At that point, Dr. Wang waits 5 minutes for the anaesthetic to take effect, then swabs Isaac's privates with sterilizing iodine and gets down to business. He arranges a clamp that pulls the foreskin forward, off the penis, where it can be safely cut off with surgical scissors in one snip. Isaac became agitated only once – when his sugary pacifier fell from his mouth. "Usually," says Dr. Wang, "the part they hate most is being washed off afterward. They don't like to feel the cold."

A few weeks later, I call Larry to find out what he's decided to do. "We opted not to do it," he says. "When you go on the Internet and read about this," he says, "you find out that there's really no reason for doing it. People try to think up new justifications for it, and when one doesn't work, they come up with another."

If you go on the Internet, you'll 'find out' precisely what Larry found out. The problem is, it's not true. I googled the word "circumcision", and two of the first three sites that popped up were the Circumcision Research Center and the Circumcision Information and Resource Pages – titles that suggest unbiased collections of data. In fact, both sites are run by anti-circumcision crusaders. A seemingly unending list of similar sites followed: Mothers Against Circumcision, Doctors Opposing Circumcision, Stop Infant Circumcision Society, and Milos' NOCIRC. Many of these activists have spent decades arguing that circumcision has no medical value, and recent scientific revelations have left them red-faced – not with embarrassment, but anger. According to Milos, for instance, all three of the Africa trials were part of what she calls an "ill-fated plot to circumcise everyone regardless of AIDS status!" She and others often demonize the scientists whose research has produced facts that contradict their extremist views.

Daniel Halperin, Ph.D., spent much of the 1990s poring over epidemiological studies of AIDS, looking for places in Africa and Asia where HIV rates were relatively low and then trying to figure out why. Halperin, a senior research scientist at Harvard's school of public health, concluded that circumcision played a role and he paid a high price for saying so – many people thought he was nuts. In some ways, since he's been proved right, the price has become steeper. To get a flavor of it, look at his inbox. "F**K OFF," begins one e-mail, "with your PRO-CIRCUMCISION BIASED BULLS**T ... [forcing] genital surgery on young boys who haven't done anything wrong." Another e-mail calls him "a Super Racist" devoted to the murder of Black Africans under the guise of helping them. "It's been quite a struggle," Halperin sighs, shaking his head.

But it's not without its rewards. The Africa trials add substantial weight to a mounting pile of evidence that circumcision also reduces the spread of other sexually transmitted illnesses, including several types of cancer and venereal disease. The journal BMC Infectious Diseases published a study (coauthored by Halperin and four others) that compared rates of cervical cancer – caused by the sexually transmitted human papillomavirus, or HPV – in more than 100 countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. In countries where fewer than 20 percent of men were circumcised, cervical-cancer rates were about 70 percent higher than in countries where more than 80 percent were circumcised.

All of this makes many public-health experts in the United States lament the decision of some states to withdraw Medicaid coverage for routine circumcision. “Because uncircumcised males face greater risk of HIV and other sexually transmitted infections,” a different study concludes, “lack of Medicaid coverage for circumcision may translate into future health disparities for children born to poor families.”

So what's the verdict? Should all males be circumcised? Not one doctor or scientist interviewed for this article expressed that opinion. Robert Bailey, Ph.D., a professor of epidemiology at the University of Illinois at Chicago, feels that “American parents should definitely factor all of this in, but it's not an automatic. Most of the diseases [circumcision] is known to prevent are pretty rare in the United States.” But, Halperin notes, “those illnesses may be rare at least partly because circumcision has been so widespread here.” But whatever you decide for you and yours, do not let anyone tell you circumcision can't slow the march of HIV. At a time when billions of American tax dollars are pouring into Africa to fight AIDS, it is extremely important that money is spent on methods that have been proved to help.

Damages For Surprise Circumcision

A man who woke up in a Norwegian hospital and found himself the recipient of an unexpected circumcision has been awarded NOK 20,000 (US$ 3,000) in compensation from the surgeon.

The Court of Appeals ruled that the physician in charge was negligent for not reading the man's journal before the operation, and found the result of the surgery constituted injury. The patient told the court that he would never have embarked on surgery to relieve an uncomfortably tight foreskin if he had known a circumcision would result.

The man claimed that the circumcision had destroyed his sex life by reducing the sensitivity of his penis and because he was now embarrassed to appear naked in front of his wife. He said he was also embarrassed to be naked in public bathing facilities now.

The surgeon said in his defence that at least 60 percent of American men are circumcised and that the procedure is routine for Jewish and Muslim babies. He also argued that the man was objectively better after the operation and he had been warned that the foreskin could be partially or completely removed.

The appeals court chose to believe that the resulting circumcision came as a shock to the patient, and ruled he had suffered damage, though not 'considerable' damage. The court also ruled that circumcision remains unusual in Norway and that the physical changes to the man's organ were self-evident.

Gays Know Whether They Are Cut

[A report on research published in Sexually Transmitted Infections]

There is a proven association between circumcision and the prevention of HIV infection. But if men do not know whether or not they are circumcised, there could be misreporting of status, leading to misleading results. So a study was undertaken in Australia among gay men, basically to discover whether they knew their status.

A subgroup of 240 participants in the Health in Men (HIM) cohort study in Sydney, Australia attending annual interview agreed to a brief genital examination by a trained study nurse who was unaware of their previous self-reported circumcision status.

Three cases in which the examining study nurse was unsure of participants' circumcision status were excluded. Of the remaining 237 participants, 155 (65.4%) were classified as circumcised on examination. All participants who self-reported being circumcised were found on examination to be circumcised. Five participants who self identified as being uncircumcised at baseline were classified as circumcised on examination. The overall agreement between circumcision status on examination and self-report was 97.9%.

The study concluded that self-report is a valid measure of circumcision status in this group of predominantly Anglo gay-community-attached men. The researchers believe their findings can be generalised to similarly aged gay-community-attached men in other developed countries.

Man Sues For New Foreskin

A German man who was circumcised against his will during emergency penis surgery is suing his doctor for cash to rebuild his foreskin. Karl Spandl, 50, from Bonn was rushed to the Troisdorf Hospital for surgery after a painful abscess developed on his penis. But while he was under the knife his doctor, unnamed for legal reasons, also chose to remove his foreskin to prevent complications. Spandl said: "When I woke up I almost passed out again with shock. I never said they could take that. And now I have almost no feeling in the tip – my sex life has been totally ruined."

The mechanic is now demanding £14,000 from his surgeon for a second penis operation – this time to rebuild his foreskin using membranes taken from inside his mouth.

Editorial

In my gym locker room a couple of weeks ago, an American father and his toddler son were changing into their swimming togs. Both were neatly cut. Across the gangway, a similar English father and son were still intact. And so the different traditions continue. But which of the two boys will gain most from their heritage – the circumcised or the uncircumcised? My Editor's Column this edition tackles the controversial question of Routine Infant Circumcision (RIC). In a related article reprinted from Time, a father agonises as to whether to have his baby boy cut.

Incidentally, I am told that the preferred expansion of the R in RIC is now Requested rather than Routine. I find difficulty with this change. I acknowledge the difference between a circumcision which is performed to resolve a medical problem and one which is requested by parents for cultural or prophylactic reasons. However, surely the argument is that the benefits of circumcision are so great that the procedure should be applied routinely to all baby boys. So, for the time being, I shall carry on using Routine as my preferred terminology.

Routine Infant Circumcision

Baby Luke is seven days old. Hanging from his penis is a Plastibell. Its function is to strangulate his foreskin. In a few days time, the Plastibell will fall away together with his necrosed foreskin. Luke will then be fully circumcised.

Routine infant circumcision is a controversial procedure – the more extreme opponents categorise it as genital mutilation. Even people who judge the operation objectively have qualms about removing healthy, natural tissue without any immediate medical need. So is Luke going through an antiquated and obsolete operation, or will his circumcision ultimately be to his benefit?

Three main arguments are put forward in favour of infant circumcision: it protects against urinary tract infection (UTI) in the early years and offers some protection against HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases from puberty onwards; it acts prophylactically to prevent diseases of the foreskin such as phimosis and balanitis; and it improves the sexual function. We will look at each of these arguments in turn.

UTIs are bacterial infections of the urinary tract (kidneys, ureters, bladder and urethra). They can become serious if undetected, and may lead to permanent kidney damage. There is evidence that UTIs are less common in circumcised infants. This has been substantiated in a systematic review of twelve research studies into the matter conducted by D Singh-Grewal et al and published in the Archives of Diseases of Childhood 2005. There were three different types of study design within the review but all had a similar result and indicated a large reduction in UTI rates in circumcised over uncircumcised boys. Circumcision substantially reduces the rate of UTIs.

With respect to sexually transmitted infections (STIs), the most recent research has just been published in the New England Journal of Medicine in a paper entitled “Male Circumcision for the Prevention of HSV-2 and HPV Infections and Syphilis” by Tobian, Serwadda, Quinn, et al. (See report on page 5.)

The study investigated whether male circumcision prevents certain sexually transmitted infections (STIs) in HIV-negative adolescent boys and men. The STIs included herpes simplex virus type 2 (HSV-2), human papillomavirus (HPV) infections as well as syphilis. 3,393 males were included in this study and randomly allocated to either immediate circumcision (1,684 males) or circumcision after a 24-month wait (after the study had finished).

What were the results of the study? After 24 months, the circumcised men had a 7.8% overall chance of testing positive for the genital herpes virus, compared to a 10.3% chance in the uncircumcised group. In the circumcised group, the prevalence of high-risk HPV genotypes was 18% compared to 27.9% in the uncircumcised group. There was no significant difference between the two study groups in the proportion that developed syphilis.

What interpretations did the researchers draw from these results? The researchers say that “in addition to decreasing the incidence of HIV infection, male circumcision significantly reduced the incidence of HSV-2 infection and the prevalence of HPV infection". They say that other related research shows that male circumcision decreases the rates of HIV, HSV-2, and HPV infections in men. In their female partners, it reduces infections of trichomoniasis, bacterial vaginosis and other sexually transmitted infections. The researchers conclude that their findings "underscore the potential public health benefits of the procedure".

To the results of this study can be added the results of the three randomised controlled clinical trials conducted in Africa to determine whether circumcision of adult males would reduce their risk for HIV infection. The studies showed that circumcised men had a 60% reduced chance of acquiring the HIV virus over their uncircumcised peers.

Thus the first reason for infant circumcision is justified. It confers substantial protection against UTIs in infancy and STIs in adulthood.

There are three main problems that can occur with foreskins – phimosis, balanitis and frenulum breve. In phimosis, the opening of the foreskin is too narrow to allow the foreskin to be retracted over the glans. A foreskin may retract perfectly during boyhood but nevertheless become phimotic at puberty. This is because, as the glans grows, it becomes too large for the foreskin opening. Frenulum breve is where the frenulum is too short or too tight causing a painful pulling on the glans during sexual activity. In fact, a guy can learn to accommodate frenulum breve by adapting his masturbation technique and the problem then becomes apparent only on intercourse. Thrusting can be extremely painful or, alternatively, the frenulum snaps, again with pain and considerable bleeding. Balanitis, inflammation of the foreskin or glans, can occur at any age.

It is estimated that up to 10% of males have penile problems which require circumcision. If all males were circumcised in infancy, such adult interventions would be obviated. But, it will be argued, 10% is a relatively low rate and does not justify the wholesale slaughter of all foreskins. Let those who suffer have surgical intervention as necessary, as happens with all other medical diseases. The problem is that these penile defects manifest themselves mainly at puberty or during first sexual relations. It can be extremely embarrassing, mortifying even, for a teenage boy to be faced with such difficulties at this age. Men are notoriously reluctant to consult their doctor about any illness. How much more reluctant they will be to consult about a penile problem, especially if their doctor happens to be female. Many men just grin and bear it. Indeed, it is probable that many men have a low quality sex life because of foreskin problems which they live with. They may not even know how the foreskin should function. Many men with phimosis are not aware that their foreskin is meant to retract and they become aware of the problem only when infection occurs because of lack of foreskin hygiene.

Apart from the embarrassment factor, there is the economic. Adult circumcision is much more expensive than infant circumcision. The operation is more complex – sutures are required for an adult, and healing can be complicated by penile erections. Add to this, the GP consultations, the referral process, the initial consultation, the operation itself and the follow up, all involving more medical and administrative resources together with work-time lost for the patient. Infant circumcision on the other hand is a relatively simple process with few of the concomitant costs which adult circumcision involves. In addition, circumcision at this young age is an insurance policy against future penile problems. Baby Luke will never suffer from phimosis, frenulum breve or balanitis.

Turning to the question of sexual performance, the anti-circumcision lobby argues that circumcision both removes erogenous tissue (the inner foreskin) and blunts the sensitivity of the glans through exposure. The sexual experience of circumcised men is thereby diminished. Studies to confirm or deny these claims are difficult to carry out. The majority of circumcised men were circumcised in infancy or pre-puberty. They therefore have no sexual experience with a foreskin with which to compare their cut experience. Even when men are circumcised as adults, before and after comparisons are difficult because the circumcision may have been carried out for medical reasons; the sexual experience of such males may not be typical of those with problem-free foreskins.

A study, published in the January issue of BJU International, sheds more light on the impact of circumcision on male sexual satisfaction and function. The study involved 4,456 sexually experienced Ugandan men (aged 15 to 49) who were HIV negative. All men were scheduled to receive circumcision; however one group was circumcised as soon as the study began and a second group was circumcised two years later. Researchers looked at sexual desire, satisfaction and function in both groups at six, 12, and 24 months. Their findings included:

- 98.6 per cent of the circumcised men reported no problems in penetration, compared with 99.4 per cent of the control group.
- 99.4 per cent of the circumcised men reported no pain on intercourse, compared with 98.8 per cent of the control group.
- Sexual satisfaction was more or less constant in the circumcision group – 98.5 per cent on enrolment and 98.4 per cent after two years – but rose slightly from 98 per cent to 99.9 per cent in the control group. This difference was not felt to be clinically significant.

At the six-month visit there was a small, but statistically significant, difference in problems with penetration and pain among the circumcised group, but this was temporary and was not reported at subsequent follow-up visits.

This study demonstrates that circumcision does not result in any decrease in sexual function or satisfaction. It reinforces other studies which have shown no decrease in sensitivity in circumcised men. Circumcision can therefore be argued as a win-win situation. It does not adversely affect the sexual experience for anyone, but significantly improves that experience for anyone with foreskin problems.

It is fashionable to argue that the foreskin should not be removed before the age of consent; that the foreskin should be left in place until the guy himself is old enough to decide on its removal. But that is to treat circumcision as a cosmetic procedure – a life style choice like a tattoo or a piercing. Circumcision is in a different league from that. If the above evidence is to be believed, it is a minor procedure which confers lifelong benefits. Surely routine infant circumcision is a no-brainer?

Circumcision Is Found to Curb Two S.T.D.'s

[By Nicholas Bakalar, the New York Times]

Male circumcision, already shown to reduce the incidence of HIV infection in men, also reduces transmission of both herpes simplex virus Type 2 and human papilloma virus, a study has found.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, at least 45 million people in the United States aged 12 and older have had herpes, or HSV-2, the incurable infection that can cause recurrent painful genital lesions. About 20 million are currently infected with human papilloma virus, or HPV, which causes various genital cancers, including most cervical cancers. There is no treatment or cure for HPV, but there is a vaccine now licensed only for girls and women.

The study, a randomized clinical trial published in The New England Journal of Medicine, assigned more than 3,000 uncircumcised Ugandan men who were not infected with HSV-2 to undergo immediate circumcision or to be circumcised 24 months from the start of the investigation. A subgroup was similarly evaluated for HPV infection.

At 24 months, 114 men of the men initially circumcised and 153 of the non-circumcised tested positive for HSV-2. After controlling for various health and behavioral factors, the researchers estimated that circumcised men had a 25 percent reduced risk of infection. The results do not apply to their partners. For the types of HPV that cause genital cancer, the results were even more striking. About 18 percent of circumcised men were infected at the end of two years, compared with almost 28 percent in the control group. Even after adjustment for types of sexual practices, symptoms of sexually transmitted infections and other variables, the circumcised men had a 35 percent reduced risk of infection.

The mechanism for the effect is unclear, but the authors suggest that the retraction of the foreskin during intercourse exposes the penis to infection, and that the moist area under the foreskin may then provide a protected environment in which the viruses can flourish.

Asked about the applicability of the African results to men in the United States, the study's senior author, Dr. Ronald H. Gray, a professor of reproductive epidemiology at Johns Hopkins, said, "There is no reason to believe that this is in any way unique to Africa."

The study confirms the results of two previous trials in South Africa, and Dr. Gray believes that taken together the studies have significant implications for public health. "The findings suggest that there are important lifetime health benefits to the procedure," he said. "I think it's important that pediatricians consider the lifelong benefits that might accrue from circumcision when they are advising parents on whether the procedure should be performed in baby boys."

Other experts agreed. Robert C. Bailey, a professor of epidemiology at the University of Illinois, Chicago, who has published widely on the subject, said the American Academy of Pediatrics and other professional associations "are not taking the lead in providing clinicians, nurses and midwives – the people who assist parents in making decisions,” with the information they need. “And so parents are not being fully informed,” he added.

An editorial published with the study said that rates of circumcision in the United States were declining, and that they were lowest among black and Hispanic patients, groups with disproportionately high rates of HIV, herpes infection and cervical cancer. There are 16 states in which Medicaid does not pay for routine circumcision, and this may exacerbate the problem among the poor, the editorial said. The authors acknowledge that both intervention and control subjects were self-selected, and that compliant subjects might be at lower risk for infection to begin with. That could result in an underestimation of the effect. Since the men were evaluated only at 24 months, it also is difficult to determine whether the lower rate of infection was because of a reduced rate of acquisition or an increased rate of infection clearance.

Still, considering the results of their own and previous studies, the researchers conclude that circumcision should now be accepted as an effective intervention for HSV-2 and HPV prevention, even though they emphasize that the procedure is only partly effective and that the promotion of safe sex is still essential.

No More Smelly Foreskins!

A new cream, NodorO™, is on the market. Its function is to banish genital odour. The blurb from the website is reprinted below. The cream is manufactured in the United States but can be shipped internationally. It can be bought from the website www.nodoro.com at a cost of $12.99 per tube.

Have you ever asked yourself

“Why is it that no matter how much time and effort I put into washing my penis in the shower, I still get that awful whiff of a rancid smell throughout the day, or even right after a shower?”

Don't worry, you are not alone. Finally, there is a solution. NodorO™ is a safe and effective OTC (Over The Counter) medicated cream developed in accordance with an FDA approved monograph; NodorO's brand was specifically created to destroy and prevent MGO (Male Genital Odours) and can be obtained right here on this website. Do not get fooled by scented creams and oils. NodorO™ does not mask or cover the smell, it REMOVES, KILLS and PREVENTS ODOURS. You must solve the problem at the source by using NodorO™.

President/CEO and NodorO™ Creator, Dominic Adams suffered from MGO since he was a teenager, until he realized his discovery. Adams personally tested the product for several years, which inspired him to share his discovery with the world and created NodorO™. “I could not imagine my sexual life without NodorO™ anymore. I have no more fears of repulsing my partner due to bad genital odours. For anyone who has ever dealt with MGO, it is a miracle cream. I went from being embarrassed because of the smell, to being confident,” says Adams without embarrassment or shame anymore.

Typically, MGO occurs with men who are not circumcised. Due to the moist environment between the foreskin against the glans, it is a favourable environment for the growth of fungi cells. NodorO™ targets the micro-fungi called tinea corporis that may be causing your MGO. However, MGO is also common with men who are circumcised.

Sex can offer you some of the best and most intense moments in your life. But unpleasant odours can ruin your sex life and potentially your relationships. Let's be honest, unpleasant smells are a turn off for anyone, and the last thing you want is for a fishy smell to be coming from your own penis. Simply apply NodorO™ for 2 days (see instructions), and you will notice results right away. Use as needed and as directed.

We understand that such a problem is very embarrassing, therefore NodorO™ will be shipped anonymously and will be billed to your card discreetly. Don't wait anymore! Take charge of your hygiene, improve your confidence, and get NodorO™ today. You too, will soon be able to say: "I SMELL PERFECT!"

An Attention-grabbing Topic

Circumcision seems to dominate Men's Magazines and the internet more than ever. It is a topic or subject that has grabbed people's attention in recent times. Put the case: should all men be circumcised? Some will answer yes and others no.

As a circumcised man I am in favour of circumcision just for the 'cosmetic appearance' – if nothing else. Compulsory or mandatory circumcision is dead against my principles and smacks of the totalitarian state and there would be no equivalent for women. In my opinion, all circumcisions should be voluntarily performed unless some dire medical condition dictates otherwise. As for the proliferation of 'circumcision clinics' for the want of a better term – I believe this is a good trend. It would give a man the opportunity to consult the clinic and if necessary, 'book himself in for the op' without giving away too much information to other people.

My circumcision was performed when I was about three years old in the early years of WW2 at the behest of my mother and due to phimosis. I was duly taken to the Jewish Hospital and appropriately circumcised. A few days later I was taken back and my stitches were removed to reveal a perfect circumcision. However, my frenulum was left intact and over the years gave me some irritation during intercourse despite the sexual position we were adopting at the time. August 06 gave me an answer to this discomfort – a re-circumcision at the Custom House Clinic in London with Dr Zarifa. Arrangements were easy with Sylvia Nicholas the admissions secretary. I had some skin on the shaft of my penis removed which gave a tighter feel and appearance. My frenulum was also removed which makes intercourse much more pleasant.

Should I Opt For Circumcision?

[An article by Joel Stein from Time]

I knew having a child would force me to examine my life, but I didn't expect to have to start with my penis. When my wife and I found out we were having a boy, everyone asked if we were going to circumcise him. All I knew was that circumcision is something the U.S. does and Europe doesn't and is therefore awesome. Our penises are clean and sleek and new like Frank Gehry skyscrapers, while theirs are crumbling, ancient edifices inhabited by fat old men in hats.

But when I thought about it, there was something disturbing about the fact that someone had chopped off part of my penis – a part that not only had nerve endings and a protective function but also could have made me look bigger. When I presented these arguments to my lovely wife Cassandra, she told me to shut up. Her argument was largely based on aesthetics and involved a lot of detailed talk about the surprising number of men she had dated. It's hard to win a debate when you're busy covering your ears and singing to yourself.

I argued that our son would not feel embarrassed either way, since compared with American babies in the 1960s, when 90% got snipped, about half of newborns are now deforeskinned – and only about 30% of California infants. I went on Facebook to ask if being made fun of in the locker room was apocryphal. What I learned is that even Facebook users disapprove of making parental decisions on Facebook. And kids probably don't make fun of one another, since the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that only 69% of circumcised and 65% of uncircumcised adolescents know which one they are. Also, you don't need to be Don Rickles to respond to someone's mockery of your foreskin with a casual "Dude, why are you staring at my penis?"

All I knew was that this is clearly not a decision I should be making for another human being. What school he attends, what he eats, which bouncy seat he should bounce in – sure. Whether to alter your genitals for aesthetic reasons is a question meant for your mid-20s at Burning Man.

Still, I knew this decision was going to be made now or never, so I started asking every medical professional, woman and gay man what kind of penis they preferred, which, to my shock, got me a lot of dinner invitations. Though there seemed to be a slight aesthetic preference for not wearing a hat and a slight functional preference for keeping one on, no one had a really good argument for giving your baby plastic surgery. A paediatrician told me the sole reason he circumcised his son was so that the kid looked like him. If my son looks at my penis and the biggest difference he notices is foreskin, I have far more serious problems. Plus, if I wanted my son to look like me, I wouldn't have worked so hard to marry someone better-looking than I am.

It turns out, though, that there's an enormous group of people who would argue passionately for my son's foreskin. Francis Crick and Jonas Salk were among the Nobel laureates who signed a petition to the World Court to end circumcision. The last week of March was Genital Integrity Awareness Week, which included a march from the White House to the Capitol, which, while not far in miles, is an eternity when measured in baby foreskins. This cause is so real, it has its own ribbon. There's even a group called Jews Against Circumcision, made up almost exclusively of Jews whose parents no longer talk to them.

The antislipping crusaders argue that the ancient Greeks rejected this violent tribal custom of the Jews and Muslims; hardly anyone practises it anymore besides those groups and Americans. They argue that the Jews created it as a way either to exclude women from their club or to ritualize the sacrifice of the firstborn male. They say it was brought to the U.S. in Victorian times only as a means of reducing masturbation by limiting sensation, in what has to be the biggest failed medical experiment in history.

Cassandra would not hear any of this. She felt strongly that our son should feel Jewish and that when she bathes him, she shouldn't have to touch his penis too much. And then last month, a study from Africa showed that circumcision greatly reduces the chances of catching a sexually transmitted disease. And I had lost my argument.

So in a few weeks, I'm going to buy some bagels, call a mohel who is also a paediatric surgeon and believes in local anaesthetic, and do something that I'm pretty sure is wrong. I have a horrible feeling that all of parenthood is like this.

Circumcising Tyler

[At the end of last year, a father recorded his thoughts as he arranged the circumcision of his adolescent son. The account is being serialised over a number of editions of the newsletter.]

Part 2 – Convincing Tyler

26 October 2008

Now that I had a good doctor, it was time to sit down with Tyler and tell him what was what. It pretty much boiled down to me knocking on his door and coming in and starting to talk about how he was becoming a man and how his body's changing and how important it is to have safe sex. He sat in his chair clearly embarrassed but nodding and 'uh-huhing' to show he was listening. I finally said: "You're probably wondering where I'm going with all this." He replied that indeed he was. So I, rather undiplomatically, just came out and said: "Well Tyler, I've decided that the best thing for you is to get circumcised." His eyes just widened, his jaw opened slightly, and he looked at me sideways as I had feared. The rest was rough. He didn't cry but I could tell he was close to it despite my reassurances that being circumcised is best not only for health but for sex and hygiene. I told him I found an excellent doctor who will make sure it doesn't hurt at all and that not only would I get him the iTouch for Christmas but he'll get the Wii as well. I then tried to take the long view by saying: "But I think you'll appreciate your circumcision for far longer than any of those things." That bit of wisdom was lost on him.

Right now he's up in his room here at my place being very quiet. He immediately called his mother who stood by me as we discussed though she immediately called me afterwards worried about him. Despite everything between us, she is a good mother and for that I'm thankful. This is one of those times I just feel like, "You're mean daddy!" I'm going to spend time building up his enthusiasm for this once the shock wears off. I gave him a print-out showing an adult penis cut in the low and tight style and the entire page of teen and adult reactions from Circlist. He tossed it aside when I gave it to him though I'm sure he'll read it at some point.

I don't think he's so against being circumcised as the idea of having surgery as that was what he talked about most, though he did surprise me when he asked me if it would feel different when he masturbated. I explained that it would but that it would feel better after he had healed. He was, oddly, also concerned how many people would be looking at him and if he would be in the hospital. I think the idea of a lot of people looking at his penis is embarrassing for him. Otherwise he was very concerned how many shots he would have and if he would have an IV. I told him I did not know but would ask the doctor though I assured him the surgery would be painless.

Frankly, I expected more opposition though it wasn't the "I've been dying to ask you about it Dad!" reaction I hoped for. I'm going to play it by ear and gradually introduce him to the idea that this is a positive experience with a lot to look forward to. I am still certain I've made the right choice.

28 October 2008

Tyler turned 13 this summer. We spent a good part of yesterday discussing this entire situation. I apologized for making it sound like an order and went into greater detail about all the benefits of circumcision. He read the print outs I gave him last night and I think that, at this point, he's more worried about having surgery than what the surgery is about. His best friends are circumcised and I believe most kids around here are, so we also talked about looking like other guys. I'm not sure where he is in puberty compared to his friends, but I think he's lagging a bit behind. When I asked the paediatrician about it I got the pre-canned response, "all boys are different, whatever he's at is right for him, etc. etc." OK, but when he goes to high school next year will he be ridiculed or will he fit in? I know many kids these days either don't shower after sports or shower with their underwear on. I think it's a bit ridiculous having lived through the non-trauma of gang showers my entire high school experience. However I do want to encourage Tyler to branch out in other sports. I'm not a rah-rah sports dad by any means. What's important is that he be healthy and look after himself. It's so easy to get fat these days and I think the habits he develops now will last him through his adult life.

I didn't push the issue any more than he seemed willing to talk about but I did emphasize that this decision was made with every regard for his health and that I made it with love for him. I was kind of surprised. Usually when I say things like he bristles or sighs or I get a "Daaad!" This time he just said: "I know."

Tyler has asked me not to tell his brother David about it and I agreed that Tyler should be the one to tell David. This is a private matter though he should speak to his brother about it before the time comes. David is nine and he's in the same situation that Tyler is. I told Tyler that it's very important that he not frighten David because he'll be going through it himself soon enough. I completely expect David to be much easier to handle once Tyler is done. They fight like cats and dogs, have very different personalities and interests, but I do know that David looks up to Tyler the same way I did with my older brother. Once Tyler is done, I expect David to fairly pester me to be circumcised. That's the kind of dynamic they have. What one has, the other wants.

1 November 2008

As an update, I've decided to take my son in early for the initial consult so he can ask the doctor all the questions I can't answer. Tyler's very interested in talking to the doctor and understanding everything about what's going on. I'm happy to say he's gone from shocked to cautious to curious. I admit I also want to meet this doctor so I can get a feel for him before I commit my son's circumcision to him. If he can put Tyler at ease then I think that will greatly relieve the anxiety.

I have apologized to Tyler for sounding like such a jerk when I first spoke to him. I was very nervous speaking to him and I guess that showed in how I raised the whole issue. Now that the whole initial awkwardness of the subject has passed, we've talked more about it more comfortably and I think we're both much happier with how it's all going.

25 November 2008

Tyler had his consult today with the urologist doing his circumcision. As I stated earlier, I wanted to move up the consult so he could have his lingering questions answered that I felt would be answered best by the doctor.

The doctor interviewed us both together asking about why I thought Tyler should be circumcised and I responded with the health, cleanliness, and social reasons which I believe are important. The doctor basically agreed with me though he did warn us quite strictly that circumcision is no substitute for a condom. Poor Tyler turned beet red but then did perk up a bit when the doctor mentioned that condoms are easier to use for circumcised men, something I hadn't thought of.

As the conversation turned to discussing just how things would go, Tyler started asking questions about anaesthesia, pain, how long it would all take, stitches, if he would be awake, and if other people would be able to tell he wasn't circumcised at birth. The doctor spoke frankly and with a reassuring smile on his face the entire time. He talked to Tyler like an adult and that always impresses me. He's board certified, says he's likely done hundreds of circumcisions and as he said: "I've never had one fall off yet!" That got a chuckle from Tyler and that made me happy.

After that, he and Tyler went into the examination room while I read an ancient issue of Architectural Digest with Rod Stewart on the cover, but they were out in less than ten minutes, Tyler looking slightly sheepish if none the worse. He then sent Tyler out to the waiting room while he asked me about medical histories and if I was sure this was what I wanted and did I know that Tyler had a tight frenulum? I replied that I didn't as Tyler had never mentioned it to me. Well guess what? Now that he does, insurance will cover the procedure and so that's less money out of my pocket. That done, I paid and we left.

On the way home I asked Tyler if he felt good about this doctor and if he had all his questions answered. He said he had and when I asked him if he was OK with it, he said he was. Then he asked not to talk about it any more.

And that was that. We're still scheduled for the 26th of next month and we'll see how it all goes. I'm really glad we did this before the surgery itself. It seemed to relieve Tyler's anxiety a great deal and made me feel more confident in my decision on not only circumcision, but the doctor as well.

Tamás' Story

[This is the second personal story from the Hungarian website.]

I am 29 now, and I had no problem whatsoever with my foreskin, as I could easily pull it back even when fully erect. In fact, I was not fully satisfied with it, because it was quite long and thick, and I had problems with using condoms. Plus, if the girl was not tight enough, my skin slipped forward and I was moving back and forth in my own foreskin. Nevertheless, I had never thought of getting circumcised until early 2007, and I thought that voluntary (non-medical) circumcision is a simple nonsense.

On one occasion, my girlfriend at that time started to play with my dick with the foreskin fully pulled back with one hand, and stroking the mushroom head with her other, and I liked it a lot. I also did it when I was alone, and I tried to keep my foreskin pulled back. Unfortunately, it did not work, because as I said it was too long and thick, so my glans could not hold it back. I started to browse the net to get some idea what to do, chatted with lots of guys who were circumcised, and I sort of started thinking about getting it done myself. By then I had a new girlfriend to whom I mentioned the idea and she was very pleased with it. It turned out that she wanted to suggest circumcision herself, as her ex-boyfriends were all circumcised, and she thought that every man is cut in Hungary, just like in the US.

I chose Dr Fekete, who runs a successful private clinic in Budapest, specialises in men's health and does scores of circumcisions. I was circumcised in late June 2007 and I had a very smooth and problem-less healing period. Unfortunately, the doctor did not cut off enough skin and the scar was not too nice either, so I went back to him in April 2008 and had a correction surgery done. My second operation was also very smooth and I healed very quickly. Now I have a new girlfriend who loves my circumcised dick and I am also very pleased with my organ. I have already decided that I will get my future sons circumcised as soon as possible. I am sure the mother will agree, as it is a lot better for the man and for the girlfriends and for the future wife too.

Circumcision In Fiction

[Extracts from The Young Stud by Peter Brown]

(This is taken from fiction about guys being taken into slavery. In this story, Steve has just been sold and is about to be inspected by his new owner.)

I wondered what my owner would be like, and stood there trembling in anticipation and worry. I was standing there buck naked when I heard a guard snap "Turn around, boy, and stand still!" There in front of me was an older guy and behind him, another guy: tall and very well muscled.

The older man's eyes raked me up and down as they had before the auction, and he nodded slightly as he said to me "You're mine now, boy. You will refer to me as 'Boss.'" I was about to say something when the guard looked at him and said "Included in the price is any other procedures you want... vasectomy, circumcision, even castration... We have a fully trained nurse who's qualified for all those operations on slaves."

The man looked at me, and smiled. "Don't look so worried, Steve! The last thing you'll be having is a vasectomy, or the loss of your balls, will he Jeff?" The big guy's faint smile broke into a broad grin as he answered promptly "No, boss!"

"I'm not so sure about the circumcision, though." My owner peered at my dick as he said this, and went on "He's not got a horrible long flap overhanging the end, and I quite like the way his piss slit is peeping through even when he's all shrunk up with the cold. But, on the other hand, especially in your line of business, the traditional 'high and tight' is so much sleeker. You'd agree with that, wouldn't you, Jeff?"

The big guy smiled again. "Well, Boss, it's true that it's easier to shower and everything, and I suppose it looks better when you're not erect... But a young guy like this... Well, it seems a shame to spoil his pleasure as it's not so much fun jerking off without your 'skin..." "Oh, come on, Jeff! When's he going to be jerking off in future?" "Sure, Boss... But mightn't it be better to wait and see how he works? I mean, if you have to sell him if he's unsuitable, then you'd get a better price with him still 'au natural', especially since, as you say, his 'skin kind of enhances the general look of his dick. You could always have it done later..."

My owner nodded.

*****

In the afternoon of the third day, when I was working out as usual in the gym, a guard came over, and told me to follow him. The guard took me into a kind of first aid room, with one of those treatment chairs in it, and after a few moments a youngish guy in slacks and a pullover entered.

"Right, Steve, take that jockstrap off, and sit in the chair, please."

The doctor bent over me, and before I could react, had fastened straps from the chair around my forearms and waist. Then he stood there with a stethoscope, and listened to my heart.” Very good, Steve! Excellent! Not a sign there of any problems, so we can proceed. Now, let me make sure you’re immobile...” As he said this he fastened more straps around my thighs, and a thick one around my chest.

“Sir, please, what...”

“Oh it’s a very simple procedure. I do it all the time, mostly to the newly enslaved. Your owner has decided to have you circumcised.” “No, sir, there must be some mistake... He didn’t have me done when he bought me...” “...and now, evidently, he’s changed his mind. I have the minor procedures order here that he signed when he left you in our charge, and he’s coming back for you tomorrow so there’s no time to be lost...”

He opened a cupboard and laid some stuff out on the top of the low cabinet that lined one side of the room, then came and stood by me holding a black thing, about the size of a fat cigar. “Now, Steve, there will be some... Some, shall we say, ‘discomfort’, I’m afraid. But the whole operation only takes a few minutes. It’s my belief that it’s wrong to anaesthetise a slave during a very minor surgery like this, as it’s better for you to remember how it felt, as an aid to your further understanding of the way that your owner has total control over you. So put this between your teeth and bite down on it – you’ll find it helps to bear the pain. And it stops your screams disturbing everyone else in the building.”

I went to say no, to beg him not to do it, but as I opened my mouth he slipped the rod in. It was hard rubber, and tasted of it. I sat there then, totally unable to move, watching the doctor as he broke open a sterile packet containing a scalpel. He pulled up a low stool and sat on it, between my legs, and said casually “OK, Steve, here we go... The first cut frees everything up...”

I was looking down as he picked up my dick, and ran the scalpel around between my ‘skin and my dick head, at the bottom. Then he ‘skinned me back, showing me that my ‘skin was no longer attached at the base. That lovely sensitive triangle of skin down there was all covered in blood, and it hurt like hell: I was screwing up my face with the effort of trying to remain calm.

“Good”, he muttered to himself. “Now a lot of men find this just a trifle painful, but hang in there...” He took a metal cylinder and slid it down over my dick, pulling the loose ‘skin over the outside. I wanted to shriek as the edge of the cylinder touched the raw part of my dick head underneath, where he’d freed it already, and I could feel sweat breaking out all over me as I heard my muffled screams as I bit down into the rubber as hard as I could. He didn’t say anything then, but teased and stretched my ‘skin along the surface of the cylinder. Then, in one practised, fluid movement, ran the scalpel neatly around, removing a perfect circle of flesh. I could see the blood welling out from the cut ring all around my dick, and I think I was beyond feeling any new pain as my entire dick hurt with a general hurt all over, a hurt that sent stabs of pain through me all the time.

The doctor was smiling at me now: “There, all over... I’ll just spray this with the new miracle stuff... based on spiders’ webs... that seals cuts closed, and stops bleeding: it’s really good in applications like this as there’s a lot less scabbing and almost no residual scarring...” The aerosol was cold against my dick, but I could tell from the way he was washing his hands that it was all over. "Right, Steve ... That's it! A proper 'high and tight' as we say in the trade, so now you look like a slave all over. Now, no jerking off, no sucking of that cock, and certainly no fucking for a week or two. We don't want the wound opening up, do we? A lot of men think that that's the hardest part – not having any form of sex for a time, and it must be particularly difficult for a young, virile guy like you. But I'll warn your owner, too, and perhaps he'll buy you a chastity device – that's usually best, as so many of you slaves are incapable of avoiding temptation!"

With that, he walked out, leaving the guard to undo the belts holding me to the chair, and lead me back to the cell.

Circumcision Within Families

I would like to share some matters regarding circumcision within my family. My father was born in Wales in the early part of the 1900's and was circumcised. While I cannot be sure, I presume that he was done soon after birth. My mother's brother, also born in Wales about 5 years later, was also circumcised. This did take place soon after birth, so I gained from overhearing chatter.

My brother and I were both circumcised. My brother was born in England in the 1930's and I in one of the British African colonies in the 1940's. My brother's son was born in England in the 1950's and he was circumcised.

If I had had sons they would most certainly have been circumcised as where we lived it was common for the gynaecologists attending mothers to offer circumcision to baby boys on the 8th day. Ten years ago my grandson was born here in Australia and his parents carefully considered the situation and decided to have him 'done'. This was not a problem as there are medical practitioners here who gladly offer this service. The boy's father, uncle and grandfather (all born in Australia) are all circumcised, as is another uncle (born in England in the 1960's).

One wonders what the position will be when my grandson perhaps has a son himself. Will he by then have seen the benefits of circumcision or will he consider himself to be an odd man out in his society and not let his son be the same way? Time will tell.

After a famine as far as Society meetings are concerned, two come along together! There is an official meeting scheduled for the end of October (see page 9). I do hope that everyone will make an effort to come along – it offers a great opportunity to meet like minded people and discuss the subject that fascinates us all.

A member is also offering to organise an unofficial meeting in Leeds if there is sufficient interest (see page 10). The two meetings are not in competition. Indeed it would be great if we could have more local meetings, even if only a handful can attend each one. So if any other member wants to take the initiative, I shall be happy to give the necessary publicity.

Meanwhile on page 4 we publish an extract from a doctor's column in the Daily Mail which is actually pro-circumcision. The medical profession has long been the main stumbling block to a greater circumcision rate in the UK. If doctors (and the media) are starting to be more favourably inclined, perhaps the tide is beginning to turn as far as circumcision in the UK is concerned.

Editor's Interview

Edward is very proud of his long, thick member. But that very thickness, he believes, caused the phimosis which necessitated him being circumcised as a teenager.

Edward was born before WW2, but unlike many babies of his era, he was not circumcised at birth. He does not know why and he had no brothers to “compare notes”. However, his father was not cut so it may have been a family trait to stay intact. In contrast, he found that most of his school friends had been “done” in babyhood.

Edward was 16 and had just left school when his father told him he had to be circumcised. “I think it was because he was concerned about cleanliness. I couldn't retract my foreskin at all, with or without an erection, but being a man of the world, he must have realised that I had already been wanking for about two years. He once told me that an uncle was unable to father any children because of his over-tight foreskin. My foreskin wasn't very long but it clung closely to the glans at all times. It didn't hurt my glans, even when erect. I can't remember any irritation or infection. So it must just have been tightness and personal cleanliness that persuaded my father.”

Anyway, Edward was sent to hospital, extremely uneasy about the matter, not because it was a circumcision (most of his school friends had been cut) but because he was afraid of an operation of any kind. It was a strange experience. He had local anaesthesia so was “needled” all round the relevant area, making him insensitive from his navel to just above his knees! Then he was given a series of further needles to amplify the anaesthesia before any surgery began.

Edward takes up the story: “I couldn't really feel anything except a curious and rather unpleasant tickling sensation although I knew exactly where the surgeon was snipping. The nurse asked me if I wanted to watch. I gave a definite ‘No’, so a blanket was placed over my chin to leave me staring at the ceiling.

“When they had finished (i.e. after about 25 minutes), I found they had wrapped miles of bandages around my dick. Their primary concern was to prevent traces of urine soaking into the bandages and possibly infecting the wound, so I was supplied with plenty of anti-bacterial medicine to dab on the bandages. These remained in place, I think, for about five weeks. Curiously, during this time I discovered that they had injected drugs of some kind to maintain an erection, presumably to make the surgery easier for them. (The erection gave me no sexual pleasure!) Eventually I simply found the bandages had dropped off inside my clothing and the revealed dick was painless. I was pleasantly surprised. It was some time before I could enjoy further wanking, solo or otherwise, but of course everything cleared up and eventually I resumed my pleasures.”

Edward was given a tight, low circumcision – the scar, now indistinct, is about half an inch behind the glans. The frenulum was retained. He was quite happy being circumcised and found masturbating (even alone) far more comfortable than when he had a tight foreskin. It was easier for access since he generally wanks by rubbing the rim of his dick-head, rather than by wanking the shaft and using the foreskin passing over and over the glans to excite.

From that time, Edward has enjoyed his circumcised dick on innumerable occasions. He believes that daily orgasm is very beneficial for health! He describes being circumcised as “great”. All his various partners, both female and male, have thought his circumcision “neat”, enhancing the appearance of his large endowment. “They like my size, too,” adds Edward with a sly smile.

Edward confesses to a preference for wanking in company with others and not solo. “My earliest experiences were, inevitably, with friendly schoolboys. I can wank cut and uncut men equally happily. Not many men have wanked me, but those who have, have done it in a similar manner to me wanking them. I don’t think circumcised and uncircumcised men behave differently at all. We should remember that the peak of excitement is not as we cum, but in the few moments when we have reached the inevitable point where we cannot stop cumming in a few moments.”

Edward did his National service in the RAF, but was never posted overseas. “In spite of sharing space in our billets, I saw very few other cocks. I did, once only, have a mutual wanking session with a regular chap, but we never had the opportunity to repeat it. During the night, it was quite common, if one awoke, to see men in adjoining beds lift their bedclothes and wank (and cum?) in view of their neighbour. Sometimes in the gloom I could see a neighbour’s sheets going up and down as he was solo wanking and thought no-one was watching. His groans when he came made me very hard but I was always too shy to do anything like that myself.”

The whole subject of circumcision fascinates Edward. He didn’t know about the different types until he read the Acorn newsletters. To his regret, he finds that more young men today are uncircumcised, “probably because of the costs and NHS unwillingness to perform the operation unnecessarily.”

Edward has ideas about expanding the readership of the newsletter. “A fair proportion of Acorn members will be gay or bisexual men and, of the gay men I meet, the larger majority all have quite an interest in whether friends or partners are circumcised. It’s a subject you often discuss in detail and one in which I have a considerable interest. In suitable private circumstances, it’s very helpful and interesting to see other men’s equipment (erect or not), with or without actual contact. I can vouch personally for getting hard very quickly when I am in a group of accompanying exposed erections.

“If the foregoing is true, I’m sure you would greatly expand the readership of your excellent magazine if several readers would agree to write to you to recount their first (or one of their earliest) sexual experiences and add whether their partner at the time and themselves were circumcised. Interesting points to explain are who made the first approaches and how, and what they liked to do best to enjoy themselves. (Readers would doubtlessly compare all this with their own experiences.)”

Daily Mail Supports Circumcision

[From the Daily Mail column: Ask the doctor]

By the way: from my first days at medical school I opposed the circumcision of healthy baby boys, seeing it as an unnecessary and primitive ritual mutilation. In any subsequent – often heated – discussion about the rights and wrongs, the fact that the human being concerned neither gives his permission nor has an anaesthetic (on many occasions) usually features high up on my reasons why.

But I might be about to change my views on the basis of an item of good research just published in the New England Journal of Medicine. The study was carried out on more than 5,000 adult men, half of whom were circumcised at the beginning of the trial and half of whom were circumcised after two years. The finding from comparing the two groups was that the incidence of the herpes simplex (type 2) human papillomavirus (members of this family cause cancer of the cervix) and HIV were significantly reduced in the circumcised group – by up to 35 per cent and the study is on-going.

Circumcision protects men from disease because removal of the foreskin 'toughens up' the previously delicate and sensitive skin covering the glans of the penis. Therefore, it is harder for invading viruses to penetrate the skin. The implication of these findings – that circumcision is an effective measure for reducing infections and significant sexually transmitted viruses – has raised questions about whether it should be encouraged at birth. But ultimately, of course, it is not perfect protection – the only things that are: abstinence, complete monogamy within a relationship or the careful practice of safe sex.

A Reply To Keith

[In issue 2/2009, Keith Price asked members to contact him.
Anthony shares his reply to Keith with us.]

Your interest in the penile status of others is one that is shared by many, though few will admit to it! Your keeping detailed notes may be less common, but attention to fine points is a feature of the observant. I was curious to read that most boys you saw were circumcised like yourself, so there were obviously very few foreskins at your school. How did you feel when with foreskin, albeit tight, before you were circumcised? For most boys it would have been a fait accompli in infancy.

One acquaintance, circumcised in the 1930's, found 50% of classmates at school were circumcised like him. Done in 1945, at secondary school I found that in my class, there were 45% in the circumcised group, leaving a slight majority of foreskins (55%). Of a generation 20 years later, one happily circumcised man reported that, in his class, 9% were circumcised and 91% foreskinned. What are the figures 25 years later for those aged 15?

You mentioned the importance of size but no detail other than being circumcised or not. Yet there are many types of circumcision ranging from 'high' to 'low', surgical freehand to forceps guided, clamp or Plastibell, even ritual; and certainly many foreskin types, skin thickness and length particularly with overhang.

My data involved the whole of my class over 3 years from flaccid shower room observations in alphabetical order – size, whether circumcised or not, with glans size, scar and foreskin type with details of overhang. There were 14 of us circumcised, and 17 with foreskins. Like you I found some foreskins not at all attractive, but there were also ugly circumcision scars and threateningly overflared glans! One had a Jewish style circumcision with a beautifully straight scar and a corona overlapped with residual foreskin like the cup of an acorn.

Just after I made the late discovery that I had been circumcised, I took to long trousers on becoming a teenager at 13. Then, of the 50% of the class still in short trousers, 40% were circumcised and 60% intact. A year later only 18% remained bare kneed, but of this minority, 17% were circumcised but 83% had foreskins. By age 14½, all remaining in short trousers were exclusively foreskinned, all with overhang, particularly one who had more overhang than his penis length! Could it be that concerned parents not only had their sons circumcised, but thought them sufficiently mature for an early change into long trousers? Conversely could parents that didn't care so much have left uncircumcised sons in short trousers, prolonging their boyhood appearance?

The two with the smallest penises were circumcised, their glans like tiny button mushrooms. Only one had a neat straight scar (already mentioned) whilst the other 13 circumcisees had irregular scar lines, some lumpy, even ragged, including mine. Some foreskins were noticeably thin, even membranous, whilst others were luxuriously fleshy, even rosetted at the tip.

Looking through my papers recently I came across that list from over 50 years ago. It proved quite nostalgic, and reminded me of 31 wet slippery wriggling bodies in the shower sporting such a variety of penile appearance, a genital gallery indeed! Variety indeed, a real education in itself!

You mention wanking with other circumcisees, but the opportunity did not arise for me. On separate occasions I did see one roundhead and one cavalier masturbating.

Addendum as to circumcision types

In recent decades, the widespread use of the Plastibell in hospital, private clinic and GP surgery for neo-natal and infant circumcision has resulted in neat straight scars, and of the 'high' type with retained frenulum and much mucosa, retaining more erogenous tissue. Neatness has always come from the shield guided ritual of Judaism where the frenulum is always retained and some foreskin, especially underneath.

Things were more radical, less merciful, previously. Surgical circumcision in the first half of the 20th century was of the 'low' type, entailing removal of all outer foreskin and inner mucosa together with all the frenulum with only enough tissue left to approximate and suture the two separate layers. Bleeding from the frenal artery was dealt with by a mattress suture. The scar line was mostly irregular with skin tags, stitch tunnels, sometimes lopsided, lumpy underneath at the mattress suture site. Loss of sensory tissue was maximised, even to the point of resulting in a painfully tight erection which made masturbation less easy.

The devil is in the detail!

Circumcising Tyler

[At the end of last year, a father recorded his thoughts as he arranged the circumcision of his adolescent son. The account is being serialised over a number of editions of the newsletter.]

Part 3 – The operation

26 December 2008

The deed is done and I'm happy to say Tyler has just joined the ranks of the circumcised!

So far everything has gone really well. The day began with us getting out the door on time and I advised Tyler to wear his jock and sweatpants. Dr. A had prescribed 2mg of diazepam to be given half an hour before arrival. Diazepam is Valium and this is to calm the nerves so I gave it to Tyler just before we got out the door. Our appointment with Dr. A was for 10:30 am so we were on the road by 9:45 to be sure we got there on time. We spent the drive mostly talking about his Christmas dinner with my ex's relatives (a colourful bunch). The conversation was a little forced and I thought he was nervous so I asked him if he was and he said yes. I asked him what he was nervous about and he said he was worried about how it might hurt and that the stitches seemed to be the thing that caused the most trouble. I've given him access to some circumcision anecdotes so he could get an idea of what it's like and I had noticed that too so I said we'd ask Dr. A when we got there.

We got to the office and the receptionist was very friendly and welcoming, greeting Tyler directly. He was embarrassed and so went over to the waiting area with his Gameboy and zoned out. I filled out a few forms, read a few magazines, and tried to be as nonchalant as possible because I was a little nervous myself. I didn't expect that but I realized I was trusting my son's body to some man I had only met once before. I'd never felt that before taking him to a doctor but this time I did despite the fact I found Dr. A very pleasant and outgoing. We were called about 10 minutes after our 10:30 appointment time so that was good. We were shown into the surgical room where there was a hospital gurney/bed type of thing and right behind us was Dr. A looking doctorish, very friendly to us both. Tyler just said, "Hey," and kept looking around the room searching for anything that looked horribly painful. There wasn't anything so that was good and Dr. A quickly took Tyler's weight, temp, and blood pressure all the while asking Tyler about school and what he liked to do. It's like Dr. A had a whole interview style to put kids at ease. It really worked well with Tyler as he loosened up the more he talked. This was great. It wasn't like, "Come in, drop your pants, don't look at the giant needle." Dr. A got Tyler to relax by doing other things first. I really appreciated that.

When those things were finished he asked me if I wanted to stay and I said I'd stay if Tyler wanted me to. Tyler shifted a bit and mumbled something to the effect that he didn't care so I elected to stay and give him some reassurance. Then the moment came and Dr. A had Tyler lose everything except his shirt and socks and hop up on the gurney/bed thing. He did so and asked if he could keep his Gameboy and Dr. A said it was cool so long as he kept his arms up near his chest. Dr. A then reclined the bed quite a bit until Tyler's torso was only slightly raised. Dr. A then put a towel across Tyler's midriff and then told Tyler that he'd feel some injection stings and if he relaxed it would be less painful and go quicker. I was sitting up near Tyler's head and put my hand on his arm instinctively. With that, Dr. A made some injections in the base of Tyler's penis. Tyler flinched and closed his eyes, drawing in a sharp breath. It seemed to take a long time. I think there were five in total but I was keeping an eye on Tyler's face and encouraging him to be brave, telling him it'll be over soon.

It was over soon and almost immediately Tyler relaxed when Dr. A said the shots were over. At that point he swabbed Tyler's groin with betadine, draped him, put up a drape curtain, and then tested Tyler for feeling. There was nothing and so he went straight to his business. I was surprised there was no nurse assisting him but kept my mouth shut. The last thing I wanted to do was question Dr. A as it may have made Tyler nervous.

At this point Tyler asked for his Gameboy and started playing something and I just sat back and watched him play Yugioh, asking him about the game and how it worked and what to do. Dr. A also talked a bit, asking about school, what Tyler liked to do, and the games he used to play back in our day. I asked Dr. A what method he was using and he said it was "coronal". I've never heard this term before and can't find any definition for it.

I was half-watching Dr. A, trying not to look over his shoulder. I gather what he did was stretch out the penis to approximate erect length, made a mark on the shaft where the skin met the corona, and then cut a circle around the glans and then cut another line further down the shaft where he had made the mark. He then snipped around the glans, severed the frenulum, and then pulled the remaining shaft skin up to the base of the glans. With that he began suturing the frenulum and then the shaft skin to the base of the glans. It looked really simple to me and the shaft skin didn't seem loose and all the inner mucosa was gone so he really had done what I asked for. There was surprisingly little blood. The suturing took longer than the circumcision itself but even then, the entire thing took less than an hour. Dr. A put a bandage around the penis, half way over the glans and half over the shaft, wiped off the surgical area, removed the drapery, and the towel and pronounced he was done. It looked really neatly done and when Dr. A said he was done, Tyler looked at him in disbelief and asked: "You are??" It was just that fast and Tyler later told me he felt some tugging now and then but nothing else. He got dressed and I asked him how he felt. He said he was fine and hungry so I paid, thanked Dr. A, got a script for painkillers, made an appointment for next Friday, and we left. It was 11:47! Tyler didn't seem the worse for wear either. So we went to Outback for lunch.

On the way I asked Tyler how he felt about the whole thing and he said it was easier than he thought. By the time lunch was done, Tyler was a bit stiffer and wanted to go home. The anaesthesia was wearing off and so I stopped at the drug store to drop off the script and we went home. Tyler spent the rest of the day on the floor in front of the TV sitting on cushions. He felt better not wearing anything so we setup a sheet tent over his groin and basically we played video games most of the rest of the day after calling his mom to let her know he was still alive. I got the idea of giving him an ice bag to put on his groin if he should feel an erection starting. I think that helped because Tyler asked me to refresh the ice before he went to sleep. I checked the dressing three times on Friday and there was only some spotting under where the frenulum was. That was it. There was remarkably little swelling. I gave Tyler one of the Tylenol 3s that afternoon and another before bed to lessen any pain he might feel from catching sutures on fabric or erections and to help him sleep. Tyler didn't want any blankets so I pulled an electric ceramic heater out of the closet to warm the room so he could sleep without any blankets. All in all not too tough.

Circumcision Doesn't Just Remove The Foreskin!

Congratulations to the Editor on his article promoting RIC (routine infant circumcision). This is a trivial operation which brings enormous benefits and it is a great pity that it has fallen out of fashion. But the Editor only makes half the case. He concentrates on the advantages of removing the foreskin in terms of preventing future foreskin problems and reducing the risk of disease. All this is true. However, to my mind, the biggest benefit of circumcision is the baring of the glans. This is so much the case that, even if the foreskin could be guaranteed always to be problem free, I would still recommend its routine removal.

The bare knob has a lot going for it. First, it reduces over-sensitivity. The glans that is constantly hidden under its skin is just too sensitive to touch when it emerges. Many guys have a hair trigger response as a result. Permanent exposure reduces the immediate sensitivity of the glans without affecting the underlying feelings. Second, the contact of the exposed glans against clothing gives the cut guy constant, if subconscious, stimulation, making him more sexually aware.

Third, if the cut is nice and tight, and especially if the frenulum has gone as well, all the surface area of the glans, especially the sulcus and corona, are fully open to stimulation during sex. This increases the pleasure both of the guy and his partner.

Fourth, the circumcised penis is much more pleasing aesthetically. With its sleek profile and bared glans, the cut penis is stripped, ready for action and consequently looks much more virile and sexy than its intact counterpart. This look and sense of virility in turn gives a great psychological boost to the cut guy, especially in cultures where circumcision is part of becoming a man.

Let's never forget. The circumcision operation may remove the foreskin but the outcome is a permanently exposed glans, and it's this result which gives so many of circumcision's benefits.

Dream Cream?

[Anthony vents his anger about an internet ad, reproduced in the last issue, for a cream to banish male genital odour.]

Issue 3/2009 must be the most biased ever. Never before has the foreskin been more maligned or misrepresented. In 'No more smelly foreskins', a cream to banish genital odour was promoted with vigour. Male genital odour (MGO) "occurs with men who are not circumcised" and "is also common with men who are circumcised". Maybe a matter of degree with poor hygiene, but "a fishy smell to be coming from your own penis?" I would have thought the fishy smell to be from female genitalia, lingering about the labia and the pubic bush! Male muskiness or even cheesiness from the presence of smegma but not fishiness!!

Pheromones are essential for sexual attraction but should not be confused with additional odour due to lack of cleanliness. All senses are involved in close intimacy, including that of smell, which brings pheromones into their own.

As for MGO and FGO too, male and female genital odour of the unpleasant kind, they can be described in lines I wrote long ago:

"When sexual fondling has to pause
There is a scent that lingers
With foreskin, fingers are cheese straws
With pussy, they're fish fingers."

That leads me to advice I gave for the uncircumcised – "unrind at the end of the day!" – and for those shorn – "you need to wash as well!" Deodorant cream is no substitute for good hygiene!

Society Meeting

A meeting of the Acorn Society is being arranged for Saturday 31st October. The plan is to have a meeting room hired from approximately 13.30 hrs to 18.00 hrs. Refreshments will be available. We can plan an evening meal together for those who require it. Bed and breakfast accommodation will also be available.

Further details and booking arrangements, via me, will be given in the September edition of the magazine.

Douglas – Honorary Treasurer

Informal Meeting In Leeds

There are all too few opportunities for members of Acorn to get together with like-minded men to discuss the many and interesting aspects of circumcision. For those who are able to travel to Leeds, arrangements are being made for a venue here.

A pub called the Viaduct has been identified which is at the bottom of Leeds' main street, Lower Briggate. It is easily accessible on foot from the railway station or the central bus station. The room, for which there is no charge, is available on weekdays, up to 6 pm Monday to Friday and, in addition, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. The room is actually just a curtained-off section beyond the main bar. There is accommodation for about 25 to 30 people. Light food (sandwiches etc) and possibly lunches are available.

The idea is that all meet together and discuss our common interest. Anyone wishing to make personal contact should arrange that elsewhere. It is not suggested having a formal meeting with a chairman; people could chat amongst themselves and together.

In the first instance, any members interested in such a meeting should get in touch with the organiser by writing to me via the Acorn mailbox enclosing an s.a.e. This will be forwarded to the organiser who will be able to assess the interest and try to arrange a date and time to suit most people.

The Mohelet: Quite A lady!

The mohelet is an exceptional concept, the lady ritual circumciser, the first being Moses' wife Zipporah who "...took a flint and cut off her son's foreskin." There are 29 UK internet mentions of mohelet and 1030 worldwide, mainly from the USA. In the USA, half the Jewish rabbis and cantors are women, but there are very few lady circumcisers. Since 1984 the reform programme has produced 300 trained mohalot (the plural of mohelet). The conservative Brit Kodesh programme trained 50 more.

Dr Lillian Schapiro went through the Brit Kodesh programme for doctors and has since performed 50 circumcisions. Dr Laurie Radovsky circumcised her own son 11 years ago because there was no mohel available and nine years later became a mohelet. After each ceremony, she kisses the baby's head thus welcoming him into the Jewish congregation. Dr Debra Russbaum Cohen provides a bris for sons of lesbian couples (from artificial insemination). Obviously lesbians prefer a lady mohel.

Dr April Rubin has been circumcising for 25 years. She is preferred by many people to the local mohel. (He is rude and arrogant; she is kind and gentle.) Other prominent lady circumcisers are Dr Debra Weiss Islar, Dr Eliza Erber and Dr Dorothy Greenbaum.

Lady circumcisers are more mindful of pain relief. The dorsal block described in 1978 has had 2,000 successful uses. EMLA cream is also used and baby Tylenol. Dr Emily J Black favours the Gomco clamp, but Drs Lillian Schapiro, Rochelle Schwartz and Vivian H Lowenstein the Mogen clamp. It seems all American mohalot use modern clamps and wipe with gauze for metzizah. The Plastibell is not favoured as it is considered an infection risk. Dr Rochelle Schwartz, a Toronto mohelet, uses a clamp that permits a small amount of bleeding (necessary for the traditional bris). Dr Eliza Erber gives a dose of baby Tylenol before circumcising. She uses a Mogen clamp and quotes a 60 second bris out of a 30 minute ceremony. The baby should not be fed in the final hour before surgery. Dr Debra Weiss Islar's site has a selection of baby clothes for the bris!

The Knife Man

[Tales from the Emergency Department; in which a man who wallows in nostalgia, and secretly wishes he were a Victorian Knife Man rants about his work and what passes for a life.]

My last patient was a painful one. He admirably demonstrated the 'all mouth no trousers' phenomenon, however. He was wheeled into the Department, covered in blood, laughing and shouting. Waving his blood stained hands about he was shouting, mostly at the female staff:

"Darlin'! Oi! Darlin'! Guess what I done! Go on! Guess!"

**Guffaw****

"Nah, I ain't tellin' ya! You don't even wanna know what I done, innit!"

What had he done? Torn his frenulum. This, for those not in the know, is the piece of skin on the underside of the glans penis, attaching it to the foreskin. It is essentially identical to the frenulum in the mouth attaching upper lip to gum. Sometime referred to as the 'banjo string'.

I'll leave it to your imagination how he said he did it. Tearing it is quite painful, and bleeds. A lot. I should know.

His brash, loud exterior changed when I explained what we needed to do. The sentence contained the words 'needle', 'injection', 'penis' and 'stitch' in various order. Also 'local anaesthetic' and 'sting quite a bit'. It wasn't a warm, fuzzy sentence. No champagne and strawbobs here, either.

The repair was a breeze and, re-assured that he hadn't left too much of his blood behind in his bedroom, we sent him packing. On a no-sex embargo. I half expect to see him back before the week is out...

[This month's photos are all of Emre, who is uncut, although it is hard to tell.]

More Advantages Of RIC

Many thanks to the Editor for his most interesting article on RIC which I personally would make mandatory for male babies. As a (hairless) nudist who underwent RIC in 1943, I would add the following plus points:

- far more pleasing to look at
- larger glans (through unrestricted growth)
- simple to keep clean (the Editor did touch on better hygiene)
- easier to “last” during intercourse
- better for oral sex
- better for the female partner as an ‘end user’.

Circumcision In Fiction

[This story from the internet is about the experiences of a guy during his army induction.]

Calun had just about had enough of being prodded, poked, measured, weighed, physically tested and checked in every way imaginable, and generally ordered around. He was almost at the end of his army induction and assessment and ached from the days of hard training that his body wasn't used to and which had achieved its aim of driving him to his absolute limit.

This final ordeal, the ‘physical’, had put him in a large PT hall with all his fellow trainees for a thorough physical check of how their bodies had survived the week of torture they had been put through. Right now he had reached the worst part of the physical. All soldiers had to receive a series of vaccinations before they could be considered for active service – even those only serving their period of national service. Calun hated needles and became more and more tense. As he waited in line behind the screen he could hear the recruit in front of him being told, “face the wall, bend forwards over the couch, OK – you're done. Next!” The script was repeated to each man as the line moved forwards, only interspersed with the occasional sharp intake of breath as a needle was pushed into a recruit.

Within a couple of minutes he was called behind the screen and braced himself. His left arm was swabbed and the first shot was ok; not as bad as he'd expected. The second stung. Next came a shot into his butt as he bent over the couch. That was the worst. The needle felt larger and the solution burned slightly. He straightened as the needle was withdrawn and the “OK” was repeated, turned to leave, but was ordered, “lie on the couch”. What had he done wrong? Why did he need more vaccinations than the rest? He felt his cock lifted and swabbed underneath. His foreskin was then popped back and his helmet thoroughly swapped with more, cold, antiseptic. He gulped and felt numb as his heart began to race even faster. Vaccinations weren't given into cocks so what on earth was wrong? A sudden scratch and stinging in the base of his cock made him tense, and instinctively recoil from the discomfort. The doctor noticed his reaction and reassured him: "Try to relax, you will gradually feel less and less". "What is it?" Calun asked. "It's called Lignocaine, a local anaesthetic" came the reply as Calun felt the needle removed and reinserted into the other side of his cock. The doctor continued: "We don't want you to feel any pain during your circumcision, we're not sadists you know!"

Calun's head swam. This was too much for him to take in. The doctor had stopped pumping anaesthetic into his crotch and was now massaging his penis as if he was rubbing the anaesthetic in. Calun raised his head to see what was happening. The doctor held an almost empty syringe in his right hand and his cock was swollen from the Lignocaine that had been pumped into him. The doctor smiled down at him. "In a few minutes you will be completely numb so you can move on to room 21, just outside the exit of the hall, so the clamp can be fitted on to your penis. I just need to give you one more shot into your frenulum so we can get that sliced off too." "But, but I don't need circumcising!" protested Calun. The doctor retorted: "You have a foreskin. Soldiers around here don't have foreskins; you must have noticed that in the showers and barracks. Of course you need circumcising. Your fellow soldiers who haven't already been sorted out will have their circumcisions done today too. Once you are healed you will be eternally grateful for the upgrade we are giving you. What more could you ask for than the gift of a cock to be really proud of?" At that point the doctor eased the needle into the underside of his helmet while holding his foreskin back tightly. Despite the previous injections of anaesthetic, Calun winced.

The doctor continued to talk. "In any case, your foreskin is a bit on the tight side and far too long to keep clean 24x7. We can trim off a nice big chunk of this skanky foreskin of yours, fold the inner skin back, and leave you with a nice, tight circumcision with a scar line way down your shaft. With a permanently bared glans and nowhere to harbour traces of urine and semen, you will stay constantly clean. So much more healthy for a soldier." Calun nearly protested that he wasn't planning on being a soldier for much longer, but thought better of it and kept quiet. "That's your lot then. Off to room 21. Go straight in so they can get started on you as soon as possible."

As Calun swung his jelly-like legs off the couch he wasn't 100% sure they would support him and he felt dizzy as he stood up. He forced himself to walk and, as he passed beyond the screen, looked back at the line of recruits awaiting their turn. The next guy in line looked terrified while the two soldiers behind him were beaming. Calun glanced down at the first soldier and saw that he too still had a foreskin while the next two men had helmets that were already bared.

He left the hall and, with a shaking hand, turned the handle on the adjacent room, 21. Walking inside he saw two doctors standing either side of a couch on which a naked soldier was lying. They were clearly working on the soldier's circumcision, but Calun's view of the soldier's crotch was blocked by the back of one of the doctors. All three men turned to look at him as he entered allowing Calun to see the blood-stained gloves of the doctors and a swollen, bloody cock on the soldier. "We're nearly finished here" said one doctor "so take a seat and we'll get a clamp fitted on you while we sort out this soldier". He pointed to a young-looking, skinny and almost hairless soldier sitting next to the door behind Calun. The lad sat there looking rather bored. His legs were apart and, clamped onto his foreskin was a shiny metal device that looked like a metal bell over the lad's helmet with a metal ring clamped tightly around the rim of the bell. His foreskin was bunched up in front of the clamp and his shaft skin was held taught.

Calun sat down next to him aware that he was staring at the guy's penis. The lad grinned at him and spoke. "Don't panic, you don't feel anything. It's great to be getting clipped at last isn't it? My parents refused to pay for me to be cut so this is saving me a fortune. Foreskin is such a nuisance." He was well-hung with a thick cock and a pair of large low-hanging nuts in a shaved scrotum. The lad continued to chat. "My big brother was clipped when he did his national service. According to him it was the best part of being called up and he asked for his circumcision to be done as tight as possible. His cock looks amazing now with a nice dark scar about halfway down his shaft. I've asked for the same and the doc here certainly stretched plenty of skin into the Gomco." "The Gomco?" Calun asked. "Yeah. That's what these circumcision clamps are called. They give a nice neat circumcision and leave a dark scar line. No chance of ever being mistaken for an uncouth uncut ever again." He was clearly very excited by the whole experience and sprang to his feet as the doctor called "next!"

"Hold your horses, lad" the doctor continued. "We will do your trim in a minute but we need to get a clamp on this soldier's foreskin first so it can be completely crushed while we finish your circumcision." The soldier who was leaving looked relieved as he walked to the door with a dressing around his cock, midway between the base and helmet. He grinned at Calun and scratched his nuts. "Enjoy!" he said as he left the circumcision room and nodded to the lad.

"On the couch please soldier. Let's see how much we can trim off you." Calun lay down and tried hard to relax as he felt some strange movement around his crotch. He looked at what was being done to him and realized he had no feeling in his cock as the doctor had pulled his foreskin back, put a metal bell over his helmet and was now pulling his foreskin forwards again but over the outside of the bell. He then took a metal plate with a hole at one end and placed it over the bell to trap his foreskin. A metal bar was then fitted onto the top of the bell and held in place with a knurled nut over a threaded locking post so that, as the nut was tightened, the bar pivoted and pulled the bell tightly up to the metal plate. Before the nut was tightened much the doctor worked his way around the bell, tugging at Calun's foreskin and pulling as much through as possible. "We like to circumcise our soldiers as tightly as possible. No point in only half doing the job" explained the doctor. He checked his work and, seeming satisfied, tightened the metal nut until he was obviously exerting as much force as he possibly could.

"OK, that will kill off your foreskin in a few minutes so take a seat while we trim off this lad's skin and get him sewn up." Calun returned to his seat as the lad wasted no time and swung himself eagerly into position. Calun could feel the weight of the clamp pulling on his cock but felt no pain.

One of the doctors, having changed his gloves once more, grinned in return and immediately picked up a scalpel from a fresh tray of instruments his colleague had prepared. Calun heard a scratching of the blade against the clamp as the lad's foreskin was cut through. "Congratulations soldier. You are now circumcised" the doctor said as he removed the clamp. Calun could see that the lad was still beaming with delight. It took a few minutes for the lad to be stitched up and have his newly bared cock dressed. The doctor gave him some instructions on looking after it and a note of when to report back for a follow-up check.

Calun climbed back on the table knowing that when he got down again, he too would be a tightly circumcised man.

Marketing Slogans: A Cut Above The Rest

The skills of Scotland's top marketers were put to the test at an annual awards ceremony: come up with a slogan for a shop specialising in, er, circumcision.

It was a challenge set by compere, BBC Scotland presenter, Dougie Vipond, following a gag that began: "This man walks into a shop offering circumcision...". The 440-strong audience, attending the Scottish Marketing Society Excellence Awards, had to then quickly come up with both a name for the shop and a marketing slogan.

And the response was pretty overwhelming from the 440-strong audience, with The Scotsman marketing team's table not only producing the most entries, but also that of the winner – from guest, Ali Findlay of PR outfit, The Lane Agency. Spike particularly liked the Scottish Sun entry:

Reliable Circumcision: If we Slip, we Get the Sack.

Editorial

Alex Renton is a freelance journalist who writes for national papers and magazines including the Observer and The Times. And he is in favour of circumcision. He has written two articles recently, one in the Observer, one in the Mail on Sunday (reprinted on page 14). He adduces all the arguments in favour of routine circumcision, but then bemoans the difficulty of finding doctors willing to perform RIC. He was rebuffed about his own son (he doesn't say whether he succeeded in getting him cut in the end); more recently he persuaded a cousin of his to have his baby boy circumcised, only to find that there was no-one in Edinburgh willing to perform the procedure either on the NHS or privately. The medical profession should lift this dictatorial ban. It should be for parents to choose whether their son will benefit from circumcision, not doctors.

Meanwhile, don't forget about the Acorn Society meeting in October – details on page 10. This is your chance to meet up with like-minded guys and discuss in depth the subject that fascinates us all.

Just how many men are circumcised?

Serendipity is the accidental discovery of something pleasant, valuable, or useful. Thus, when looking for an academic article on a totally unrelated topic, I came across "Tonsillectomy and circumcision: a study of two cohorts" by Calnan, Douglas and Goldstein. This article was published in the International Journal of Epidemiology in 1978.

Although over 30 years old, the article is still of interest. First, it demonstrates an accurate means of measuring rates of circumcision and their variation over time. Second, it compares the frequency of circumcision (and tonsillectomy) of boys born in 1946 with those born in 1958, thus giving accurate rates of circumcision at those times. It then goes on to analyse the regions and classes in which the rates have fallen over the eleven years.

Rates of circumcision are notoriously difficult to assess. The operation tends to be recorded only when performed in hospital. But most circumcisions at that time were carried out well away from a hospital – in doctors' surgeries, in baby clinics or in the home. Circumcision rates were accessible only by observation after the event i.e. how many of a particular year group or cohort were circumcised. Of course, we all have our own observational memories of what proportion in our class, in our cricket team, or even now in our gym locker rooms, have been divested of their foreskins. But we cannot generalise from such observations because the samples are small and not randomly drawn. To get an accurate picture, we need a large number of observations, randomly drawn from the population as a whole. Fortunately for the researchers mentioned above, this is precisely what they had.

Two longitudinal studies were used – the National Survey of Health and Development (1946 cohort) and the National Child Development Study (1958 cohort). The former grew out of a national study of the maternity services which covered 13,687 births in Great Britain during the first week of March 1946. A sub-group of 5,362 children from this cohort had been followed up at not less than 2 year intervals to the age of 27.

The 1958 cohort was a continuation of the perinatal survey which covered all children born in Great Britain in the first week of March of that year. These children had been followed up at 7, 11 and 16 years. In order to make the two cohort populations as similar as possible, multiple and illegitimate births and births in families that entered Britain after 1958 were excluded from the 1958 cohort.

Both studies recorded whether the child had had a tonsillectomy and (if male) whether he had been circumcised. By 11 years 22.7% of the boys born in 1946 and 10.9% of those born in 1958 had been circumcised. This considerable reduction had been achieved by a fall in circumcision during the first 4 years of life. At later ages there had been no change – 5.2% were circumcised after 4 years in the earlier study and 5.3% in the later.

In 1946 the major regional peculiarity was a low level of circumcision in Scotland and a high level in Wales. By 1958 circumcision in Wales was much reduced and from having the highest rate it had moved to the second lowest. Only Scotland had a lower rate. In both cohorts the chances of being circumcised were high for the first born and decreased as birth rank increased and in each birth rank the rates recorded in 1958 were substantially lower than those recorded in 1946. Analysis confirmed both the movement away from early circumcision and the significance of the overall decline in circumcision. It also revealed statistically significant interactions between “father’s occupation and birth order” and between “father’s occupation and cohort”. Although the incidence of circumcision dropped considerably in all occupational groups, the largest reduction occurred in the non-manual sector. This change occurred uniformly for each of the regions. In both studies, birth rank made no difference to the risk of circumcision among middle class children. But among the manual working class children, the risk fell off steeply with increasing birth rank in both the 1946 and 1958 cohorts.

The prevalence of circumcision fell from 23% in the 1946 cohort to 11% in 1958. The main fall appears to have been in early life, in the first year in fact. There was growing agreement in the medical profession about the undesirability of circumcision. The researchers noted that this was despite the fact that it had factors to recommend it. It made negligible calls on surgical resources and hospital beds, and complications were rare. Circumcised men rarely got cancer of the penis, were less vulnerable to venereal infection, and their wives might have a reduced risk of cervical cancer.

Infant circumcision at the time was usually performed without anaesthetic. The researchers noted that, in rats, early painful stimuli could have long lasting effects and it had been suggested that human infants also might be similarly affected. However, in the 1946 study, no difference between uncircumcised and circumcised was found for a number of developmental and behavioural indices once birth rank, country of origin, occupational group and religion were allowed for. There was thus no reason to believe that the early pain of circumcision had any long term developmental effect.

The researchers concluded: “That circumcision has been so markedly reduced during these 10 years and more recently is explained by the very early age at which this operation is usually carried out so that refusal to circumcise a child immediately after birth is likely to lead to permanent retention of the foreskin unless there are later medical indications. It is clear that the decline in the operation has been solely owing to the reduction of early circumcisions, i.e. within the first 12 months and probably earlier than this since 71% of the circumcisions during the first year of life in the 1946 study were done in the early weeks after birth. The dramatic fall in the first year of life may therefore be attributed largely to paediatric opinion exerting itself through the hospitals.”

Looking back at the article, thirty years on, a number of factors struck me. I was surprised that only 22.7% of the boys born in 1946 were circumcised. I had thought that circumcision was far more popular immediately after the war. I wondered whether there was a class effect, but although there was a discrepancy between the children of non-manual workers (29.3%) and non-skilled manual (21.5%), it was less than might be expected. Circumcision after the war was not excessively more prevalent in the middle as opposed to the working classes. Does this mean that circumcision rates fell during the war when scarce medical resources may have had to be prioritised elsewhere? Or was circumcision never applied to a majority of babies? Unfortunately, we do not have pre-war statistics to tell although a paper published in the BMJ in 2000 talks of rates of medical circumcisions of 35% in the early 1930's.

The precipitate fall in circumcision rates between 1946 and 1958 was to be expected. Gardiner's infamous but highly influential paper "The Fate of the Foreskin" was published in 1949 and thereafter the medical profession set its face against circumcision. The fall was dramatic, from almost 1 in 5 babies in 1946 to 1 in 20 babies by 1958.

How have the trends gone since? Unfortunately, data about circumcision just does not seem to be collected in the equivalent longitudinal studies today. However, the 2000 British National Survey of Sexual Attitudes and Lifestyles found that 15.8% of British males aged 16 to 44 reported being circumcised. The incidence of circumcision was highest in the oldest age group in the sample. 19.6% of men born 1956-60 (aged 40-44 at the time of the study) were circumcised whereas only 11.7% of those in the lowest age group, born 1981-84 and aged 16-19 at the time of the study were cut. Men of ethnic minorities (except black Caribbeans) were significantly more likely to be circumcised than those described as "white". In addition, men born abroad rather than in Britain were significantly more likely to be circumcised.

Thus the original 1978 study found that 11% of those born in the UK in 1958 were circumcised whereas the 2000 study found that 19.6% of the men born at that time but now living in the UK were circumcised. The difference is large. Different sampling methods may be part of the explanation. The remainder must be due to circumcisions which took place after the age of 16 (the last age at which the status of the original cohort was checked) coupled with the effect of immigrants being disproportionately circumcised compared with the indigenous population.

The results of the 2000 study confirm the continuing decline in popularity of circumcision over time – 19.6% of men born in 1956-60 to 11.7% of those born 1981-84. The level of routine infant circumcision may well have fallen even further since then, at least amongst the white population. But the increasing diversity of ethnicity in the population has almost certainly bolstered rates. There are substantial ethnic minorities who will continue to require that their sons be circumcised and this will mean that, on into the future, there will continue to be a significant minority of men who will have been circumcised. It will also mean that circumcision facilities will continue to exist. Such facilities can be accessed by any parents wishing their sons to be circumcised.

At the moment, the medical case for routine infant circumcision is again starting to be heard. If that argument gains ground and parents start to require circumcision for their baby sons, circumcision facilities will need to grow exponentially. Nevertheless, such expansion can make economic sense, even in these straightened times, in terms of costs saved and benefits gained in the future. But will we ever get back to pre-war or even post-war rates of routine circumcision? That remains to be seen.

Circumcising Tyler

[At the end of last year, a father recorded his thoughts as he arranged the circumcision of his adolescent son. The account has been serialised over a number of editions of the newsletter. The last part is below.]

Part 4 – Recovery

29 December 2008

Saturday was fine except there was some more spotting on the bandage. Tyler said he was awakened only a few times, it didn't hurt that much, and I shouldn't worry. OK then! He spent the day essentially freeballing in his sweats and by the afternoon he was pretty much normal.

Yesterday was more of the same. The bandage had to come off last night so Tyler took a warm salt bath to loosen the bandage. He insisted on doing it himself so we compromised and he did it himself in the bath while I watched. It came off with less trouble than I thought though there were some hisses and ouches as he did so. Right after that I took a look at the wound and was really impressed. The scar was right up against the sulcus, no more than a few millimetres. The frenulum was completely gone, and the scar was even. There was some swelling around the sulcus but not much and when he sat down, there was no skin bunching-up behind the glans except where it was swollen and I think that will go away in time. Tyler was upbeat and happy and didn't seem in any pain at all.

I'm following the Gilgal brochure about recovery as the one the office gave me was geared to younger kids. Tyler finds the warm salt 'dips', as we call them, soothing. I also bought some Clinomyn toothpaste for Tyler to apply to his glans to help it keratinize faster. I suggested applying it just before the dips. I don't know if he's used it yet. We haven't tried showering yet. I bought some waterproof surgical tape and some unlubricated condoms to try to make a sheath for showering. We'll see how that goes.

So far, Tyler seems like he always has. This entire thing hasn't phased him and the healing is much faster than I thought it would be. It's really not horrible at all and I'm so far pleased with the apparent cosmetic results as well.

30 December 2008

Dr. A was fantastic. He's been doing this a while so I'm sure he's had to do this a million times.

David (Tyler's brother) is aware of all this. I don't know if Tyler's shown him his circumcision or not. I haven't asked. So far any time David's asked if he's going to be circumcised too, I've said: "We'll talk about it later." I want Tyler to be healed completely before Tyler gives a final verdict to David as I know that will influence him enormously and Tyler is aware of my wish in that respect and understands why.

Tyler's doing great. He spent a good part of the afternoon playing pool and fussball with two of his friends. What he's done is wrap some gauze around the wound and his glans to prevent rubbing and catching and then wearing a jock so it doesn't move around. He does this when friends come over or before he goes out. In the morning and this evening he switched to sweats. He's not uncomfortable and agrees completely that the most painful thing is catching a suture on fabric. He did go to bed with another ice bag tonight so I'm assuming the erections aren't too comfortable yet either.

One thing is quite telling. Right after his friends left he was very happy and quite relaxed. My guess is he let them know what's going on and they approved. I know they are both circumcised because I've spoken to their parents about it. The one mom was very supportive because she was worried about him getting teased for not being circumcised so maybe she asked her son to be extra nice or encouraging. I don't know. Whatever it was, it worked.

5 January 2009

Tyler left for school this morning and short of wearing a jock and carrying a medical excuse form, he was just like he always is. It's really amazing how quickly he's recovered. Friday's follow-up went really well. The stitches should be finished dissolving soon but we will have to watch the next few days and remove any undissolved sutures after Wednesday. Friday was also the first day I had seen Tyler's penis since the bandage came off. The stitches were all intact and there was no sign of recent bleeding. Dr. A said boys Tyler's age usually heal more quickly and the low scar helps that process a great deal. The frenulum area looks a little ugly. However Dr. A will see Tyler again next Monday to make sure all the sutures are out (I insisted on this) and then we'll be done! It might sound weird but I think Tyler's penis will look very handsome once it's healed.

I'm really pleased with the result. Dr. A removed the frenulum and had to as Tyler had a short frenulum and his glans has a V-shaped cleft so getting outer skin up to that point required its removal. The scar line looks very neat and even. I decided on a low and tight for a few reasons. I think that the mucosa is a major entry point for STDs. There is evidence that there are cells in the mucosa which make it more susceptible to the entry of viruses. Low cuts heal more quickly and with less swelling. As we only had a week in which to do this, low was more convenient. I think low looks better. It's more masculine and ensures that there is no mucosal tissue to bunch up behind or even over the glans as my circumcision does and I hate my circumcision for being so loose and for leaving the inner skin. In my opinion, if you're going to get circumcised, you should be completely circumcised. This half and half business is for the birds and very uncomfortable in my own experience. I also think that a low cut will help Tyler gain better ejaculatory control and give him deeper orgasms.

On the way back from Dr. A we talked about the whole thing. Tyler admitted that it was uncomfortable and embarrassing for the first day or so. Once he figured out how to manage underwear and bathing and sleeping, it became much easier. He says his glans is still very sensitive. Dr. A asked him about erections and Tyler reported that at first the pull on the stitches hurt a lot, then they became less painful as time went on. The real pain (not surprisingly) came when the stitches caught on clothing and that really hurt. Tyler explained that he put a gauze (Ace bandages cut-up) lightly around the scar to prevent the stitches from catching on the jock pouch and the glans from rubbing too much. Dr. A said that Tyler was lucky the gauze didn't stick but again Dr. A said, the type of circumcision he had is best for preventing this.

All in all, Tyler's really happy. He says it's a lot easier to keep clean and to urinate and he thinks it looks good too. He has seen pictures of men with scars and uneven cuts and he said he was glad his doesn't have those problems. I asked him if he's taken it for a test run yet and he kind of groaned and said: "Dad that's enough. If I have a problem I'll tell you." It was just then it occurred to me that I should probably get him some decent lube so I'm going to get some and put it in his nightstand drawer and let him find it.

I'm considering having David done this summer. There doesn't seem to be any hurry and I want Tyler completely healed so that he can provide a model for David. David is curious, if cautious and derives great enjoyment from teasing his brother about his circ any way he can. I'll talk to David more about it in the next few months after Tyler's healed and adjusted.

13 January 2009

Tyler is doing really well. Doctor A took out a few stitch remnants that didn't dissolve and the scar area still looks redder than normal. The stitch scars look noticeable too but Dr. A says that all that will fade within a few months. Tyler did have some glans peeling. I was concerned about that and there was a little red ring around his meatus. He says the peeling wasn't painful and Dr. A says the red ring should fade in time as the glans become normalized to being outside the foreskin. I've encouraged Tyler to keep his glans exposed as much as possible so that it desensitizes quickly. All these things are really minor to him and me. The result looks excellent. The scar is very even, right under the corona all the way around, and there is no wrinkling or bunching of the shaft skin. Right now it looks like he was circumcised at birth except for the remaining redness at the scar and on the glans. The rapid healing was something I was told to expect with a low cut but this experience confirms it for me.

I asked Tyler how he likes it and he said, "I don't know. I guess it's good. It looks like the other guys and it's easier to pee. I don't like it's so sensitive." He knows the sensitivity will decrease. He did not mention the bottle of lube I left in his bedstand but he has used some so I guess everything is working OK that way.

When I asked him if he had talked about it with David he said that David thinks it looks weird and like it hurt. That worried me so I told David that we would wait and see how Tyler does before we talk about him getting circumcised and that it would be a while yet. I explained to him that most boys were circumcised and that it was very normal and if he gets it done before puberty that it will be much easier for him. His response was, "OK, I'll think about that." And that was all he said about it! Kids surprise you so much.

Preparatory School Recommends Circumcision

The following exchange of emails recently took place on the Internet between Carl, a 40 year old London man who was circumcised at birth, and myself:

Carl: Hi, my brother has been asked by his son's school to have him circumcised over the school summer holiday.

Me: How old is your nephew?

Did the school give any particular reason to have the boy circumcised?

My own opinion is that it is better for a boy to be circumcised anyway, but if his parents felt differently then that is their right.

Carl: He is 8 years old.

The school has a preference for circumcised boys.

My brother-in-law is now looking for a good circumciser. Do you know of any?

Me: Where does he live? Is he prepared to travel if necessary?

I know of several good circumcisers in the London area and in Luton. They do often get quite busy during the school holidays.

Is your nephew at a boarding school or an ordinary day school? I think it is very good that the school prefers boys to be circumcised, but this is not usual in the UK.

Carl: He lives in London.

The school is an all boys private one.

Which doctors would you recommend?

Me: That's one very progressive school. I wish many more were like that and recommended that all pupils were circumcised. Are you able to say which school this is?

Carl: No, they have asked us not to. Circumcision is a tradition there.

Which is the best circumciser in London?

Me: It is a great pity that you cannot reveal the name of the prep school that your nephew goes to as other parents might like to know of a school which encourages circumcision for all its pupils.

Doctors whom we would recommend are:

Dr Z. Zarifa, Custom House Surgery, London, E16

Dr. M. Harris, Temple Fortune Health Centre, London, NW11

Dr S. Al-Ali, Queensbury, Edgware

The Circumcision Centre, Luton, Beds.

Picture Gallery

[In the last issue, the picture gallery model was uncircumcised.
This issue's model is very definitely cut!]

The Naked Glans

In issue 4/2009, Mark said: “The bare knob has a lot going for it.” I couldn’t agree more. A circumcised penis is a handsome feature, not just for hygiene reasons, but for appearances alone. According to a fellow female naturist, the sight of the naked glans adds interest to the male physique so that even men who choose not to be circumcised keep their foreskins pulled back. Acuculphiliacs will agree that the circumcised penis is a “turn on”. If one wants to know about acuculphiliacs, get a book called An Innocent Obsession by David Catesby. My only criticism of the book is that it concentrates on male hygiene and (as usual) not enough on female hygiene.

In Praise Of The Akroposthion

The ancient Greeks were against the practice of circumcising their males, and possessing a generous foreskin was a significantly important part of their culture. Many pieces of ancient Greek artwork depict scenes of naked men endowed with quite lengthy foreskins. More importantly they practised the cultivation of the prepuce and the longer the foreskin the more desired it seemed to be whilst a mega [Greek: mega = large] prepuce or very large foreskin was the epitome of a desirable penis.

In his publication for The Bulletin of the history of medicine entitled 'The Ideal Prepuce in Ancient Greece', Frederick M Hodges documents the preputial aesthetics of the Ancient Greeks, who valued and prized the prepuce on its own merits while simultaneously associating it with other aspects of male beauty. They valued the longer, tapered foreskin as a reflection of a deeper ethos involving cultural identity, morality, propriety, virtue, beauty and health. They also characterized a penis with a short or inadequate foreskin as deficient or defective, especially one that had been surgically removed under their disease concept of lipodermos [Greek = lacking skin].

As would be expected in a culture that valued the prepuce, the Greek language reflected this esteem through precise terminology. The Greeks understood the prepuce to be composed of two distinct structures: the posthe and the 'akroposthion'. Posthe designates that part of the prepuce that covers the glans penis, but Greek writers occasionally used this word in a general sense to designate the entire prepuce or, by extension, the entire penis. 'Akroposthion' designates the tapered, tubular, visually defining portion of the prepuce that extends beyond the glans and terminates at the preputial orifice. When speaking of the iconographic representation of the long prepuce, we are really speaking of the long 'akroposthion' for the posthe can never be larger than the unchanging surface area of the underlying glans penis.

The association between the longer prepuce and respectability was so strongly felt that Greeks took steps to prevent unwanted exposure of the glans. In this regard, the consistent artistic portrayal of the adult penis with a generously proportioned 'akroposthion' may well represent an anatomical ideal peculiar to Greeks, but, in some cases, it could accurately represent a penis whose 'akroposthion' has been elongated, either deliberately or accidentally through the continuous, long term application of traction. Such traction may have come from the use of the kynodesme (literally a 'dog leash'), a thin leather thong wound around the 'akroposthion' that pulled the penis upward and was tied in a bow, tied around the waist, or secured by some other means.

Preventing unwanted exposure of the glans was a sign of the modesty and decency expected in particular of the older participants in the symposium. The unseemly externalization of the glans in public, that a deficient or loose lipped prepuce was unable to prevent, was seen as a disgrace and was the main reason for wearing a kynodesme. The kynodesme, then, was a means by which any male so affected could maintain his dignity in the nude. For those who continuously wore the kynodesme, the resulting traction on the 'akroposthion' would have the benefit of permanently elongating it. It is conceivable, then, that the lengthening of the prepuce could have been the primary object, at least in some cases as aesthetics would be improved, and morals preserved.

The intensity with which the Greeks esteemed the prepuce was equalled by the intensity with which they deplored its ablation as practised in certain communities scattered throughout the south eastern fringes of the known world. The Greeks were highly sceptical about any of the religious rationales used by certain foreigners in an attempt to justify their blood rites of penile reduction through the practice of genital mutilation of various degrees from circumcision to more severe penile mutilations such as amputating the glans to the even more horrifying amputation of the entire penis. They also highlight the association between the circumcised penis (and, therefore, the exposed glans) and the linked concepts of primitiveness, barbarity, backwardness, superstition, and oppression.

Circumcision Techniques – The Tara KLamp

The Tara KLamp is a plastic circumcision device that comes in all sizes from infant to adult. It was invented in Malaysia and is frequently used for circumcision in countries in the Far East. It works by clamping off the foreskin where it meets the shaft of the penis. The procedure is conducted under local anaesthesia. The tube section of the device is inserted over the glans and the foreskin is pulled up over it. The device is locked in place, crushing a ring of tissue as well as cutting off the blood supply to the foreskin. The foreskin is then excised. No sutures or dressings are applied, and the Tara KLamp is left on for four to seven days until healing has occurred.

The detailed process is as follows:

1. The penis is first cleansed with sterilizing fluids. A surgical marking pen is then used to mark the level on the skin of the foreskin where the circumcision is to be performed. The foreskin should be stretched to its full length, placing it under slight tension. The position of the sulcus under the foreskin should be noted and the skin should be marked a little below this. This is the level where the clamp is to be applied and the position will ensure that sufficient foreskin is removed to leave the glans fully exposed.
2. Vaseline is applied to the inner and outer surfaces of the lower end of the tubular part and to the inner and upper part of the ring. This prevents the tissue from sticking to the device over the following days.
3. The foreskin is retracted, any adhesions being removed. The tubular part of the clamp is then placed over the glans, so that the glans is covered by the tube. The foreskin is now pulled over the rim of the tube and is adjusted so that the level which has been marked earlier is just above the rim of the tube.
4. The foreskin is held firmly with the fingers and a grip-like pressure is applied on the two arms of the device. As this pressure is increased, the two arms are brought closer to the locking mechanisms on the tube.
5. Resistance to further movement of the arms is felt when the arms come in contact with the locking mechanisms on the device. Further pressure is applied on the arms until two clicks are heard and felt. This means that the arms are already locked and the necessary occlusion has been obtained.
6. The foreskin above the clamping ring is now cut away with the tissue cutter provided.
7. The tube is cleaned with gauze, and ointment is applied at the cut edge. There should be no bleeding.
8. The device is allowed to remain on the penis for the next few days. Urine is easily voided through the opening of the tube.

A firsthand account from a Malaysian boy

I'm 13 and was just circumcised by the Tara KLamp. After seeing all these circumcision websites I finally decided to go for the operation. Firstly I went to the doctor and asked how much was it. It was only Rm40 (Malaysian currency). Then the doctor retracted my foreskin, then he put Vaseline around my foreskin and penis, then the device (Tara KLamp) was clamped on my foreskin, then after 2 minutes he used some sort of cutting knife and sliced off my foreskin, then he took off the skin and finally he put more Vaseline. The operation was a fast one and there was no blood at all. Unbelievable! I was satisfied with the operation although the device is still on my penis and I can take it off in another two days. I wish that this device could be used all around the world today. It's safe and fast!

Ivan Acorn

The Tara KLamp Procedure

1		Place the tubular part of the clamp over the glans, so that the glans is covered by the tube.
2		The foreskin is now pulled over the rim of the tube. Adjust the foreskin over the tube so that the level which has been marked earlier is just above the rim of the tube.
3		After adjusting the level of the foreskin, hold the foreskin firmly with the fingers.
4		A grip-like pressure is applied on the two arms. As this pressure is increased, the two arms are brought closer to the locking mechanisms on the tube.
5		Resistance to further movement of the arms is felt when the arms come in contact with the locking mechanisms on the device. Apply further pressure on the arms until two clicks are heard and felt. This means that the arms are already locked and the necessary occlusion has been obtained.
6		With the tissue cutter provided, the foreskin that is distal to the clamping ring is cut away at the angle between the tube and the clamping ring.

It Protects Men (And Women) Against Fatal Diseases And Sexual Infections. So, Should All Boys Be Circumcised?

[An article by Alex Renton in the Mail on Sunday]

There is a simple, 15-minute surgical procedure that will ensure your baby boy is ten times less likely to get urinary tract infections. When he grows up, he'll also be less likely to contract a whole range of sexually transmitted diseases, including syphilis, genital warts, herpes and HIV-AIDS. He'll be much less likely to develop penile cancer or kidney problems (because he didn't suffer those urinary tract infections as a child). Furthermore, his partner is four times less likely to get cervical cancer.

Interested? All the world's Jews and Muslims do it. So do most Americans. You've guessed it, it's circumcision, the trimming of the skin that encloses the top of the penis. Circumcision used to be common in this country but now we do it only for medical reasons to three per cent of boys.

Indeed, the National Health Service advises against it. There's been an extraordinarily fierce debate across the world for some 50 years – with the anti-circumcisers winning. They say the ancient practice, which began 4,000 years ago with the Pharaohs, is an unnecessary mutilation and an infringement of a boy's human rights.

But slowly the evidence of the benefits of circumcision have built up until they are now – as experts from the World Health Organisation agree – undeniable. Large-scale trials of circumcision in AIDS-stricken African countries proved what had long been suspected – that heterosexual men who were circumcised were 60 per cent less likely to become infected with HIV. Now mass circumcision programmes have begun in high AIDS-risk countries, such as Kenya. If all men in Africa are circumcised, it is said, three million lives will be saved over the next 20 years. The reason it works is because there's less of the penis exposed to infections – and the damage caused by sexually transmitted diseases is a route for the HIV virus to enter the blood. Circumcision also means it is easier to keep the penis clean, so men are less likely to pass on the human papilloma virus (HPV), linked to cervical cancer, the disease that kills around 1,000 women in the UK every year.

Links between cervical cancer and circumcision have been known for more than 50 years. So why don't we automatically circumcise baby boys, as still is the case in much of the U.S.? The NHS says that the procedure is necessary only for problems associated with an over-tight foreskin – and its advice is that the evidence on sexually transmitted diseases is not conclusive. As the NHS told the Mail: 'We are aware of emerging evidence around potential benefits of circumcision in relation to protection from HIV and AIDS. But our national guidance is clear: circumcision should be carried out by the NHS only for medical reasons.'

But the World Health Organisation, the United States' Center for Disease Control and many other international bodies say the NHS is wrong: the case for circumcision is proven. As Dr Daniel Halperin, a lecturer at Harvard School of Public Health, explains: "Given what we now know it would not surprise me if, in the next decade, circumcision of male infants does not again become the norm in Canada, the U.S., Australia and parts of Europe."

But the Europeans, including the British, are more resistant to the idea. We used to circumcise many more British boys: the posher you were, the more likely you were to have it done. In 1948 it was found that 50 per cent of grammar school boys were circumcised – but among public schoolboys the figure was 84 per cent. It is said the operation became fashionable after the British upper classes discovered that Queen Victoria's German husband, Prince Albert, was circumcised.

But in the Seventies, voices both within and outside the medical profession, started to claim that circumcision was unnecessary – or even a 'barbaric mutilation'. They claimed children had died during the operation, and that it left men less able to obtain sexual pleasure. This lobby group is still powerful. In this country. Brian Sewell, the art critic, is patron of NORM-UK – a vociferous charity that has recently showered me with 'proof' that the new research is wrong. One of NORM-UK's trustees even produced 'evidence' that, she said, showed circumcised men are more likely to get AIDS because they are more likely to have more partners and indulge in unsafe sex.

By 1975 only six per cent of British boys were being circumcised and incidence of sexual disease was rising swiftly – though at the time this was blamed on the looser morals of that era. Yet even though research about sexually transmitted diseases and circumcision was around in the Eighties – some AIDS specialists feel the case was proven as early as 1989 – circumcision was a rarity outside religious groups in Europe. Indeed, when I asked if my newborn son could be circumcised – at a private hospital in London – in 1999, the paediatrician said the operation was completely unnecessary. Nowadays, no NHS GP will recommend the operation – or even help parents find a place where it is possible. A surgeon at a Staffordshire NHS hospital has been suspended since March for suggesting the NHS was failing in its duties of care by not offering a circumcision service. The surgeon, Dr Shiban Ahmed, says that the NHS is effectively forcing parents who want to circumcise their children (for religious reasons) into the hands of private clinics or traditional circumcisers. He claims he has had to operate on small boys to correct problems arising from botched private circumcisions.

It is, in fact, a simple operation, when done on a child under eight weeks of age. The snip can be done with or without anaesthetic (it's said the local anaesthetic jab is more painful for the child than the procedure), and needs no stitches. For older children and adults the operation becomes more difficult, complex stitching is needed and the healing process will take at least six weeks – and a private urologist will charge £2,500 to circumcise anyone over eight weeks old.

Two months ago my Scottish cousin had a baby boy, Fergus. I'd told his parents about the research on circumcision, and they decided to get it done. But it wasn't easy. Their GP laughed and the NHS hospitals in Edinburgh said they would not perform the operation as they did not like putting children under six months under general anaesthetic – but all circumcising doctors agree there is no need for the patient to be unconscious. The urologist at Edinburgh's private hospital refused to do the job and another private doctor said he did only Jewish babies, and then in the traditional Jewish way.

My cousin realised in the end that if Fergus was to be circumcised he'd have to go to Britain's only dedicated penile surgery clinic in Luton. You have to ask, at a time of increasing worry about sexual disease and cancer, why this simple procedure is still effectively blacklisted. One common objection by sexual health campaigners is that men may be less likely to use 'fiddly' condoms if they know that circumcision is a protection against sexual disease. But men I have interviewed who have been circumcised as adults for medical reasons say that in fact it is much simpler to put on a condom after the operation. They also say – and this is confirmed in medical research – that their sexual pleasure was not altered.

I couldn't find an NHS GP prepared to be quoted in this article, even though many privately acknowledge that policy is now way behind medical research. Dr Michael Barrie, a private GP who works in Kingston upon Thames, Surrey, conducts two or three circumcisions a week, at £320 a go. He sees mainly expatriates from South Africa, an AIDS-struck nation where the benefits of circumcision are acknowledged. He is one of a few non-Jewish or Muslim doctors who is open about what he does. He advertises his clinic on the internet – and NORM-UK has sent him letters demanding that he stop the service. But Dr Barrie believes they, and the Government, have got it wrong. "It's certainly time to look at the evidence again. If there's a clear link between circumcision and HPV and HIV, we are clearly in need of new government policy."

Phimosis Patients, Regular Visitors

In the past few months we had seen several cases of bona fide phimosis which has not responded to conservative measures. What surprises us is that patients have quietly suffered with this for so long when the remedy is so simple. Often it is their wife or girl friend that pushes them to Dr. Reed's office, and not uncommonly they accompany the patient to Bay Harbor to be present, lend moral support, see our facility and even watch. Hey, that's OK. We love vocal anaesthesia supplements, and tender hand holding.

Important to keep in mind that the phimotic process, read scarification, involves more of the foreskin than just the very tip, and if a substantial amount is not removed back towards healthy skin, a waist banding effect will occur. Or thinking about this another way, the more inner skin removed the lower the circumcision, but patient health is number one. Bye-bye cracking, oozing, bleeding and recurrent micro-trauma and pain.

All in a day's work,

Editorial

Should the Acorn Society be wound up? That is the question posed in the article on page 16. The Society is essentially a print based Society. Its newsletter, sixteen pages published six times a year, can provide only a fraction of the information and material that is now available on a daily basis via the internet. In the early years, the core of the newsletter consisted of articles provided by the members. Now contributions from members are few and far between. Meetings of the Society are irregular and relatively poorly attended. And Society membership has been falling over the past two or three years.

All these considerations led the majority of members at the recent Acorn meeting to feel that the time had come to wind up the Society. But less than 20% of the members were present. We now need to know what the other 80% think. A questionnaire is enclosed with this newsletter. Please do complete and return it (or email your response) so that the final decision as to whether or not the Society should continue can be based on the views of all members.

A Little Bit Off The Top

When a circumcision is performed, just how much foreskin should be removed? Parents in America are increasingly concerned that the job of circumcision is being only half done. According to the article 'Getting the shaft' (reprinted on page 8), many babies are scantily circumcised – a large amount of foreskin is left.

So, are these botched jobs, or are surgeons now quite deliberately taking just a little bit off the top? The original Jewish circumcision may have been just this – the removal of the tip of the foreskin – although this is open to dispute. Perhaps only later in the Hellenic period was the circumcision procedure modified to make it impossible for a Jew to appear to be an uncircumcised Greek. By then, a radical procedure called peri'ah was in place whereby the foreskin was stripped away from the glans and most of the foreskin was removed. Thereafter, no Jewish male could easily pose as an uncircumcised Greek.

Today, for many circumcision enthusiasts, there is only one satisfactory result: a 'tight' finish with enough skin removed to leave the glans completely exposed at all times. Yet surgical text books usually describe only the operation technique for circumcision; they rarely comment on the amount of skin to be removed. Not surprisingly, therefore, results vary. The outcome may be tight, as described above; or it may be loose, whereby the glans is still permanently exposed but some spare skin is left which bunches behind the glans when the penis is flaccid.

But sometimes so little is removed that the remaining skin partially covers the glans when the penis is flaccid. This is described as a partial circumcision and is the focus of our attention today. Is the partial circumcision an error of judgement on the part of the operator; or is it a win-win situation, conferring the advantages of being both circumcised and uncircumcised?

The natural foreskin comes in many different shapes and forms. At one extreme, the foreskin extends well beyond the end of the glans – perhaps by an inch or more. This substantial overhang often ends in the so-called rose-bud tip. At the other extreme the foreskin is short and only partially covers the glans. It may even be so short as to retract naturally behind the glans on a permanent basis, so that the guy has the appearance of having been circumcised loosely. Mr 'Average' is of course somewhere in the middle with a foreskin which extends to the end of the glans or just beyond. A partial circumcision is therefore seeking to emulate the guy born with a short foreskin. Is this wise – or even possible?

There are four broad categories of reasons for performing circumcision: as a religious/tribal rite; for medical reasons; for prophylactic reasons; and for aesthetic/cosmetic reasons. As far as aesthetic circumcision is concerned, the guy being operated on will have his own idea of the perfect finish and will ask the surgeon to cut him accordingly. Since his desire is to lose his foreskin and appear circumcised, it is unlikely that he will opt for a partial cut, so this category need detain us no further. Similarly, the religious/tribal rite is usually undertaken to provide a distinguishing mark showing that the male is now a full member of the community. Again, it is unlikely that a partial cut will be deemed satisfactory.

A medical circumcision is usually carried out to cure one or other of the two main problems that occur with foreskins – phimosis and balanitis.

Phimosis is tightness of the opening of the foreskin such that it cannot retract behind the glans, particularly when the penis is erect. (In most cases of phimosis, the foreskin will not retract even when flaccid. In a minority of cases, the foreskin may retract in its detumescent state but is too tight to go over the tumescent glans. This type of foreskin is particularly dangerous. When the penis is erect, the foreskin may on occasion get pushed behind the glans where it forms a tight, restrictive band around the base of the glans, causing strangulation of the penis. This is termed paraphimosis and requires urgent treatment if the lack of blood supply to the penis is not to cause permanent damage.)

It is fashionable these days to attempt to treat phimosis by stretching the foreskin, and this procedure perhaps warrants an editor's column of its own. But if stretching is unsuccessful, as it often is, circumcision is the solution. In such cases, the surgeon will not necessarily want to excise the whole foreskin but merely remove sufficient to enable the foreskin to retract effectively. Surely in such cases, a partial circumcision will suffice?

Balanitis is inflammation of the glans and/or foreskin. Often it can be treated with ointments, but some men suffer multiple attacks and the problem becomes chronic. The underlying cause is probably the length of the foreskin and the difficulty of keeping the environment beneath the foreskin dry and bacteria free. Removal of the foreskin is usually an effective treatment. But again, it may not be necessary to remove the whole foreskin. A short foreskin may allow sufficient air to circulate for the foreskin and glans to remain relatively dry. A partial circumcision may therefore be optimal.

So what are the advantages of a partial circumcision?

- Eliminates the danger of phimosis
- Eliminates the risk of balanitis
- Improves hygiene, with cleaner urination and the virtual elimination of smegma build-up
- Leaves the glans largely covered to preserve sensitivity
- Leaves sufficient foreskin to aid masturbation
- Cosmetically, the penis still appears uncircumcised

Are there any disadvantages? The main one is that it is impossible for the surgeon to replicate the closing mechanism at the tip of the natural foreskin. This can leave a wide foreskin opening so that movement of the remaining foreskin is uncontrolled. This may mean that the foreskin does not retract properly during intercourse but remains partially covering the glans: the glans is moving within the foreskin rather than within the vagina (or anus). This reduces the stimulation the glans receives (and gives). But the opposite problem can also occur. Where the natural foreskin is funnel shaped and follows closely the curve of the glans, removing part may mean that the remaining opening is still too narrow to retract over the glans. Indeed, the operation may exacerbate the problem. Scar tissue formation at the site of the operation may in fact tighten and reduce the elasticity of the foreskin opening. A partial circumcision carried out to eliminate phimosis can still leave a phimotic problem leading to the need for a second operation and a full circumcision.

There can be a further problem. Often a foreskin that has had problems, whether from phimosis or balanitis, can become traumatised. This means that the inner foreskin is delicate and can be subject to further traumatising even in its shortened state. Certainly Dr Reed of the Reed Centre recommends full circumcision to eliminate this potential difficulty.

So there are hazards with performing a partial circumcision to cure medical problems. Patients are likely to be upset if they have to undergo further surgery because of residual problems. A full circumcision would eliminate such risks.

Finally, let us look at prophylactic circumcision. This is carried out to prevent future foreskin problems. It is the reason for routine infant circumcision, which is where this article began. The argument must be that, if there are arguments against partial circumcisions for adults, those same reasons apply for babies.

Two further factors need to be mentioned. First, evidence is growing that circumcision reduces substantially the risk of contracting HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases. It is thought that the entry point for viruses and infections is the inner foreskin. Partial circumcision is unlikely to give the same measure of protection as a full circumcision. Second, the emphasis above has been on the removal of problematic, or potentially problematic, foreskins. However, many people would argue that an added benefit, indeed perhaps the main benefit, of circumcision, is the full and permanent uncovering of the glans. Since partial circumcision is deliberately designed not to achieve this exposure, the full benefits of circumcision are being denied.

So what should be our conclusion? Where there is a definite desire to retain part of the foreskin, partial circumcision is an option. It is not, however, without its hazards, and could end with an unsatisfactory result. Full circumcision on the other hand eliminates these hazards whilst having the added advantage of fully exposing the glans. Certainly any parent contemplating the routine circumcision of their baby son would be well advised to opt for full circumcision to ensure their child has a low maintenance penis.

Let us end with the experience of a grandfather. He told on the internet of the botched circumcision that his five year old grandson had received at birth:

“The person who did the routine circumcision removed only the very tip of his foreskin and even that was not done with an even cut. The bottom part of his foreskin is longer than the top. He is scheduled to have a revision in November by a paediatric urologist. I went to his consultation visit a couple of weeks ago with my son and his wife. The doctor admitted that the previous circumcision was not done properly. He described and showed us on my grandson’s penis the complete circumcision he is planning to do with a Gomco clamp. When completed, the glans will be exposed all the time with no bunching of skin.”

Gardeners are encouraged to prune ruthlessly to get the best effect. Circumcisers should operate on the same principle.

Celebrity Status

Members' interests about circumcision and the status of various people are clearly very wide. Many public figures, it seems, often from the sporting or theatrical worlds, have made known their personal status. I know of only a few myself, but if members know of others, I am sure that most readers would like to hear about it.

Tim Henman, the tennis player, is, it seems, circumcised.

Andrew Lloyd Webber is reported as 'being very big'. I think that he, too, is circumcised.

The US President, John F Kennedy, and his brother Bobby are both believed to have been 'big' and to have had sex with Marilyn Monroe. Marilyn herself, perhaps boastfully, recorded that she had “spent more time on her hands and knees” during interviews to get the jobs, and you can interpret that to mean what you like. (Being in the US, I'm sure that everyone who had sex with her was circumcised.)

All British monarchs from the time of George IV through Edward VII and George V to George VI and including the present Prince of Wales are recorded as circumcised. It was, it seems, a family custom. Princess Diana, we are told, refused to have her sons William and Harry 'done' but I believe that today only Harry remains uncircumcised. That may have changed recently. (What will be the status of future royal males?)

There are, I am sure, many men in the British theatrical profession, probably gay, who have let us know their circumcised status (and possibly size). If any of our readers know about them, we would all love to read all about it.

Tribute To Peter

It is with great sadness that I report the death of Peter Unsworth of Edinburgh. Peter was a very long standing member of the Society and a regular attender at the Society meetings. He had hoped to come to Leicester in October but the Fates determined otherwise. He will be greatly missed.

Informal Meeting In Leeds

A Leeds-based Acorn member is organising an informal meeting of members in Leeds on Wednesday 24 February 2010 at 12 noon. The get-together will be in the Old Red Lion pub in Meadow Lane and will give members an opportunity to meet and chat. There will be a private room available which is free in return for members buying drinks. Light food will also be available for those who wish.

Anyone who is interested in attending should write to me at the Acorn post-box with a stamped addressed envelope. I will forward the letter to the organiser who will then communicate with the member direct.

Life As A Movie

In a new book*, French film director Claude Lelouch looks back on a 50-year career that started at the age of 16. The famous director's oeuvre is marked by his memories of a childhood under the occupation.

During the war the Lelouch family left Paris for the south of France just one week before Nazi invasion. "My father was a shopkeeper but he was very sharp. He suspected that the Jews would be exterminated," Lelouch told the monthly Tribune Juive. "Every time someone knocked at the door I hid in a cupboard. During the war a German officer asked me to drop my trousers. I told him I was circumcised because I peed sideways. I recited a Catholic prayer, which saved my life."

**Claude Lelouch: mode d'emploi* by Yves Allion and Jean Olle-Laprune is published at the Editions Calmann-Levy.

I Don't Want My Little Boy Circumcised

Q: My six-year-old son has never been able to pee properly. His foreskin is too tight and the surgeon says he should be circumcised. My wife seems to think this is OK but I don't believe in meddling unless it's necessary. I don't want him to resent our decision when he's older.

A: I understand your point of view. Nobody should have surgery or agree to an operation on their child unless it's necessary. However, your son's situation is one where a circumcision may be the best option. If a boy has a tight foreskin it can't be pulled back to reveal the head of the penis. This causes an obstacle to passing urine and doesn't allow the skin underneath to be cleaned. As a result debris builds up which encourages infection and can result in the skin becoming tighter still.

Circumcision will solve the problem, and although it's an uncomfortable operation your son is young and should recover very well.

The model for the picture gallery this issue is black, very large and very circumcised.

Picnic Time

On one of the few fine days recently, I was walking along our local stream when I saw a family having a picnic. The mother, finding her infant had soiled his nappy, had started changing him. He, about six months old, was lying flat on the grass waiting for the new nappy. I glanced in their direction and was astonished to see him reach down and grasp a surprisingly large glans for a small baby: the sudden exposure to the air and freedom from the nappy obviously made him want to touch it. Foolishly I walked on, though in retrospect I wished that I had talked to the mother and congratulated her on having overcome all obstacles and getting him cut, as he would always be grateful.

Getting The Shaft

[An article by Alexandra Zissu in Cookie, the parenting magazine]

Shortly before his first birthday, Alex Socarides and Gabe Fried took their son, Archer, to a pediatric urologist. His circumcision looked funny. Prior to the examination, the doctor reassured them that most babies grow into their circumcisions. Besides, he said, boys with extra skin will have good company in future locker rooms, since these days doctors are removing less and less. “The minute he took Archer’s diaper off, it was clear from his face that our son wasn’t like most babies,” recalls Socarides. “He said it would always look like something was botched.”

During the fortyish weeks of pregnancy, many parents-to-be must make a choice: to circumcise or not to circumcise. Though the non-religious may agonise (is it child abuse or disease protection?), rarely are moms and dads concerned that a circumcision might go wrong. But it does happen. Call them partial, loose, or conservative – there are a growing number of circumcisions that, to quote Charlotte from Sex and the City, look “like a shar-pei”. And while no scientific studies confirm the increase, doctors who care for infants are aware of the phenomenon. Moneer K. Hanna, M.D., a clinical professor of urology at New York Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center, sees about four babies a week for recircumcisions and estimates the incidence of partial circumcisions at about 20 percent.

In an effort to make sense of what has happened to their sons, parents flock to one another online. One only needs to follow the threads on the Berkeley (California) Parents Network, which has more than 16,000 subscribers (many from out of state), to get up to speed: “Circumcision – recircumcise?”; “Redo 10-month-old’s circumcision?”; “Fixing problem circumcision.” On another online parenting network, an upset mom confides: “I noticed before [my son’s] two-month appointment that his circumcision wasn’t done correctly. I don’t want him to have that ugly worm-in-a-turtleneck look.”

There’s no consensus among doctors as to why those who perform circumcisions are leaving extra foreskin behind, but fear of malpractice may be one reason.

“Circumcision is not an exact procedure,” explains Hanna. “The foreskin is pulled, the instrument is applied, and then you cut. If you pull gently, you can leave a little extra.” He believes obstetricians, fearing litigation, pull more gently today than in the past.

Another explanation for the parents crowding his waiting room is the current fixation on perfection. “The public is obsessed with appearances and with cosmetic surgery,” Hanna says. “They’re more demanding than they used to be.” In today’s climate of parental anxiety and baby one-upmanship (penises and all), what once passed as standard medical deviation may now be viewed as a surgical error, resulting in a trek to the doctor.

Sometimes, though, a little baby fat is all it takes to trigger false alarms. “Many babies accumulate fat around the base of the penis,” says Emily Blake, an ob-gyn and a mohel who performs brises in New York City. “A normal penis is there; it’s just partially buried beneath a pubic fat pad. This can push the foreskin far enough forward to make the penis appear uncircumcised.” These boys will grow into their penises once they start crawling and turning fat to muscle.

Part of the trouble is that circumcision is not a clear-cut surgery like, say, an appendectomy, and there’s no gold standard. The foreskin is part of the same tissue that covers the entire penis shaft, and it’s looser at the tip, like a sausage casing. It’s this floppy head skin that is removed. Blake says the lack of distinction between shaft skin and head skin means it’s not always obvious what to snip: “It’s not like a top eyelid versus a bottom eyelid. It’s more like your eyebrow – all the same thing. You can get in the ballpark, but it’s hard to be exact.”

Whether they perform recircumcisions or not, doctors say there is no medical need to fix a partial circumcision. Jay E. Berkelhamer, M.D., the president of the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP), recommends that circumcision be done when a baby is first born; as babies get older but are still unable to express themselves, they may have difficulty processing what is happening. “I would hesitate to do a routine cosmetic procedure until the child understands what is going on and why,” he says. So for parents, it comes down to whether fixing a partial circumcision is worth elective surgery. After careful consideration, Socarides and Fried had Archer recircumcised. “How was he going to feel about his penis, his sexuality?” says Socarides. Fried adds, “We worried he was going to be self-conscious about how he looks. In a profound sense. It’s not like, ‘I wish I didn’t have curly hair’ – this is so wound up in sense of self.”

She and other parents in her situation are now spreading the word. Socarides says her pregnant friends now discuss with their obstetricians how much foreskin they want taken off beforehand. Timothy Johnson, M.D., chair of the University of Michigan department of obstetrics and gynecology, applauds them. “Parents should ask, ‘Do you believe in taking a lot or a little off?’” he says. “It should truly be informed consent.” In the whirl of nursery decorating and name picking, it’s easy to back-burner a frank talk about foreskin. But if you’ve decided to circumcise, this is one area where you probably shouldn’t play it loose.

My Circumcision Experience

I am SERIOUSLY against people fudging the truth about circumcision to make it sound better or worse than it really is. (I think this happens because maybe their fetish with it dictates this sort of response.) Having been on both sides of the fence so to speak, I feel that some of what I read sometimes seems to be a misrepresentation of the truth (but then I only have my own individual experience to go by). So, with that in mind, I have tried to give a brutally honest account of the procedure and recovery, as it was for me.

I was circed for personal preference. I'm not sure what my fascination with it was, but it was just something I wanted to do.

I HAVE found I have lost a noticeable amount of sensitivity following being cut. (I had the frenulum removed too which maybe didn't help with this.) However, I am so turned on by the concept of being cut that I have no problem climaxing etc even with the slightly reduced sensitivity. It is very comfortable.

I got cut last August at 27 years old. Before being cut I did keep the foreskin back for about a month or so, and so got used to rubbing around, but to be honest, it wasn't bad at all even to start with. Regarding the pain during procedure – none. And I mean NONE at all. Not even odd or tingly sensations. I had a local anaesthetic, and that did hurt just a little. The surgeon injected me about 5 times; once in the top, bottom, left and right of the base of my cock and once in the frenular area. I have to say that hurt just a bit – not as bad as you might think, given the area in question – and certainly no worse than any immunisation needle I ever had at school.

Immediately following the operation, you DO have to work a little gingerly, because A) you don't want to move things around too much in fear of disturbing anything and B) you have all this padding which you are walking with! You will work carefully for maybe a week. Or I certainly did anyway. Pain following the operation wasn't bad at all. You do feel a sensation after the local starts to wear off, but not bad – I just kept myself on Paracetamol for a couple of days and to be honest, didn't really feel any pain with that. Each time the Paracetamol starts to wear off you get a dull achy feeling sometimes at first – but that tended to be later in the evening when I was getting tired (you know when you are ill you always feel worse at night?), but again, nothing which I would even go as far as to say felt properly painful and which went away with a couple more Paracetamol. Funnily enough, for me the pain wasn't from the cut line either at all, it was all either from a stitch snagging occasionally or most usually from the bruising caused from the anaesthetic injections (and this did swell a fair bit and turn blue/black for a good few weeks afterwards for the two either side – but not the top and bottom ones for some reason).

What WAS painful was after maybe 4 days or so, in the early morning I would be woken up because I started to get hard – I tried all sorts of things to avoid this, none to any avail. I tried tight underwear, different positioning of my cock, different sleeping positions, etc and came to the conclusion that basically a cock is going to do what a cock is going to do – especially when it has gotten over the initial shock and is now thinking hey buddy how about some attention? One thing that DID make sleep more comfortable was sleeping on my side, foetal position, with 1 or 2 pillows placed between my knees to keep my legs apart while sleeping and stopping my legs sandwiching my groin and putting pressure there. Being woken up by getting hard was uncomfortable – I wouldn't say unbearably painful (not like toothache for example, but probably like a medium to strong headache). The solution for me was to 1) get out of bed and curl into a ball with my knees under my tummy until it subsided – typically VERY quickly and was conscious and could feel the off-putting pain and then 2) take a leak, to help stop this from causing it again. (I suppose you could try not drinking much prior to bed and taking a long leak before sleeping?)

Finally regarding getting woken up through getting hard, I would say on the plus side, it doesn't happen for long. I was cut medium loose when flaccid (just a bit of gathering below the glans) to become reasonably tight when hard (I'm a grower rather than shower) and so different cuts might feel different? I didn't get it for about 4-5 days ish (because trust me, you won't feel like getting it up before then I doubt! – I was VERY active prior to the op, but still took 4-5 days before it became an issue) and it only bothered me for maybe a week to a week and a half, after which I guess healing was sufficient so that it didn't?

One other thing that bothered me during the healing was the swelling – this isn't something that every guy gets – everybody's body is different, but I got a LOT of like fluidy-under-the-skin type swelling in front of the cut line. It wasn't unclean/septic/bad type swelling, just like watery swelling. That took a GOOD few weeks to go away – like over a month or so, but was obviously worrying as I didn't think it would leave a good result afterwards, but actually it is fine. The result turned out very pleasing for me aesthetically.

Regarding stitches – I left a few stitches longer than maybe I should have. Most of mine dropped out fine, but I had two which didn't and following doctor's orders left them alone for a while. You'll know when they are really doing nothing and it is up to you what you do with them. I left the two I had for quite a while and in the end decided to snip them and pull them out – they came out without pain and very easily. But because I had left them so long I did end up with one of them leaving a stitch tunnel – although this is on the underside and you can't see it unless you know it is there (which I do) – I never mentioned it to my partner and he has never noticed (and he does get to see it close up.)

My last piece of reflection on the whole operation would be that if I did it all again (which I would) I would try to be less shy in the consultation with the surgeon. I am very happy with my result and I mean that, but I would have liked maybe super tight (knowing that with time they stretch slowly) instead of the moderately tight I got. I DIDN'T get this to start with, because I thought the guy might think me a bit weird asking for my cock to be left SUPER TIGHT. However, I've never seen the guy since, so would it matter? Furthermore, I went with Dr. Zarifa in London who I know is accustomed to adult cirks for cosmetic appearances and have every confidence it would not have been an issue if I'd asked. I'm just shy

I guess. But my advice would be to be bold and be brave and ask for EXACTLY what you want – it is better to get it right the first time.

I'd like to end, since I know a big part of the decision lies in feeling confident in your surgeon, with a commendation. I went with Dr Zarifa in London (who's point of contact is <http://www.circumcisions.co.uk>). From the website (and not knowing London) I envisaged quite a modern, hospital like surgery in an upmarket area of London. When I arrived at the actual place, I nearly turned back home. This was based purely on the surrounding area, which has the appearance of being quite rough compared to where I live and the surgery just looks like my regular NHS clinic where I see my own GP. However, inside it is nice, the staff are both lovely and professional and inside the actual 'operating theatre' as it were is very nice – looks very high-tech! I seriously can't recommend the guy himself enough though. He was excellent with me – since I wasn't very forthcoming at first he did a lot to settle me (general chit-chat) and then asked plenty of questions in a very approachable manner to ascertain what I wanted. He was very keen to know what I wanted in very fine detail and didn't once try to push me in any particular direction. He did a fine job of going through the procedure and expectations as well as after care. And the end product for me was delightful. This guy is GOOD. I have NO train-track type scarring (which was my main concern), just the scar line in a neat circle (freehand) and everything is balanced and cut as I asked. It was quite a cost (for somebody with my finances – fees are on the website), but worth every penny to me.

All the best to everybody making this decision. I have never regretted it.

Interesting Conversation

The other day I was with a long time friend in the sauna after a workout. No one else was there and the conversation eventually turned to sex. After a while he asked me if I thought that size really made any difference with the ladies. My reply was that unless you were on the extreme either way, probably not. I then said that the thing that I thought was noticed was rather if you had a foreskin or not.

Before I go further, let me tell you that we are both circumcised, he had an extremely high and tight circ, where even completely soft as we were in the sauna, the shaft skin was stretched tight. I have a moderately tight and very low circ and my shaft skin was loose with some wrinkles, but not bunched up against the glans.

He was completely surprised and asked why I thought so. I told him that I had my foreskin until I got married, then got circumcised at my wife's request. He was full of questions about the operation, how much it hurt, and what was the difference in the way it felt. We talked a while and I tried to answer his questions.

He then brought up the subject of how different guys seemed to have very different circumcisions. I agreed and then told him that I thought he had one of the best looking circumcisions I had seen and I wished that mine had turned out like his. To my surprise, he said the same thing about mine. He said that he would like to have a little loose skin to play with. I reached down and pushed my loose skin up against the rim and ask if he could do that. He ran his finger down the top side of his dick and there was no movement what so ever. I then took hold of mine and pulled the skin over the rim, covering about ¼ of the glans and ask him to try that. His skin couldn't even be pulled up to touch the rim. I then pushed my glans back onto my skin and pinched it closed over the tip. Now I was completely covered even though my penis was completely retracted back into my body. This he did, but found it very difficult to get it back far enough to pinch it closed though after working at it for a bit was able to succeed. He told me that he had never done that before, that was the first time he had covered his glans.

Small Cracks In The End Of The Foreskin

[A question & answers from Men's Health website.]

Question: Over the past couple of years I've been getting small red cracks in the end of my foreskin. These go away, then keep coming back eventually. Is there anything I can do to rid them permanently? Is it serious?

Answers:

1. Having a foreskin is a job; you need to keep it extra clean as it is a place bacteria flourish. Keep it clean, put some mineral oil or Vaseline and try to pull back the skin. This sounds like irritation to me. Give this a try and if the problem persists please go to the doctor as a guy's penis is his crown jewels.
2. I had the same problem and it kept returning till there was so much scar tissue I could no longer have sex without a blood bath. Went to my Dr, had a circumcision done within a week: problem gone for ever.
3. The skin is probably just dry. Rub some Vaseline on it.
4. Well this may sound stupid but are you masturbating a lot?
5. It doesn't sound serious, The skin probably just dries up after a while; try putting baby oil or Vaseline on it.
6. My husband had this. What happens is that at some point in time your foreskin has cracked or torn slightly and has healed again. But where it has healed it has formed scar tissue which is less stretchy and thicker than the skin around it. The next time your foreskin is rolled back it will crack or tear in a different place because the opening is now slightly narrower. Each time it happens the problem will get a little worse. If it has only recently started happening, start moisturising your foreskin regularly to keep the skin supple. Try specialist moisturisers designed for scar tissue, but E45 cream will probably do just as well. If this doesn't solve the problem you need to see your doctor for steroid cream. My hubby put off seeing the doctor for some time and ended up having to have a circumcision. It was a big deal for him beforehand, but he got used to it very quickly and it is much easier to keep it fresh and clean. It has not been a complete cure as he still get splits sometimes, but nowhere near as often and because the foreskin has gone there is no skin stretching involved. I think his skin is just very delicate there. One of my co-worker's husband had the same operation for the same reason a couple of weeks later so I think it is a fairly common problem for men. So there's no reason to be embarrassed to see your doctor about it. Good luck.

7. Sounds similar to the problem I had. I ended up getting circumcised. It's the end of the problem! Foreskins aren't that great... just a place for infections and problems to arise. My advice if you aren't too attached to it... cut it off. Circumcision is not painful, just uncomfortable for a few days/weeks until your glans gets used to being exposed all the time. I'm glad I'm cut. It's only been 3 and a half weeks but it's in use and ok, a bit puffy at times but it will calm.
8. It may be thrush, balanitis, or some other infection. It could be irritation due to shower gel or something. The only way to be sure is to show it to your doctor.

Swedish Doctors Refuse To Circumcise Boys

Many doctors and several local authorities in Sweden refuse to circumcise boys unless it is medically motivated. Gunnar Göthberg, chairman of the Swedish Pediatric Surgeons Association (Svensk barnkirurgisk förening), compared the procedure to female genital mutilation. A survey done by the Association reported that two out of three paediatric surgeons do not want to perform circumcision. Göthberg regards the operation as an assault since the procedure is done without the child's consent. Twelve of 21 local municipalities also refuse to perform circumcisions for non-medical reasons.

Around 3,000 circumcisions are estimated to be done in Sweden each year. Of these, around 2,000 are performed by people who are not doctors and who do not have a medical licence, which pose risks for the child and lead to complications. Circumcision of boys for non-medical reasons is permitted in Sweden, and the Swedish Board of Health and Welfare (Socialstyrelsen) is of the opinion that a prohibition would be an illegal limitation on religious freedom.

The authority has proposed that the issue should be legally regulated and that all municipalities should offer male circumcision for non-medical reasons. The Swedish Association of Local Authorities and Regions believes that a formal recommendation would be sufficient. Critics claim that non-medical circumcision is in violation of the United Nation's Declaration of the Rights of the Child, reported DN.

The website allows comments and nearly 200 comments were submitted in less than two days. Here is a flavour of the pro-circ comments:

Comment 1

It is sad that despite the overwhelming evidence supporting circumcision as an effective defence against sexually transmitted diseases, our surgeons act like cowards when asked to remove the foreskin from a child whose perception of pain is little. Male circumcision is not mutilation as it does not reduce the male libido in anyway. Even when done by non-medical personnel (as is done in most 3rd world countries) I have yet to see a case of major damage to the child.

I am glad my parents circumcised me because I would never have had the guts to do it as an adult.

Comment 2

No matter what, circumcision of boys will continue to be a practice for many for reasons religious or otherwise. Taking away the option of having it done by a professional in sanitary conditions where the boy's well-being can be properly monitored if necessary will just lead to parents approaching non-medical individuals to have it performed instead. Is that really a smart thing to do?

Male circumcision when done properly on a young child who will have no memory of it, in my opinion, leaves no lasting psychological or physical impact on the child. It did not for me. So why does it cause such an uproar here in Europe? Can someone please explain it to me because I am genuinely interested to know.

Comment 3

My son was born in Germany and I had the same issue. I had to wait until I went back to the States to have him circumcised.

Acorn Society Meeting Report

A meeting of the Acorn Society took place at the Ramda Jarvis Hotel, Leicester on Saturday 31st October 2009. Thirteen subscribing members were present including Frank, Keith and Mick who were attending an Acorn meeting for the first time. One former member, now non-subscribing, or doing so under a further alias, was also present.

After the opening of the meeting and presenting apologies for absence, Douglas said that in a recent email, Ivan, Editor of the magazine, had given an assurance that he was willing to produce six editions of the magazine, at intervals, during the coming year.

Vernon informed the group that magazine N° 6 for 2009 was under way and that space was being held for a report on this meeting.

Douglas reflected that over time membership has fallen significantly; there were now 68 subscribing members. After payment of costs and charges and distribution of the magazine by email and by post there was an excess of income over expenditure of about £250 a year. Further, the Acorn bank account was in credit.

Douglas gave notice that it was his intention to resign from the office of Treasurer with effect from 31st December 2009.

During the following discussion one member asked if Acorn should become strictly a magazine as only a small and dwindling number of members were inclined or able to meet. Stuart asked if anyone thought that Acorn had reached the end of the road and should be wound up. Members explored this and recognition was made that at the time of its founding Acorn was a valuable source of information and support for those curious about the why, when and how's of circumcision. When Acorn was founded, few members had access to a personal computer. Over the years computer ownership and access to the internet has become common place giving easy access to a great deal of information on the subject of our interest; in effect Acorn has been overtaken!

A member asked that a vote be taken on the question 'Should the Acorn Society now be wound up?' The vote was taken and a significant majority voted in favour of closure. It was agreed that the wider membership should now be consulted about this matter.

With the future of the Society in question there is no need to raise a subscription for the year 2010. Anyone seeking membership for the first time would be made aware of the situation and, if they desired to be in membership, would be charged £10 for membership giving them entitlement to all 2009 issues as well as any magazines published in 2010, and access to the purchase of further back numbers.

Recognition was made of the Society's long standing Resolution that if at any time the Society closed the pecuniary assets, if any, would be divided between three charities, London Lighthouse Trust; the Terrence Higgins Trust and Age Concern.

The future of other assets e.g. the internet domain name owned by Acorn and the archive e.g. back numbers of the magazines must be considered.

Douglas – Honorary Treasurer

The Acorn Society – Does It Have A Future?

At the October meeting of the Acorn Society (report above), the future of the Society was discussed. For the reasons given, a significant number of those present voted in favour of winding up the Society.

In recognition of this vote, the views of the wider membership are being sought on this matter. A questionnaire is attached. Please complete this questionnaire and return it to the Society via the mailbox address. Alternatively, email your response to editor@acornsoc.org.uk. The closing date for the return of questionnaires is 31st January 2010.

It is important that everyone responds to this questionnaire. If you do not respond, it will be taken that you are indifferent to the continuation of the Society; your vote will be added to those opting to wind up the Society.
